This is preventive relief. It exists in 20 States of the Union; it has existed in Great Britain for over 35 years; it exists in Canada, and has existed in Scotland for about 300 years.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Does it exist in the gentleman's State?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes; but it has not been resorted to very much, I will say to the gentleman from Iowa.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. As I say, it has not been resorted to in my State very much, and, if I may be permitted to say so, I fear our statute is somewhat complicated.

Mr. RAMSEYER. What is the experience of the States that have this procedure?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman from Kentucky stated on the floor the other day that it worked most admirably in his State, and from the information I have obtained—and I have endeavored to obtain it—leads me to the conclusion that wherever it has been tried it has given great satisfaction. As I stated the other day, it is preventive medicine and preventive relief intended to cut off litigation or to expedite, simplify, and lessen the costs of litigation.

Mr. RAMSEYER. If the gentleman will yield, I will ask him this further question. I notice that in the last paragraph on the second page of the report it is stated:

> The "declaratory judgment" is a useful procedure in determining jural rights, obligations, and privileges, but may be applied to the ascertainment of almost any determinative fact or law.

Then in the next sentence it speaks of it as being used to determine the validity of statutes. I am wondering whether under this procedure——

Mr. MONTAGUE (interposing). The validity of statutes, does the gentleman say?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes; to determine the validity of statutes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman read that again?

Mr. RAMSEYER. It is in the report.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think it can be done, but I do not see the language.

Mr. RAMSEYER. In the second sentence in the last paragraph of the report it is stated:

> The declaration of a status was perhaps the earliest exercise of this procedure, such as the legality of marriage, the construction of written instruments, and the validity of statutes.

I was just wondering whether under this procedure you could bring into question the constitutionality of an act of Congress before any litigation involving that statute had been brought.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would not like to answer the gentleman further than to say this: That under proper circumstances it might be brought, but it should be brought upon proper application and in conformity with the directions and judgment of the court. If it is a question dependent upon a statute and the constitutionality of that statute is involved, why not permit the validity of the statute to be determined in advance of prolonged and costly litigation?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Was it the intention of the committee in writing this bill to give the court the power or not to give the court the power before the act was questioned in the regular court of litigation as it has to be now?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Such litigation may be expensive and prolonged and may involve many years, and if the validity of the statute can be determined in whole or in part, why not afford a procedural remedy in advance of what might be otherwise prolonged and complicated litigation?

Mr. RAMSEYER. The bill intends to confer that power upon the court?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think this bill confers that power upon the court.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I beg to direct the gentleman's attention to the language "in cases of actual controversy in which, if suits were brought, the courts of the United States would have jurisdiction." Does that test relate only to the jurisdiction of the subject matter?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think so.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Or also to the parties?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes. You see, the minute you bring the application or invoke the application for this machinery of the court to determine this question you have begun a case or a suit.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Exactly; but——

Mr. MONTAGUE. If I may make myself clear, the subject matter must be of Federal jurisdiction.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Certainly; but the courts would not have jurisdiction of a moot question.

Mr. MONTAGUE. No; and the bill so prohibits; therefore——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Or of a question which did not involve any rights. So that you could not go in on a petition in this sort of proceeding and get the delivery of an opinion by the court upon the validity of a statute unless some rights were involved, could you?

Mr. MONTAGUE. No; of course, it must be an actual controversy about a right.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I simply desire to point out, in response to the question of the gentleman from Iowa, that in our State it has been held in Board of Education of Rochester v. Von Zandt (119 Misc. 124, affirmed 201 App. Div. 194):

> Where an actual controversy exists involving only a question of law, such as the construction of a provision of the State constitution, the court has the power, in view of this section and rules 210–214, Rules of Civil Practice, to entertain and determine an application for a declaratory judgment.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. But it does not appear that this language is exactly the same as the language in the statute of the State of New York.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will say to the gentleman that the Supreme Court of the State of Michigan has held that a declaratory judgment, a moot question, was unconstitutional; but this language, put in this bill after thorough study, has commended itself to our approval, must be applied to actual controversies. We therefore have obviated the question raised in the Michigan decision.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STOBBS].

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman, before he proceeds, permit me to have one minute more?

Mr. STOBBS. Yes; certainly.

Mr. DYER. I yield one minute more to the gentleman from Virginia, with pleasure.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I beg to submit to the Members of the House, if I may have their attention one minute further, that this is a very meritorious piece of legislation. We complain of the courts, their slowness, and what not. This is intended to meet that criticism, and this purpose has been so effected everywhere it has been tried by simplifying, expediting, and diminishing the costs of the administration of justice.

It is in the interests of the people of the country, whether the bar wants it or not.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I only have one minute. I would be pleased to yield if I had the time.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I would like to say that in Maryland a similar statute has been used very successfully for 50 years at least, I should think.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Twenty States of the Union have it, as I have observed.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. It is not used in law cases, but in the construction of wills on the equity side of the court it is almost universally used.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We have used it for that purpose for many years in Virginia.

Mr. STOBBS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, on the question that was asked by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] as to whether or not this could be used where there was a moot question only, I might say the Supreme Court of Michigan decided the statute in that State unconstitutional, because it said that that question might arise; but that statute did not include the words "in actual controversy," and so to obviate or to take care of the decision in the State of Michigan the words were inserted in this particular bill—"in actual controversy." This makes it perfectly clear that no court can take any jurisdiction of any question under this declaratory judgment provision unless there is an actual controversy.

As regards the words "actual controversy," these words have been defined by the Kansas Supreme Court, because the same words were used in the Kansas statute, which was passed after the Michigan decision. The Michigan decision, by the way, was in Two hundred and eleventh Michigan—I have not the page right here. The Kansas court said that the words "actual controversy" mean "an actual, antagonistic assertion and denial of a right;" and then Professor Borchard, of Yale, who has made a study of this proposition, and who is largely responsible for the drafting of this bill, has defined the words "actual controversy" as "a real and not a fraudulent or ostensible controversy"; and the Pennsylvania Supreme Court has defined the words "actual controversy" as "an actual controversy or the ripening seeds of one." All of which goes to show that the court in its discretion is going to decide whether there is in fact an actual issue between the parties and not purely a moot question, and that is why this provision was put in the act.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STOBBS. I will be pleased to yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS. Is there any provision in this bill in case the party aggrieved desires to take up his case, when the court has decided he has no controversy? Is there any provision for an appeal on that proposition?

Mr. STOBBS. The act provides that the Supreme Court may make rules and regulations in reference to carrying out the provisions of this declaratory judgment act, and, of course, that would provide for an appeal; and I might say on that particular question that this provision with respect to a declaratory judgment, as the gentleman from Virginia has already stated, has been in successful use in Scotland for something over 100 years and in England ever since 1850, so that this legislation can not be regarded as an experiment.

It has been adopted by 20 States, and the commissioners on uniform practice throughout the United States have recommended the provisions of declaratory judgment—recommended that these provisions be put into the statutes of all the States, and since 1922, when they adopted that report, several States have come in. Among others is Pennsylvania. The commission on uniform practice have put in the bill 14 sections; they have reported all of the rules and regulations under which declaratory judgments should be safeguarded. The bill before the House has simplified it as much as possible by allowing the Supreme Court to make rules and regulations. Pennsylvania, as I say, has adopted the recommendation of the uniform practice commission in toto. Many of the other States are following the practice of Kansas, where they have adopted the simplified form. The words in this act are broad enough to take care of not only the construction of a contract, but the issues of fact which may not be in written form, because if there is a contract between the parties which is not in written form under the provisions of this act we are discussing the court may summon a jury and decide that contract or issue of fact and base its judgment on such findings of fact.

Now, on the question as to whether or not this could be brought at the instigation of one party rather than by all, as the gentleman from Virginia has well said, the act would mean nothing more than we can do at the present time on an agreed statement of facts if we left it "all." But from the very beginning this provision for a declaratory judgment has been at the request of any one party.

In England the statute reads "any person claiming to be interested"; and the uniform practice act has this provision: "Any person interested under a deed, will," and so forth.

So the uniform practice act recommends that any one person may instigate this petition or request.

Connecticut has "any person"; likewise Kansas, Kentucky, Florida, California, and Pennsylvania, and such other States as have adopted the uniform-practice provisions.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STOBBS. I will.

Mr. CELLER. I agree with the gentleman that the amendment should be adopted so as to make the jurisdiction coercive so one party might have a trial and bring all the other parties in. But what bothers me now is this: That being the case, would it in any way interfere with the right of trial by jury in so far as bringing defendants into court to have a judgment declared against them in that way?

Mr. STOBBS. The judgment that the court makes the decree is nothing more nor less than the construction of a contract, or as to the legal relation between the parties. The court does not pass on the question of fact. If there is an issue of fact, the bill provides that you can have a jury to decide it.

Mr. CELLER. I do not know whether or not the language in the bill of rights is broad enough to give the right to a district judge to interfere with the right of anyone who is thus coerced to have his case tried by a jury.

Mr. STOBBS. Clause 3 of this bill says:

> When a declaration of rights or the granting of further relief based thereon shall involve the determination of issues of fact triable by a jury, such issues may be submitted to a jury in the form of interrogatories with proper instructions by the court whether a general verdict be required or not.

Mr. McSWAIN. The allowance of such a motion is at the discretion of the court and may be submitted to the jury?

Mr. STOBBS. Yes; of course, the court may decide that there is no issue to be tried by a jury.

Mr. McSWAIN. This is simply to afford an additional remedy to existing rights; this does not afford any additional rights.

Mr. STOBBS. It is clearly remedial.

Mr. McSWAIN. They have the right under the Constitution to have a trial by jury.

Mr. STOBBS. Surely. Nothing in this act can do away with any constitutional right anybody may have.

Mr. McSWAIN. And if the judge reads this language as though it grants him discretion to submit the issue arising out of common law to trial, the judge must remember the Constitution, which says, irrespective of the language of the statute, that he must submit the legal issue to the jury.

Mr. STOBBS. Absolutely.

Mr. McSWAIN. I injected these remarks so that the RECORD may show, if the judge ever denies that right, that the committee here acceded to it.

Mr. CELLER. The courts have held that statutory construction involves the interchange of "shall" and "may."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STOBBS. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The filing of the petition gives the court jurisdiction. From that time on the proceeding goes ahead in the way of an ordinary suit. The parties are brought in. The court must observe all constitutional and other rights, and this method is simply a new procedure for bringing parties into court and permitting parties to come into court.

Mr. STOBBS. That is all there is to the proposition. It is made to prevent litigation rather than to encourage it by granting an opportunity at the very outset, before any litigation, to ascertain and have established one's rights.

Mr. EVANS of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STOBBS. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of California. Will this remedy apply in cases where actions have already been filed concerning the same subject matter? For instance, we will say there is a bona fide suit pending. Could the parties then avail themselves of this proceeding?

Mr. STOBBS. The gentleman means if the suit is actually brought?

Mr. EVANS of California. Yes; where the suit is already brought can the same parties resort to this remedy meanwhile?

Mr. STOBBS. If I understand the gentleman correctly, he wants to know whether one can invoke the provisions of this statute after suit has been brought as well as before?

Mr. EVANS of California. Yes. The gentleman has already made it plain, that it can be invoked before.

Mr. STOBBS. If the gentleman brought an ordinary action to determine my responsibilities under a contract and in the ordinary course it went to a trial and to a determination of liability for damages, if any suffered, the question involved in that suit would be, at some time in the proceedings, the construction of a written contract.

Mr. EVANS of California. Yes.

Mr. STOBBS. I see no reason why it should not be possible to invoke the court to construe that contract at the outset, as well as in the actual trial of the case; but I am not clear about that.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Why could not all those questions be tried out on demurrers to petitions and answers after the suit had begun, as questions of law. That is the only question that could be passed on by the court.

Mr. STOBBS. But a demurrer raises only questions of law on the facts as they appear on the pleadings. This is to allow you to go behind the pleadings and get at all of the real facts.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Where an action at law is started and the two parties are at issue, either the contract has been breached, or one of the parties is at fault and has a duty to perform. Therefore any relief that may be sought pending trial is by way of motion. This is prior to the time that damages occur, or that the two parties are at issue.

Mr. STOBBS. This procedure is supposed to be invoked before suit is brought.

Mr. EVANS of California. As I understand this bill, it provides for a new and distinct forum for a preliminary declaratory judgment.

Mr. STOBBS. It provides for a new remedial action.

Mr. EVANS of California. It provides for a new action before the same forum?

Mr. STOBBS. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of California. Assuming an action has been filed, and that action is pending, now the parties face about and take another course and come in and say, "I will try this same subject in this way."

Mr. STOBBS. Oh, no. If they have invoked this procedure under the act and the court construes a contract, that becomes res adjudicata.

Mr. EVANS of California. I am not interested in whether the court has construed the contract. Suppose one party gets tired of the first action and is not satisfied.

Mr. STOBBS. I do not follow the gentleman's statement.

Mr. EVANS of California. Let us assume that an action has been filed between parties litigant.

Mr. STOBBS. And that an actual suit has been brought in court?

Mr. EVANS of California. Under the form now allowed. Suppose this act is passed, should the parties to that action decide that they will avail themselves of this proceeding, and if they should, what happens to the first action, or can they avail themselves of this proceeding when action is already pending under the old form?

Mr. DEMPSEY. May I answer the question?

Mr. STOBBS. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DEMPSEY. All your court could do is to discontinue your first action.

Mr. EVANS of California. I wondered if that is necessary. You always can dismiss the first action. Anyone can dismiss the action.

Mr. DEMPSEY. You can bring it either under new proceedings or under the old.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I have already spoken on this bill. I believe it is a piece of progressive legislation. We have a similar statute in New York. We have had it but a short time. I am certain that in the opinion of the bar and bench of our State it has worked out very satisfactory. Many of the provisions of our State law and the decisions since its enactment will, I believe, answer many inquiries which have been made concerning the bill under consideration. I will read it, as it is very short. Section 473 of the civil practice act provides:

> The Supreme Court shall have power in any action or proceeding to declare rights and other legal relations on request for such declaration whether or not further relief is or could be claimed, and such declaration shall have the force of a final judgment. Such provision shall be made by rules as may be necessary and proper to carry into effect the provisions of this section.

I will refer to the rules in just a minute.

Now, the question propounded to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] whether or not a declaratory judgment can be obtained as to the constitutionality of the law? I will say that in New York it has been so decided. The question first came up in the case of the Board of Education of Rochester against Van Zandt, reported in 119 Misc. 195 N. Y., affirmed 204 App. Div. 856, 197 N. Y. S. 899 (1922).

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman will recall that I answered in the affirmative.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. The rules to carry into effect the provision in New York State are short and simple. Rule 210 of the Rules and Practice makes the pleadings, practice, and procedure similar to "other actions" in the Supreme Court. In other words, the parties are brought into court by the service of a summons and petition or complaint, and the court acquires jurisdiction of parties to the action. The petition must necessarily contain sufficient facts to show an actual controversy, with a prayer for proper relief. In other words, rule 210 is assimilated to other actions in that court. Then, rule 211 covers the prayer for relief. Rule 212 provides that the jurisdiction of the court is discretionary. It will be clarified when I read the rule and the decisions thereunder. Rule 213 provides for a trial by jury to determine questions of fact.

Mr. NEWTON. Does the gentleman construe the New York statute to permit declaratory judgments only in cases of actual controversy?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. We have a provision in New York for the presentation of a brief statement of facts to determine the question in controversy.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman from Minnesota will give me his attention, I will say further that where an action has already accrued, for example, where an agent had been discharged by his employer and then sought a declaratory judgment to determine whether he was entitled to certain commissions, the court decided that he could commence an action in law and refused to entertain his petition for a declaratory judgment. I will cite the case later.

Mr. NEWTON. Of course, the Michigan statute, and I think one or two others, did not contain any condition of actual controversy, and they brought a moot question before the Michigan court.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The New York statute and our bill here provide for actual controversy. The rule requiring the same form and procedure as an action in law makes it clear that the petition must recite facts to show that an actual controversy exists. The rules are so brief and the leading cases so illuminating on the many questions that have been raised that I will read them. I think they will be very useful to the House:

Section 473 of the New York civil practice act is as follows:

> Declaratory judgments: The supreme court shall have power in any action or proceeding to declare rights and other legal relations on request for such declaration whether or not further relief is or could be claimed, and such declaration shall have the force of a final judgment. Such provisions shall be made by rules as may be necessary and proper to carry into effect the provisions of this section.
> This section has no application to actions commenced before the civil practice act went into effect. Watts v. Barker (201 App. Div. 861; 193 N. Y. S. 59 (1922)).
> Validity: Where the demand of the plaintiff in an action on a trade acceptance unnecessarily included a demand for a declaratory judgment pursuant to this section, a determination of the validity of this section was unnecessary. Gerseta Corporation v. Gramatan National Bank of Bronxville (205 App. Div. 868; 198 N. Y. S. 385 (1923)).
> Matters determinable: Declaratory judgment entered respecting rental payable under lease of premises, part of which were taken in condemnation proceedings. United Cigar Stores Co. of America v. Norwood (124 Misc. 488; 208 N. Y. S. 420 (1925)).
> Judgment granted under this section for the relief of the vendee of premises under contract for their delivery in the condition existing on the date of the contract, or for a sum stated as liquidated damages in the event of nonperformance, where the buildings on said premises were destroyed by fire before delivery was accomplished. Brownell v. Board of Saratoga Springs (239 N. 369; 146 N. E. 630 (1925), reviewing 211 App. Div. 823; 206 N. Y. S. 887 (1924), mem. dec.).

In view of the adoption by the State of the principle of declaratory judgments, evidenced by this section and rules 210–214, Rules of Civil Practice, the supreme court is not precluded to determine an action in equity between rival claimants to an amount admittedly due from the State on a contract with one of the parties, notwithstanding the comptroller, who has refused payment until the controversy is determined, is not made a party to the action. Durant v. Whedon (201 App. Div. 196; 194 N. Y. S. 126 (1922)).

Where an actual controversy exists involving only a question of law, such as the provision of the State constitution, the court has power, in view of this section and rules 210–214, Rules of Civil Practice, to entertain and determine an application for declaratory judgment. Board of Education of City of Rochester v. Van Zandt (119 Misc. 124; 195 N. Y. S. 297 (1922), affirmed 204 App. Div. 856; 197 N. Y. S. 899 (1922), mem. dec.).

This is the case I referred to when the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] had the floor.

This section confers no jurisdiction upon the court to enter a declaratory judgment in an action to compel a nonresident testamentary trustee under a foreign will to execute a trust for the benefit of one not named in the will. Everhart v. Provident Life & Trust Co. of Philadelphia (118 Misc. 852; 195 N. Y. 388 (1922).

Declaratory judgment relating to franchise rights as between city and street-railway company modified and affirmed. Manhattan Bridge Three-Cent Line v. City of New York (204 App. Div. 89; 198 N. Y. S. 49 (1923), affirmed 236 N. Y. 559; 142 N. E. 283 (1923).

Under section 473 of the civil practice act, relating to declaratory judgments, the supreme court has power to entertain a controversy for the purpose of rendering a declaratory judgment with reference to the authority of other members of the sinking fund commission to transact business in the absence of the comptroller. Craig v. Commissioners of Sinking Fund of City of New York, 208 App. Div. 412; 203 N. Y. S. 236 (1924)).

For observation by the court that a declaratory judgment may be obtained as to rights and duties under a restrictive covenant, see Forstmann v. Joray Holding Co. (Inc.) (216 App. Div. 135; 215 N. Y. S. 65 (1926)). For case on appeal, see 244 New York 22, 154 N. E. 652 (1926).

Effect of submission: submission of controversy between lessor and lessee under this section held to waive a prior waiver of the lessor of a restrictive covenant in the lease. Schmidt v. Louis (122 Misc. 249; 203 N. Y. S. 515 (1924)).

Relief unenforceable: A complaint by a discharged agent of an insurance company seeking a declaratory judgment alleged that the plaintiff was entitled to a certain compensation and a percentage on renewals, which he would lose by reason of the defendant's breach of contract, but it appeared that the defendant had refused and could not be compelled to perform its part of the agreement. In these circumstances it was held that plaintiff's case as stated could be best worked out by him in an action for breach of the contract, and that he was not entitled to a declaratory judgment. His complaint was dismissed with leave to file an amended complaint asking different relief. Loesch v. Manhattan Life Insurance Co. (128 Misc. 232; 218 N. Y. S. 412 (1926)).

This is the case I had in mind when replying to an inquiry made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON].

Res judicata: It is doubtful whether the supreme court will enter declaratory judgment after a court of coordinate jurisdiction has already entered an order which is res judicata upon these parties, since the court may decline to pass declaratory judgment "for other reasons." Kings County Trust Co. v. Melville (127 Misc. 374; 216 N. Y. S. 278 (1926)).

Now, here are the rules of practice to carry out the provisions of section 374 of the New York civil practice act.

Rule 210. Practice assimilated: An action in the supreme court to obtain a declaratory judgment, pursuant to section 473 of the civil practice act, in matters of procedure shall follow the forms and practice prescribed in the civil practice act and rules for other actions in that court.

Ownership of claim against State: Under this title (rules 210–214) a suit in equity is proper to determine the ownership of a claim against the State and it is not important that the comptroller or any other State officer be made a party, since it will be presumed that the decree will be respected by State officers. Durant v. Whedon (201 App. Div. 196; 194 N. Y. S. 126 (1922)).

Rule 211. Prayer for relief: The prayer for relief in the complaint shall specify the precise rights and other legal relations of which a declaration is requested, and whether further or consequential relief is or could be claimed. If further relief be claimed in the action the nature and extent of such relief shall be stated.

Rule 212. Jurisdiction discretionary: "If in the opinion of the court the parties should be left to relief by existing forms of actions, or for other reasons, it may decline to pronounce a declaratory judgment, stating the grounds on which its discretion is so exercised."

Adjudication of ownership of claim against State: Neither the secretary of state nor the comptroller has been constituted by law a tribunal to adjudicate title to money due for publishing the session laws in a newspaper as between rival claimants. Durant v. Whedon (201 App. Div. 196; 194 N. Y. S. 126 (1922)).

Rule 213. Verdict of jury on facts: In order to settle questions of fact necessary to be determined before judgment can be rendered, the court may direct their submission to a jury. Such verdict may be taken by the court before which the action is pending for trial or hearing. The provisions of section 429 and 430 of the civil practice act apply to a verdict so rendered.

The short section in the civil practice act and these four rules constitute the declaratory judgment law of my State. In substance the bill before us is similar and will produce, I am sure, the same beneficial results.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I want to inquire if this procedure is compulsory on the defendant?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. He must answer. The same as if he were served with a summons and complaint in a law or equity action brought in a court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. You bring him into court by this procedure, and the court will proceed to deliver a declaratory judgment, of the same force and effect of a final judgment?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exactly. Yes; that is according to the New York statute and the intent of the present bill.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Speaker, this is a most important measure. When it was under consideration one week ago, while I favored the general principle of the bill, I did not feel that I could support it at that time because I had not had an opportunity to inquire into the laws and decisions of some of the States of the Union where they have a declaratory judgment law in effect. As to the text of the bill, there was doubt and uncertainty, not only among Members upon the floor, but even those who were upon the Committee on the Judiciary. Therefore, I then voted to recommit the bill so that more careful consideration could be given it before it was again brought up for consideration in the House.

During the present week I have had an opportunity to examine into the question somewhat, and I am now prepared to vote for this measure providing two or three suggested amendments are adopted.

In my examination I found that several of the States of the Union had adopted declaratory judgment legislation, including: New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, Michigan, Wisconsin, California, Kansas, Kentucky, Virginia, Pennsylvania, North Dakota, and several others. Several of those States passed a so-called uniform declaratory judgment law proposed by a committee of the American Bar Association.

We must all recognize that there is a difference, of course, between the authority of some of the courts of the States and the courts of the United States. It is quite possible that a declaratory judgment law might not work so well under the Federal courts as under some of the State courts, but, after reflecting upon the matter, it seems to me that it is worth while trying out something of the kind.

However, I am taking my position largely because there can be no question from the langauge of the bill before us that it applies only "in cases of actual controversy." I could not support it if it were not limited in this manner. A moment ago in the colloquy between the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] something was said in reference to the New York State declaratory judgment law and the right of a litigant there to have the constitutionality of a law construed in a declaratory judgment proceeding. I have read the New York statute. It is not clear that it applies only to actual controversies. Under the Federal Constitution I am of the opinion that we would have no right whatever to pass any declaratory judgment legislation which was not confined to cases of actual controversy.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In the case I cited there was an actual controversy, and the test was whether the law invoked was constitutional or not. In order to test the constitutionality of any statute there must be that situation and a controversy.

Mr. NEWTON. The gentleman has said that there was an actual controversy, and the New York court held that the act applied only to actual controversies.

Mr. STOBBS. Under the New York statute it is specifically provided that any person interested in any will, and so forth, or whose rights are affected by a statute, municipal ordinance, or franchise, may have that question determined. In other words, it specifically provides there that a right under a statute or ordinance may be construed a declaratory judgment.

Mr. NEWTON. But the moment we get beyond the field of an actual controversy and get into any moot question then we are up against the Constitution of the United States, as that was construed in the Muskrat case. A statute including moot questions would be of no avail, as I understand the Constitution and the Supreme Court decisions.

Mr. DOWELL. But the gentleman from Massachusetts refers to the construction of a written instrument, while this language does not confine it to that character of controversies. It opens the field to any controversy. It may be a question of fact or it may be that any controversy may come in under this legislation.

Mr. NEWTON. That is true, but if there is an actual controversy, notwithstanding that there may be a constitutional queston involved, it seems to me that the court could then go ahead and proceed under this declaratory judgment law to determine such questions, including constitutional ones, which might be presented to it in the proceedings. It further appears to me that, in cases of actual controversy, we can safely confer this power, but we should keep in mind that the test is, Is there an actual controversy? Are there, in fact, adverse parties? So restricted, it seems that this legislation should pass. If it is not so restricted under the decision of the Supreme Court in the Muskrat case (219 U. S. 346), it would be futile to pass such legislation. The court in that case went on to say that from its earliest history it had consistently declined to exercise any powers other than those that were strictly judicial in their nature; that under the Constitution the exercise of judicial power is limited to cases and controversies, and that a case or controversy necessarily implies the assistance of present or possible adverse parties whose contentions are submitted to the court for adjudication; and specifically held, just as the court had repeatedly held before, that it possessed no veto power on legislation enacted by Congress excepting as it indirectly exercised a sort of veto power to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional when a case between opposing litigants was submited to it for adjudication.

Our distinguished colleague the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] was of counsel in that important piece of litigation.

In its opinion the court quoted with approval an extract from an opinion by Mr. Justice Brewer in Chicago Railroad Co. v. Wellman (143 U. S. 339), wherein that distinguished jurist used the following language:

> Whenever, in pursuance of an honest and actual antagonistic assertion of rights by one individual against another, there is presented a question involving the validity of any act of any legislature, State or Federal, and the decision necessarily rests on the competency of the legislature to so enact, the court must, in the exercise of its solemn duties, determine whether the act be constitutional or not; but such an exercise of power is the ultimate and supreme function of courts. It is legitimate only in the last resort, and as a necessity in the determination of real, earnest, and vital controversy between individuals. It never was the thought that, by means of a friendly suit, a party beaten in the legislature could transfer to the courts an inquiry as to the constitutionality of the legislative act.

There can be no question, then, that our power to legislate is restricted to cases in actual controversy.

Mr. CELLER. The gentleman will agree, and I am sure most Members will, that as time goes on and as business affairs become more intricate and complex there should be a corresponding increase of remedies in the Federal courts. I am sure that if the Federal courts of New York should have this right of declaring a declaratory judgment, it would result in simplifying the procedure in the Federal courts and decrease to an appreciable degree the bulging dockets of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York as well as the Southern District of New York.

Mr. NEWTON. I hope so; but at the same time it does not appear that declaratory judgments in State courts have been used to any considerable extent.

Mr. CELLER. I will say that the reason why they have not been used in New York heretofore is that a good many lawyers did not know there is a new remedy. In New York we have heretofore had a provision whereby if you and I had a controversy we could go to the appellate division of the Supreme Court of New York and voluntarily lay our facts before the court and have them determined. That was used to a considerable degree; but now we have this additional remedy whereby one man can go into court, if we pass this statute, and coerce the other parties to go into court. I am sure that if we noise this about lawyers generally will make use of this remedy.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT].

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, as one who has practiced under similar laws, let me sum up the situation with this perhaps facetious and yet highly illustrative example. There is an old conundrum as to how to tell a mushroom from a frogstool. They say eat it and if it kills you it is a frogstool and if it does not it is a mushroom. That is largely the situation of the law now. You must go and try it. But that is not the way it should be. You ought to be able to find out whether it is a mushroom or a frogstool before you eat it, and that is all in the world this declaratory judgment law is. Some court, whether it is a constitutional question or whatever kind of a question it is, is going to decide it after the risk is taken. Why not let the same court try the same question before it is taken? I do not care what the question is, some court is going to have to decide it after the risk is taken. This simply permits the same court and the same parties to decide it before the risk is taken, which is wise. If it does not work out for the interests of the legal profession, it at least works out for the interests of the people, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] stated.

You have the same court, the same jurisdiction, the same procedure, the same parties, and the same questions. Under the present law you take a step in the dark and then turn on the light to see if you stepped into a hole. Under the declaratory law you turn on the light and then take the step.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I never like to oppose a bill unanimously reported by a committee and especially by the Judiciary Committee. I have such high respect for the gentlemen of that committee that I hesitate to oppose this bill. I have such high respect for the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] who prepared the report and who has spoken for the bill, that I hesitate to oppose it; but I have some misgivings about it, and now is the time to express them. I am going to take the liberty of doing so briefly. One can not, of course, discuss this bill in 5 or 10 minutes. It is a very important measure in my humble judgment. It changes and revolutionizes the procedure in the courts of the United States.

Section 1 of Article III of the Constitution provides that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time establish.

Section 2 of Article III defines the jurisdiction of the United States courts and provides as follows:

> The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States; between a State and citizens of another State; between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects.

Now, it will be noticed that the Constitution expressly limits the judicial power of the United States courts to "cases" and to "controversies" in the instances mentioned. I have not, of course, had the time to brief this question and inform myself, as I would like to be informed, of the construction placed by the United States courts upon the words "cases" and "controversies." I am sure that those terms have been repeatedly construed or interpreted by the courts. And my impression is that, in a general way, the terms "cases" and "controversies" mean circumstances in which a "cause of action" has actually arisen, or an offense has been actually committed. Or in other words, there must have been committed an actual violation of the United States laws or there must have arisen an actual "cause of action" in which a right recognized by the Constitution has been denied or withheld.

Applying the principle to the question that arises in connection with the validity of an act of Congress: The report of the committee states that the procedure proposed in this bill will be valuable in the determination of the validity of statutes. The uniform practice of the Supreme Court of the United States has been to refuse to pass upon the constitutionality of an act of Congress unless a right guaranteed by the Constitution has been denied. Parties can not bring to the United States courts a controversy involving the validity of an act of Congress unless it is alleged and shown that the act of Congress complained of has resulted in depriving one of the parties of some right to which he is entitled under the Constitution. Recently the State of Massachusetts brought proceedings in the United States Supreme Court alleging the invalidity of the act of Congress known as the maternity and child welfare act. The court dismissed the proceedings and refused to pass upon the constitutionality of the act, because a case was not presented in which any personal rights had been denied.

The courts have often refused to pass upon the validity of acts of Congress merely because their validity was controverted. They have been careful to refrain from holding an act of Congress unconstitutional, except where parties came before the court asserting a right which is was claimed the act of Congress deprived them of.

My judgment is that we do not have the right under the Constitution to enlarge upon the jurisdiction of the United States courts to any extent. That we can not broaden the meaning of the words "cases" and "controversies" beyond the meaning which those words have been given by the Supreme Court in adjudicated cases; and that if this act will extend the jurisdiction of the United States courts to cases or controversies where no right has been denied, where no cause of action has actually arisen, where no offense has already been committed, then this act will be invalid.

There are some who think it is desirable to confer this jurisdiction upon the United States courts to settle disputed questions of law or fact arising out of contracts, or the validity of statutes, or from other causes, before a cause of action has actually arisen or before any rights asserted have been actually denied or refused, or before any offense has been actually committed and the penalty incurred. Personally, I do not agree with that proposition. I doubt the wisdom of conferring such jurisdiction upon the United States courts. I fear it will increase litigation. Controversies will be raised to test the validity of every act of Congress almost. I doubt the wisdom of assigning to the courts the duty to advise prospective litigants of their rights arising under contracts or statutes or otherwise—work that is now performed by members of the bar.

But, even if it were desirable, I have a serious doubt of the right of Congress to enlarge upon the jurisdiction of the courts beyond the limits now fixed by the Constitution as construed in the adjudicated cases. If this act is passed, in my judgment, the courts will either construe the word "controversies" to mean just what they have heretofore held the term to mean as used in the Constitution, which would have the effect to nullify the law, or they would hold the act unconstitutional as an attempt to give the United States courts extra-constitutional jurisdiction.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. DENISON. In just a moment.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What do you do with rights asserted?

Mr. DENISON. A right asserted is not a "controversy" within the meaning of the Constitution.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How do the United States courts then issue injunctions to maintain the assertion of rights?

Mr. STOBBS. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. STOBBS. I call the gentleman's attention to the report of the American Bar Association in which they state that former Justice Hughes, who took part in the decision of the Muskrat case, which held there was a moot question and therefore the act was unconstitutional, as a member of the bar association after he resigned from the bench, stated that that decision was limited only to cases in which there was no actual controversy, and intimated that where there was an actual controversy, such as provided for in this bill, the Muskrat decision would not hold and the statute would be constitutional.

Mr. DENISON. Of course, any of us may be mistaken, and especially about a constitutional question, and I may be entirely wrong on this question. I hesitate to put my judgment up against the judgment of other men, like the members of the Judiciary Committee; I have not read the Muskrat case recently. But, in reply to the suggestion about the expression of an opinion by Judge Hughes after he left the bench, I might say that after Judge Hughes left the bench he came before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and delivered a very able prepared opinion in which he advised the committee that section 15a of the transportation act was unconstitutional. But the Supreme Court has since then held otherwise. As to the question asked me by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE], I might say that, in the exercise of their equity jurisdiction, the courts do grant an injunction in some cases, not to maintain an assertion of rights, but to prevent irreparable injury where a violation of rights is threatened. But that is an entirely different question and even in such cases where irreparable injury is threatened, that fact alone amounts to a denial of a right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

My DYER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois five additional minutes.

Mr. DENISON. I wish I had the time to discuss at some length the power of the United States courts to pass upon the constitutionality of acts of Congress and to hold such act unconstitutional and void. The history of that doctrine is very interesting. I only wish to say at this time that the right of the courts to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional is in my opinion clearly given by the Constitution, and it is now a well-settled part of the jurisprudence of this country. It often brings the courts under severe criticism by able lawyers and by prominent members of another legislative body. There are some who claim that the Constitution gives the courts no such power; others claim that the courts have abused the power. I think that the Supreme Court of the United States has wisely held that an act of Congress will not be adjudicated by the court, its constitutionality will not be passed upon, except where cases are presented in which rights under the Constitution have been denied by the act. And I think it would be a mistake for Congress to try by this legislation to enlarge upon that jurisdiction of the courts and extend their jurisdiction to these so-called "controversies," actual or otherwise, where no right has been actually denied or where jeopardy has not actually occurred by reason of an actual violation of the statute whose validity is questioned.

There is a great deal of dissatisfaction with the power of the United States courts under the jurisdiction they now have. There will be more in my judgment if we enlarge the jurisdiction by this proposed legislation. So-called actual controversies will be raised about almost every act we pass here. The courts will have additional work to do.

I do not, of course, know what the powers of the State legislatures are under their constitutions to confer such jurisdiction upon State courts and give them power to enter declaratory judgments; but I do have doubt as to the power of Congress to confer such jurisdiction upon the United States courts, and I have very serious doubt of the wisdom of doing so, even if we can do it. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to only to direct consideration to the point raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] who has just addressed the House.

Clearly the proceeding under this proposed legislation if it should ripen into law would be in a "case" within the meaning of the provisions of the Constitution, quoted by the gentleman [Mr. DENISON] from Illinois. The plaintiff would be there by a method and a procedure provided by law; the defendant would be there by a summons, and the issue would be joined, with reference to a substantial matter in actual controversy. The matter would be litigated and the judgment rendered, and the issues decided would become res judicata.

Clearly there is no attempt here—and it would be futile if there was—to expand the constitutional powers of the courts. If this bill becomes a law the powers of the court would not be broadened of course. If this bill becomes a law the courts would have no jurisdiction of persons or things over which they would not now have jurisdiction in an ordinary action.

The only thing this bill proposes is that the court within its constitutional jurisdiction may decide the matter in controversy prior to the time when the actual damage would have taken place; and then only in cases where if the damage had taken place the court would have jurisdiction.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I will.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Is the gentleman from Texas in favor of this legislation?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I am.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Does the gentleman think it would reduce litigation in courts?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The tendency would be to reduce litigation and reduce the liability of honest men to suffer loss and damage because of difference of opinion as to their respective rights. Let me give the gentleman this illustration: Suppose a man has a contract with another to build a house and there is an honest difference of opinion as to the material which the contract provided for. This bill, if it ripens into law, would make it possible for these two men to have that difference of opinion adjudicated before the house is built.

Mr. ABERNETHY. This bill does not take away the right to demand a jury trial?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The bill does not deprive anybody of his constitutional powers.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I will.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman recalls that we passed a child labor law prohibiting the transportation in interstate commerce of the products of any mine, factory, or mill in which children under certain ages were employed. Assuming that a man had a son under the age prohibited by the act, whom he wanted to let work in a factory, but he does not want to go ahead and put that boy to work for fear there might be a criminal prosecution. Under this bill, if it should become a law, before the parent put his boy to work, he could go into a United States court and ask the court for an adjudication of the validity of the child labor act, in order to determine whether he could safely ignore it. Is that not true?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. If this bill were a law and a man should ask me whether or not he could go into court under those circumstances, I would give it as my opinion the court would hold his a moot question, and would not grant him a decision.

Mr. DENISON. Suppose the man wants a construction of the child labor act in order to know whether the boy under 14 years of age can be employed in the factory?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. In my judgment, neither in its purpose or in its provisions, would this bill give or attempt to give jurisdiction in such a circumstance.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following additional amendment.

Page 2, line 22, strike out lines 22 and 23 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(4) The Supreme Court may adopt rules and regulations for carrying out the provisions of this section."

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Subparagraph (3) on page 2 of the bill provides for submitting questions of fact to a jury, as follows:

When a declaration of right or the granting of further relief based thereon shall involve the determination of issues of fact triable by a jury, such issues may be submitted to a jury in the form of interrogatory.

Did the committee take into consideration the advisability of providing that the parties to the pending action and witnesses might appear in person and testify, or did the committee think it was not necessary to make such provision?

Mr. DYER. The committee gave consideration to that, but we did not believe it was necessary to do that.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. This is new character of legislation. It is new at least so far as my State is concerned. It is a question whether you would have the right under existing law. Under existing law parties to any action or case pending have the right, of course, to appear in person and testify. Should you not make provision for this right in this new class of cases?

Mr. DYER. They can do that; but this is only to provide an additional way of furnishing testimony by interrogatory.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, it follows as a matter of course that the parties to a controversy involving facts will have to have testimony of witnesses, and the court would settle on the manner of bringing the witnesses into court without express authority of this statute.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. In reply to what the gentleman from North Carolina says, I respectfully submit you are creating here an entirely new form of litigation. There is no demand for it, so far as my State is concerned, or in any of the courts that I have ever heard of in the South. Being new legislation of this kind, would it not be advisable to give the judge express authority to have these witnesses appear in person and testify before a jury?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRAND] will permit, that as soon as you submit a question of fact to the jury, the judge will have every authority to determine that fact in the lawful manner. The judge will simply ask the jury to determine the question of fact. In the procedure that we now have and in any procedure relating to all matters of fact, evidence will have to be submitted, and the usual method of jury trial will be adhered to, which necessarily requires the presentation of evidence, oral and written.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. By witnesses as well as by parties?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Of course, by both.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. That is the law at present.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not think that we can set a law aside unless we do it positively and affirmatively, and it may not be constitutional to do this, if desirable.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ADDRESS OF HON. WILLIAM TYLER PAGE

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, last night—Tuesday, January 24, 1928—a very able address was delivered by the Clerk of the House, Mr. William Tyler Page, before the Kentucky Society, on the character and services of Senators and Representatives in the United States Congress from the State of Kentucky during the last 46 years. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing that address.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to-day granted me I herewith insert an eloquent and historical address delivered by Hon. William Tyler Page, Clerk of the House of Representatives, before the Kentucky Society at Washington, D. C., on January 24, 1928, commenting on the character and services of Senators and Members of Congress of Kentucky during his long services in various positions in the House of Representatives. It is instructive, entertaining, and worth the time of anyone to read.

Mr. Page's speech is as follows:

KENTUCKY IN THE CONGRESS DURING NEARLY A HALF CENTURY

On December 19 last I completed 46 years service in the House of Representatives as an employee and an officer.

During that time I knew more or less intimately the 106 Representatives and Senators sent to Congress by the State of Kentucky. Practically the Kentucky delegation in both Houses was the same in its personnel in the Forty-seventh Congress when I was a page boy at the Clerk's desk, as it had been in the two Congresses previously. Therefore it may be said that my contact with them extended over a period of a half century.

My earliest recollections are of John G. Carlisle, Senator Beck, Joe Blackburn, and Oscar Turner. This was before Carlisle became Speaker. Analyzing my thoughts of these four men I find that for different reasons I remember them particularly apart from the rest. In Carlisle's case it was his classic features; he might have been a Roman Senator; and he was kind to me. Beck was easily one of the most outstanding figures in a Senate of big men, and I recall distinctly the genuine sorrow which prevailed when he died. His body laid in state in the Senate marble room, the only such instance I have ever known, and his funeral, at which I was present, was largely attended.

Beck was popular and able. He was so human; everybody liked him. Hardly less prominent, popular, and able was Joseph Clay Stiles Blackburn, affectionately called "Joe" Blackburn. He and Beck were cronies. Blackburn was a magnificent orator. His manner was charming. He was democratic in all his ways. He appealed strongly to my boyish imagination, and I am not ashamed to say I loved him. Now, Oscar Turner was different, vastly different from the other three men. He was industrious but not so prominent. I suppose I remember him so distinctly because he was seldom out of his seat.

Each man had a desk in the House in those days, at which he did business, but they had no secretaries. Those were the early days of free seeds. Oscar Turner would sit at his desk day in and day out writing letters and addressing seed packages. On each side of him would be two large waste-paper baskets, one full of seeds, the other empty. The latter, when filled with addressed packages, would be carried off to the mail by a page and be quickly filled on its return. And so the process went on. In after years Oscar Turner's son came to Congress from Kentucky for one term.

Of the 106 Kentuckians in Congress during my time, 92 of them were born in Kentucky. They were wise in selecting their birthplace. I mention this fact because I know of another prominent State which in 50 years did not send a native of that State to Congress; but it was not as old as Kentucky in statehood, which may account for it.

Nine other States and one foreign country furnished Kentucky's other Representatives. Senator Beck was born in Scotland. Each of the States of Ohio, Louisiana, Alabama, Pennsylvania, Iowa, Indiana, and Rhode Island furnished one, and North Carolina, Virginia, and Tennessee each furnished two.

Of course, it is natural to suppose that Congress, being a lawmaking body, should be composed chiefly of lawyers, men who by profession and practice know how to make law. It is not surprising, therefore, that of the 106 Representatives from Kentucky I have known 91 of them were lawyers. Lord Macaulay once said: "Just as a physician understands medicine better than an ordinary man, just as a shoemaker makes shoes better than an ordinary man, so a person whose life is passed in transacting affairs of state becomes a better statesman than an ordinary man." Kentucky seems to have subscribed to this principle by sending a preponderance of lawyers to make laws. Of the other 15, not lawyers, 6 were farmers, 2 manufacturers, 3 physicians, 1 editor, 1 financier, 1 business man, and 1 private secretary.

In a half century Kentucky sent 16 men to the United States Senate, 8 of whom, one-half, had previous service in the House of Representatives. They were Williams, Beck, Blackburn, Carlisle, Lindsay, Deboe, McCreary, Paynter, Bradley, Beckham, James, Martin, Stanley, Ernst, and the present Senators, SACKETT and BARKLEY, the latter whose brilliant service in the House has made him a potential favorite son for the Presidency. Senator Martin's service was of brief duration—one short session, following the death of Senator James—until the mantle fell on Beckham. I met Senator Martin, a courtly gentleman, during his short-lived service, and he impressed me as embodying the fine traditions of Kentucky.

Three of my predecessors as Clerk of the House were Kentuckians; my friend, South Trimble, and George M. Adams, and Thomas Dougherty, Tom Pettit, of Owensboro, a fine reading clerk; and Nat Crutchfield, of Louisville, journal clerk and parliamentarian, were my good friends.

During my boyhood days around the House there were many veterans of the Civil War, and there were grim reminders of that unhappy strife in empty sleeves, wooden legs, and crutches. Kentucky's quota of such veterans on both sides furnished a striking illustration of her position as a border State. Of brigadier generals, colonels, and majors, there was a large crop, prominent among them being Senator Williams, who was a colonel; Frank Wolford, a general; and William J. Stone, bearing mute evidence with one leg, a colonel.

I have mentioned that I was a page boy at the Clerk's desk in the House. This was a point of vantage in one respect, but of disadvantage upon a certain memorable occasion when Mr. Carlisle was Speaker.

The carpenter had made a little hectagonal seat, which fitted into the Speaker's rostrum, which brought the top of my tousled head within a few inches of where the Speaker rapped his gavel.

Mr. Carlisle kept splendid order in the House without much pounding of the gavel, but now and then the House would become turbulent and run over him, so to speak. On one such occasion Speaker Carlisle, having exhausted his own great stock of patience, rapped his gavel with unusual force and severity and called for order in his loudest tones. Now, it so happened that on his desk was a handsome silver inkstand—which I think is still in use—containing two glass wells full of ink. The Speaker could hardly be heard above the din on the floor, and in the excitement the gavel with a mighty whack missed its accustomed spot and landed on the end of that fine inkstand, turning it completely over and emptying both wells of their black fluid all over me. I was dressed in a suit of the old-fashioned seersucker of white and blue stripes. When that ink struck me I looked more like a zebra than a boy. The ink matted my hair, ran down my face, and all over my clothes. The House roared with laughter as I made a hurried exit to the nearest washstand; but the tension was broken, and the House soon was restored to order and good humor. Later in the day I met Speaker Carlisle in the lobby. He took me by the hand and said, "My boy, I am very sorry that thing happened," and as he withdrew his hand he left a $10 bill in mine. I thanked him and said, "Mr. Speaker, you may do that every day if you want to." The seersucker suit only cost $2.50 plus my mother's work on it, and it was washable.

John G. Carlisle was one of the fairest Speakers the House ever had. Both sides recognized his fairness and ability; only his own party associates thought he sometimes went out of his way to be fair. He was presented with a magnificent silver service by the Republicans. It is thought by some that Carlisle was the best parliamentarian among Speakers prior to his time, not even excepting Jefferson. His decisions, embodying sound parliamentary principles, still live in the practice of the House. As a Senator and as Secretary of the Treasury he was a fine type of statesman. But for his efforts to maintain the gold reserve in the Treasury there might have been a dreadful financial panic during the days of the free-silver agitation.

One day nearly 37 years ago, while sitting in one of the rooms now occupied by the Committee on Appropriations, I heard a pistol shot ring out, and, among others, ran in the direction from which it came and found William P. Taulbee lying at the foot of the steps near the House restaurant mortally wounded. He was taken to Providence Hospital, where he died. Taulbee had just completed two terms in the House from Kentucky. The man who shot him was acquitted on the ground of self-defense. Senators Beck and Blackburn were of his counsel, and I think Phil Thompson was, too.

During the Speakership of Carlisle there was a Kentuckian, a Republican, named John D. White. His political enemies referred to him facetiously as "Johnnie Jump-up." He was on his feet constantly. White was a legislative thorn in the side of the Speaker. He was personally offensive and would constantly harrass Mr. Carlisle, who was always courtly toward him. The House would grow very impatient with White, but to no avail.

Col. William C. P. Breckinridge, with his snow-white hair and beard and ruddy complexion would have been picturesque in any assembly. He was not a constructive statesman, as were some other Kentuckians, being of the oratorical type. He was truly silver-tongued and would often charm the House by the words that tripped lightly from his lips. His friendly repartee with the scholarly John D. Long, of Massachusetts, in which each vied with the other in throwing verbal bouquets at their respective States of Kentucky and Massachusetts, was a classic.

When it came to the retort courteous, Breckenridge had few equals. Jehu Baker, of Illinois, a diamond in the rough and a blunt hammer-and-tongs speaker, essayed a colloquy with Breckenridge, who handled Baker as a cat would toy with a mouse. When Baker saw he was no match for Breckenridge in the latter's use of polite language he exclaimed impatiently, to the delight of the House, "Oh, the language of the gentleman from Kentucky is fit only for a lady's boudoir."

Jim McKenzie, who was afterwards minister to Peru, was one of the witty and humorous Members of the House. As a boy I listened with rapt attention to his speech on the tariff, which fairly bristled with quips and shafts aimed at his Republican colleagues. I doubt not that it was that speech that caused Cleveland later on to draft McKenzie for the Diplomatic Service.

Speaking of the Diplomatic Service reminds me that Albert S. Willis, whom I knew very well, was sent by Cleveland to Hawaii, where he died while holding the position of the first American minister to the islands. When in the House, Mr. Willis became the first chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and those were "pork-barrel" days. He was a much belabored gentleman. Asher Caruth, a very delightful man, from Louisville as was Willis, was a prominent and able House Member and forceful speaker.

I must not forget to mention Proctor Knott, who became your governor after leaving Congress. No better lawyer, public speaker, or genial gentleman ever graced the Halls of Congress. It seems to me he typified the best traditions of Kentucky. As a lawyer there were few better. His reports as chairman of the Judiciary Committee are quoted to-day. As a witness in a Federal court recently I had occasion to quote one of them, which established a practice in the House which still obtains.

Who can think of Proctor Knott without thinking of the noble steed which bore his name, winner of many contests of the turf? And of Tom Ochiltree, the red-headed Congressman from Texas, whose name is also immortalized in turf history. In those days the old Ivy City race track flourished. It was just outside the city limits, on the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, and near Baltimore was the Pimlico track, famous for races between Parole, Ten Broeck, Proctor Knott, Tom Ochiltree, and other famous horses. When these tracks had meets it was customary for Congress to adjourn early or else a quorum of each House could be found only at Ivy City or Pimlico.

And there you were sure to see Proctor Knott himself, Joe Blackburn, Jim Beck, Phil Thompson, and many Kentucky colonels.

And in the evening these gallant sons of Kentucky might be found around the National and Metropolitan Hotels, in Washington, or at Barnum's old hotel in Baltimore, where the jockeys hung out. Any other custom at such a time would have been regarded as sacrilege. To those who might criticize, I have only to say, "O tempora, O mores."

My friends, Kentucky has furnished so many great men, so many interesting characters, so much intellect and statesmanship in the nearly half century it has been my privilege to have come in contact with them on the hill that I might go on indefinitely and recall incidents and things concerning them. But, as they say in the House, "Here the gavel fell," and, like some men there when their time expires, I will continue just long enough to mention by name Governor McCreery, dignified and erudite; Paynter, handsome and able; Dr. Godfrey Hunter, physician and stormy petrel; Judge Evans; Col. Arthur Berry; Ollie James, the intrepid giant; Colonel Bradley; the fiery Stanley; and Lindsay and Deboe; and Sherley, the skillful parliamentarian and all-around debator and able lawyer; and the present able delegation, including the daughter of a former House Member from North Carolina, herself a splendid type of womanhood, of wife, and of mother, and a credit to the sturdy mountaineer constituency which sent her here. To-day she delivered her maiden speech in the House, where she and her Kentucky colleagues had a field day.

Kentucky, great among American Commonwealths, thou hast given bountifully of thy best and finest sons in the Nation's service in the Halls of Congress. My life has been enriched by personal contact with them, and I am grateful.

REFUNDING OF CERTAIN LEGACY TAXES

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 7224) to extend the time for the refunding of certain legacy taxes, erroneously collected, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE], the author of the bill, may proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, my interest in this legislation was excited during the last Congress by learning that my immediate predecessor from my district, Mr. McGillicuddy, whom many of you remember, had made a report to the House on legislation involving one of the phases of this subject. My conviction that the legislation is just became fixed by reading the hearings held during the last Congress before the Committee on the Judiciary. I think in my 10 years of service in this House there has been no case where it has seemed to me the rights of citizens have been so buffeted about, where citizens have been so made the victims of circumstances, of dubious legislation, of illegal decisions by an executive department of the Government, and by delayed court decisions as those now asking relief at your hands.

The legislation is technical in the extreme. An explanation of it requires a somewhat detailed statement.

War with Spain was declared in April, 1898. The Spanish War revenue act, so called, became a law on June 13, 1898. The twenty-ninth section of this revenue act imposed certain taxes on legacies and on distributive shares. Reductions in these war taxes were made by an act approved March 2, 1901, but it was not until April 12, 1902, that these taxes were generally repealed, the repeal to take effect July 1, 1902. Following this repealing act there was passed what is known as the refunding act of June 27, 1902. This act in its third section provided that in all cases where an executor, administrator, or trustee had paid or should hereafter pay any tax upon any legacy or distributive share of personal property under the terms of the 1898 tax act the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to refund so much of said tax as was collected on contingent beneficial interests which were not vested in possession or enjoyment prior to July 1, 1902. This section 3 then went on to prohibit the assessment thereafter of any tax under the 1898 act upon any contingent beneficial interest which had not become absolutely vested in possession or enjoyment prior to July 1, 1902.

Shortly after this refunding act was passed various Treasury decisions appeared bearing upon the questions which give rise to this legislation. In a decision dated July 15, 1902, the Treasury held that when the decedent died prior to July 1, 1902, and the distributive shares or legacies absolutely bequeathed were not distributed on or before the date named on account of the time required by State laws to settle estates or on account of litigation, such legacies and distributive shares were subject to tax. A later decision by the department stated that the tax attached to the vested interest in personal property passing under the will of any person who died prior to July 1, 1902, and since June 13, 1898, though the actual possession of that interest by the trustees or beneficiaries was postponed to July 1, 1902, or later, and again in October, 1903, the commissioner held that all such interests vested prior to July 1, 1902, were taxable, although not vested in actual possession or enjoyment prior to that date.

These rulings were manifestly in disregard of the refunding act. They applied only to technical contingent interests which can arise only under a will, while the refunding act itself applied in terms to cases of intestacy as well as to those arising under wills. The rulings of the Treasury, therefore, as to a substantial body of cases rendered the refunding act and the plain purpose and intent of the Congress utterly null and void.

The intention of Congress as expressed in this act was thus overriden by the Treasury. And until 1915 those who might have believed themselves entitled to a refund of taxes under the terms of the act faced specific decisions of the Treasury authorities, denying the possibilities of relief.

In 1912 Congress passed "An act extending the time for the repayment of certain war-revenue taxes erroneously collected." This act provided that claims must be presented for the refunding of such erroneously collected taxes on or before the 1st day of January, 1914. It was a matter of doubt whether this act reached the class of cases in which we are now concerned.

This was the situation which confronted these claimants from the passage of the original legislation up to 1915. In 1915 the Supreme Court of the United States, in the two decisions referred to in this bill, completely reversed the Treasury decisions, already alluded to, and which had stood through the years as a bar to these claimants. The court in these two decisions, in substance, held that this 1902 refunding act dealt with legacies and distributive shares upon the same plane, treating them both as contingent interests until they became absolutely vested in possession or enjoyment, and it directed that the taxes collected upon contingent interests not so vested prior to July 1, 1902, should be refunded, and it forbade any further enforcement of the tax as respects interests remaining contingent up to that date. This, it will be seen, completely overrode the decisions of the Treasury Department made in 1902 and 1903, and before referred to by me. It would have entitled these claimants to prosecute their claims for refund had it not been for the legislation of 1912 fixing January 1, 1914, as the limit of time upon all claims. The claimants found themselves in the unfortunate position of having claims legally accruing to them in 1902, but denied by Treasury decisions, and finally established by decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in 1915, outlawed by the act of Congress in 1912. In other words, their original legal rights arising under the 1902 legislation were not affirmed by the Supreme Court until after the claims had been outlawed by the 1912 legislation. It is important also to note that it was not until 1919 that it became definitely fixed by a decision of the Supreme Court, rendered that year, that this act of 1912, limiting the time for filing claims to January 1, 1914, applied to this particular class of claim.

Following the decision of the Supreme Court in 1915, the claims, or most of them here dealt with, were presented to the Treasury. It was then believed the act of 1912 did not apply to them, but that their validity was established by this 1915 Supreme Court decision. It was not until 1919 that the act of 1912 was held definitely to apply.

Since 1919, when it was held finally that the claims were outlawed, these claimants have been diligent in seeking redress. They constitute only about 5 per cent in number of the entire body of claims submitted. Their claims aggregate not to exceed, so it is estimated, $100,000. Legislation recognizing the justice of their contention has been before the Congress on several occasions. I think three bills have passed the Senate and at least two of the committees of the House have favorably reported upon the legislation. No original right is created. The legislation aims only to reestablish the rights which Congress conferred by its refunding act of 1902, rights denied these claimants by a narrow and unwarranted construction of the law by the Treasury Department through all the years to 1915. No reason resting in good conscience can be advanced against the pending proposal to afford a long-delayed opportunity to present these claims for adjudication under a correct understanding of the law.

Mr. LAGUARDIA rose.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York yield for a moment?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague [Mr. HUDSPETH] be allowed to revise the remarks he made yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that in the interest of orderly procedure the bill should be read, and then gentlemen can be recognized under the five-minute rule. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That claims for the refunding of any legacy taxes erroneously or illegally assessed or collected under the provisions of section 29 of the act of Congress approved June 13, 1898 (37 Stat. L. p. 240), may be presented to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue not later than six months after the passage of this act; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized and directed to receive, consider, and determine, in accordance with law but without regard to any statute of limitations, such claims as may have been presented heretofore and not allowed and such claims as may be presented within the period above named, where and when and only when it be found and determined that such taxes were collected upon the erroneous interpretation of the law passed upon and condemned by the United States Supreme Court in decisions rendered in the case of United States against Jones, administrator, and in the case of McCoach, collector, against Pratt, both reported in the Two hundred and thirty-sixth United States Reports.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to such claimants as have presented or shall hereafter so present their claims, any amounts allowed in the determination of any claims so defined and which shall have been presented in accordance with this act.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Page 2, line 11, after the word "Reports," insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no interest shall be allowed on any of these claims."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the entire paragraph. I regret exceedingly that I can not go along on this bill with the rest of my committee. I believe I am the only dissenting vote on this committee.

This matter now is 13 years old, extending beyond the time the statute of limitations fixed by the Congress of the United States expired. It refers to the act of 1898. As I understand the situation, the parties seeking relief by this bill were in actual litigation at the time Congress fixed the two-year period of limitation in which claims could be filed for refund of taxes paid under the original act.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Some were and some were not. Some were awaiting the decision of the Supreme Court, which then established their right.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There was no law preventing these people from discontinuing the action then pending and making their claim for refund.

Mr. DYER. There was a Treasury decision to the effect that they would not consider these claims.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. And therefore they did not know what their status was until the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman entirely overlooks the fact that in 1912 Congress passed an act which was held to apply to all claims for refund under the act of June 2, 1902. That was the very purpose of the act of 1912.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. The Supreme Court decision determining their rights in the matter was not rendered until 1915, a year after the time for filing their claims had elapsed.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But the parties in litigation, if they had asserted their rights under the act of 1912, would have been entitled to a refund.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. But it was the construction of everyone at that time that that act should not apply. That question was litigated, and it was not until 1919 that there was any affirmative decision that the act of 1915 covered these cases. It was perfectly obvious that it was never intended to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The Congress passed the act of 1912. You had two years' time to file your claims and get a refund of any claims under the act of 1902.

Why did not these people discontinue their action and make their claims? Oh, no; they continued in the court, and when, in 1915, they were beaten, then they came and played the baby act, and now, 13 years afterwards, we are asked to pass a new act which will result in tearing down the statute of limitations fixed by Congress, so that these applications may be filed.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. The gentleman said they were beaten by the 1915 act. That is where he is in error, because it was the 1915 act which established the soundness of their contentions. They were not beaten.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. The gentleman means the suit in the Supreme Court in 1915?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes; I should have said decisions instead of act.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I stand corrected on that; but in 1912 Congress gave to all these taxpayers the right to file their claims and obtain refunds, and I can not understand what more Congress could have given to them.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. But then the question comes in that the Internal Revenue Department had absolutely ruled that they would not consider these cases.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But they considered 95 per cent of them, and 95 per cent were paid.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. But some of them did not file their claims until they were apprised of their rights by the Supreme Court decision.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But these claimants were entitled to the same rights that the others had. It is just a question of policy. The act of 1912 grew out of the war of 1898, and imagine what is going to happen if 30 years from now we throw open the doors and permit taxpayers who paid taxes since 1917 to come in and obtain refunds.

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BOX. Is it not true that these claims, or a part of them, have been before the House Claims Committee?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; and there was a favorable report.

Mr. BOX. But the committee was divided, if its report was favorable.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I did not know that.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BOX. In connection with what the gentleman says about claims coming in hereafter, let me say that there have been claims, before the Claims Committee, during the recent Congress, and probably there are some now, growing out of taxes levied during the Civil War. There ought to be a time when people having these claims should present them within a reasonable time.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. With the general proposition advanced by the gentleman I am in quite complete accord; but when citizens have been jeopardized by erroneous and illegal rulings of the Treasury Department, the Government of the United States, and the Congress of the United States, ought to be the last to take advantage of such a situation.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does not the gentleman from Maine put it too strongly?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. No; I do not think so.

Mr. BOX. However, a citizen is charged with a reasonable knowledge of the law and is required to act upon the law as it is.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. As I said, I think the gentleman from Maine states it too strongly.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. No; I really endeavored to restrain myself in explaining the situation.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think the gentleman is overemphasizing the situation.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to such claimants as have presented or shall hereafter so present their claims, any amounts allowed in the determination of any claims so defined and which shall have been presented in accordance with this act.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I did not withdraw my amendment. Did the Speaker put it to a vote?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thought the gentleman's amendment was a pro forma amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; it was not a pro forma amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withdraw his amendment?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Beginning on page 1, line 3, strike out section 1.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, the second paragraph of the bill has been read.

The SPEAKER. The reading of the bill has been completed.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. We are proceeding in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and I think some debate may be had on the second section.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois for five minutes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, ordinarily I would oppose this bill. The Committee on Ways and Means, of which I have the honor to be a member, has applications and requests before it all the time for the waiving of the statute of limitations. In passing, I will say that this bill should have gone to the Committee on Ways and Means. It is a revenue bill beyond any question, as it relates to the collection of taxes. Congress waived the statute of limitations in behalf of these claimants in 1912, when it gave an opportunity——

Mr. WHITE of Maine (interposing). There was no statute of limitations in the original act, so the 1912 act was not the waiving of a statute of limitation.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman is right about that.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. What was the effect of the act of 1912?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. The effect of that act was to write a statute of limitations. It was not to waive a statute, but it was to create a statute of limitations.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If we had not opened the doors by previous legislation on this subject so that approximately 95 per cent of this class of claimants have already been able to secure payment, I would now be opposing this bill, but I am differentiating it from other like legislation for that reason. The Congress itself opened the doors under which the balance of these claims have been paid, and I think we may well, therefore, place the remaining claims upon a somewhat different ground than the large number of claims which are constantly coming before us in which we are importuned to waive or set aside the statute of limitation.

By the act of June 27, 1902, Congress specifically authorized the refund of certain taxes collected under the Spanish War revenue act of June 13, 1898, on contingent beneficial interests in estates of decedents which would not become vested in possession or enjoyment before July 1, 1902. Thereafter the Congress, by the act of June 27, 1912, further authorized refunds of this character to be paid up to, but not beyond, January 1, 1914. In the meantime, the Treasury Department by internal revenue decisions limited the effect of the remedial legislation to an extent and in a manner that was disapproved by the United States Supreme Court in 1915. It is to relieve claimants from the loss of rights under that action of the Treasury Department that the legislation now before us is proposed. I think this case is easily distinguished from many other cases where we are importuned to waive statutes of limitations.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DYER a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BOARD OF VISITORS TO THE NAVAL ACADEMY

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the appointment of the following members of the Board of Visitors to the Naval Academy: Mr. GEORGE P. DARROW, Pennsylvania; Mrs. FLORENCE P. KAHN, California; Mr. GEORGE R. STOBBS, Massachusetts; Mr. HATTON W. SUMNERS, Texas; and Mr. PARKER CORNING, New York.

AMENDMENT OF SECTION 1025 OF THE REVISED STATUTES OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 9785) to amend section 1025 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1025 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 1025. No indictment found and presented by a grand jury in any district or other court of the United States shall be deemed insufficient, nor shall the trial, judgment, or other proceeding thereon be affected, by reason of any defect or imperfection in matter of form only, which shall not tend to the prejudice of the defendant, or by reason of the attendance before the grand jury of one or more clerks or stenographers employed to assist the district attorney or other counsel for the Government in a clerical capacity, who shall, in that connection, be deemed to be persons acting for and on behalf of the United States in an official capacity and function."

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 1, after the word "jury" insert the words "during the taking of testimony."

Page 2, line 2, after the word "employed" insert the words "in a clerical capacity."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DYER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CORRECTING THE ACCOUNT BETWEEN THE STATE OF NEW YORK AND THE UNITED STATES

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 59) directing the Comptroller General of the United States to correct an error made in the adjustment of the account between the State of New York and the United States, adjusted under the authority contained in the act of February 24, 1905 (33 Stat. L. 777), and appropriated for in the deficiency act of February 27, 1906.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Whereas the act of Congress approved February 24, 1905 (33 Stat. L. 777), provided for the adjustment of certain claims of the States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Delaware; and

Whereas an adjustment was made by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department of the account of the State of New York, and the amount found due said State was reported to Congress for an appropriation and appropriated for in the deficiency appropriation act of February 27, 1906 (34 Stat. L. 29); and

Whereas the Comptroller General of the United States, in response to Senate Resolution No. 378, reported to the Senate on February 16, 1923 (see S. Doc. No. 304, 67th Cong., 4th sess.), that the State of New York had failed to receive the correct application of the rule of settlement prescribed by the act of February 24, 1905, in the manner applied to the accounts of the States of Pennsylvania and Delaware, cobeneficiaries under the act of February 24, 1905; and

Whereas the Comptroller General of the United States, upon an application by the State of New York for a review and a correction of the error made in the adjustment of said account, has held that he is without authority to revise and correct a settlement of an account where, subsequent to an award by the accounting officers, Congress appropriates the amount found due in payment of such award: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to reopen and adjust the claim of the State of New York.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SWEET] may have 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, this bill is verbatim with one that passed the House last year. The bill as it passed here was amended in the Senate to include the State of North Carolina, but before the bill was returned to the House in its amended form the Senator concluded he desired to withdraw his amendment. On account of the filibuster then in progress in the Senate he failed to get recognition, and on the eve of adjournment of Congress by an agreement the bill was returned to the House in its amended form, the amendments nonconcurred in, conferees appointed, and by the conference committee the amendment was stricken out, returned to the House in its original form, and repassed both in the House and in the Senate, signed by the clerk, and just prior to the hour of 12 o'clock, with the clerk of the Senate, we were on our way to the President's chamber when the bell struck, and we were just behind the wire.

So the bill is reintroduced this year, as I have stated, in the identical form of the bill of last year, and I ask that it may have your favorable consideration. If there are any questions that anyone desires to ask as to the provisions of the measure, I would be pleased to attempt to answer them.

Mr. HOCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. I yield.

Mr. HOCH. Not upon the merits of the bill, because I have not made any inquiries about that, but upon the wording of this resolution, may I suggest that it sets out a number of whereases which under the better practice go out before a resolution is passed, and then it provides:

That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to reopen and adjust the claim of the State of New York.

This is all that would be left of the resolution. What claim of New York? Certainly, in the operative part of this resolution there should be language which would identify what you are trying to do here.

Mr. SWEET. The provision referred to by the gentleman was debated on the floor of the House last year. It was explained by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee that the phraseology of the bill was considered and passed upon by the committee as meeting all the requirements.

Mr. HOCH. Does the gentleman think it meets the requirements?

Mr. SWEET. I think so.

Mr. HOCH. The resolution says:

That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to reopen and adjust the claim of the State of New York.

In my view that does not mean anything at all.

Mr. SWEET. The claim of the State of New York is one growing out of the War of 1812, and its adjustment was authorized by the act of February 24, 1905, at which time the States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Delaware were in the same situation.

Mr. HOCH. The gentleman is referring to the claim set out in the whereases, but the legislation does not identify any particular claim. It simply says "shall reopen and adjust the claim of the State of New York."

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Members will recall that I made this point a year ago, and we had some discussion about it then. I think the point of the gentleman from Kansas is well taken, but if the resolution is passed with the whereases the meaning will be clear.

Mr. HOCH. But, even in that case, it would not be specific. You ought, at least, to say "said claim," but you merely say "the claim." From a legal standpoint and from the standpoint of the proper drafting of a measure it is not sufficient.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. The resolution refers to the preceding part.

Mr. HOCH. Does the gentleman think that if we strike out the whereases the operative part of the resolution is sufficient?

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. I do not think the whereases should be stricken out.

Mr. HOCH. The gentleman knows that the legislative intent must be clearly expressed in the resolution, and the operative language in this resolution means nothing.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. The entire resolution is clear.

Mr. HOCH. If the Judiciary Committee thinks that is a satisfactory way of drafting a resolution I am greatly surprised.

Mr. DYER. I think the objection of the gentleman from Kansas would be met, as I understand him, by substituting the word "said" for the word "the" in the final line of the bill. In other words that makes it certain that the claim intended is the claim described in the recital preceding the enacting clause.

Mr. HOCH. I think that would improve it, and yet I still say that the operative language in a resolution ought to carry the legislative intent and not depend on the whereases.

Mr. DEMPSEY. If the gentleman will yield, why not insert "the above described claim"?

Mr. HOCH. It is not good legislative practice to include the whereases.

Mr. SWEET. I would say that this claim is absolutely identified, because it is the only claim that New York has pertaining to the War of 1812.

Mr. DYER. I will say to the gentleman that it is quite correct that whereases are not the best way to present matters to the attention of the House in a bill, but in this case the gentleman from New York who prepared the bill states the facts, so that the resolution which is all that the House is concerned about is at the bottom, in five lines of the bill. That is all we are called upon to pass on, and there is a simple statement of what it is all about. I quite agree with the gentleman from Kansas that the whereases are not good form.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The title to the resolution is:

Joint resolution directing the Comptroller General of the United States to correct an error made in the adjustment of the account between the State of New York and the United States, adjusted under the authority contained in the act of February 24, 1905 (33 Stat. L. 777), and appropriated for in the deficiency act of February 27, 1906.

That is a complete statement and a sufficient reference to the legislation in question to identify the claim. On the general subject of the propriety of including the whereases in legislation I agree with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH].

Mr. DOWELL. Why can not this language be put into the body of the resolution?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It would be better.

Mr. DOWELL. Why not adopt that in the body of the resolution?

Mr. SWEET. It is possible that the language suggested by the gentleman would have been an improvement on the phraseology of the bill, but it was considered at the time the bill was drawn that the claim was sufficiently identified and therefore the measure was drafted as it is.

Mr. DOWELL. Why does not the gentleman offer an amendment so that we may pass a resolution that will be identical with the title?

Mr. DYER. I suggest that in line 5 on the second page after the word "the" we put in the word "said."

Mr. DOWELL. Oh, I think that would not fix it at all, because this should be construed from the body of the resolution itself.

Mr. DYER. I shall offer an amendment to correct that.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. I am in sympathy with the gentleman from New York who is asking Congress to reopen this case before the Comptroller General so that New York may collect a just debt incurred during the War of 1812, but I say to this House that Nevada has been trying to collect a similar debt since 1865 which was incurred in keeping open transcontinental lines, both pony express and mail routes, and it was for that purpose that the money was expended by the State of Nevada—a very poor State, compared with the great State of New York. I hope the gentleman from New York will be sympathetic to my cause when I bring it before the House for consideration.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman is quite in error as to the similarity of the two cases. This is not an effort to adjust in its original form a claim of the State of New York, but this is an authorization for a reopening to correct an error.

Mr. ARENTZ. The Nevada case is on all fours in that respect. The Comptroller General does not see fit at the present time to make a decision which is just and equitable, possibly not on legal grounds, but on moral grounds, for the payment of a just debt.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. ENGLAND], may now proceed for 10 minutes and address the House out of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ENGLAND. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, a short time prior to our entrance in the World War the Government started the construction of the naval ordnance plant at South Charleston, W. Va., for the purpose of manufacturing armor plate.

It was contended by the Government, so I am advised, that armor plate could be manufactured much cheaper than it could be purchased in the open market. During the war period construction work was rushed with greater rapidity in order to secure an early completion. At the close of the war the plant was incomplete; however, the work was continued with considerable activity until approximately three years after the signing of the armistice, at which time further construction was wholly abandoned.

I understand that the proposed purpose of this plant was to manufacture heavy armor plate, to be used in the construction of large war vessels; that no armor plate of this character is now being used by the Government, and under our treaties with other nations, can not be used inasmuch as we are prohibited under the provisions thereof from building any more large war vessels at this time, and that this condition is likely to continue indefinitely.

This plant is located in one of the greatest industrial sections in the world; the people there purchased the land at a cost of several hundred thousands of dollars and donated same to the Government with the belief and understanding that they were procuring a great manufacturing establishment which would add much to the prosperity of the Great Kanawha Valley. Their belief, hopes, and expectations in this respect failed to materialize. This plant is being maintained at a large expense to the taxpeyers, who might under the present policy be justified in criticizing the management thereof as economically unsound. It occurs to me that if this plant is not to be completed and operated for the purpose for which it was constructed, it should be sold or leased to some manufacturing concern, so that a fair return might be realized on the investment. If leased, and the Government at some future time might desire to resume and operate said plant, the matter of returning possession and all matters relating to the use of same could be taken care of by proper stipulations in the lease.

I introduced House Joint Resolution 160, asking that the Secretary of the Navy be required to furnish Congress the following information relative to said plant:

First. The actual cost of the plant.

Second. The annual cost of maintenance, including number of officers and men employed.

Third. The amount and cost of armor plate purchased annually by the Government, and whether or not same can be purchased in open market cheaper than manufactured at said plant.

Fourth. The advisability of opening and operating said plant within the near future, or the selling or leasing thereof to some manufacturing concern so that a fair return may be realized on the investment.

Fifth. Any other information that would tend to shed light on the operation, sale, or leasing of said plant.

I failed, however, to incorporate in this resolution inquiries pertaining to the projectile plant located at South Charleston, which plant was constructed in conjunction with said naval ordnance plant; it is my purpose to have an amendment offered to this resolution so as to include the projectile plant in the resolution.

I do not want to be understood by the introduction of this resolution or by these brief remarks as criticizing the administration. I have unbounded faith in the honesty, integrity, ability, fidelity to official duty, and administrative wisdom of President Calvin Coolidge and his entire official family.

So far as I know, the Secretary of the Navy has never been asked to furnish the information called for in this resolution, which I believe the people are entitled to know. I feel that he will have no hesitancy in furnishing Congress with the same. These plants were not created as a war measure, but provided for before our entry into the World War. I am advised that the cost of the construction of said plants amounted to approximately $70,000,000. I doubt if it could be argued with much force that it would be a good policy to retain said plants as an emergency in the event of future hostilities between this and any other country, in view of the rapid development of aviation. I feel that our greatest activities should be in the development of aeronautics, and I venture the prediction that within the next decade commercial aviation will be developed far beyond our most sanguine expectations.

If the great naval building program recommended by the Secretary of the Navy is given sanction by Congress, and the retention of this plant is necessary for manufacture of armor plate to be used in the construction of these vessels, then this would be a satisfactory solution of the problem. I am informed, however, that the heavy armor plate which would be manufactured at this plant would not be used in the construction of the smaller vessels recommended in said Navy building program.

In my judgment these plants will never be a governmental war necessity; they are not being used in times of peace, and it would seem that the best business policy would be to either resume their operation or make some disposition of same. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment to the resolution, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DYER: Page 2, line 5, after the words "New York," insert a comma and the following: "Growing out of an error in the adjustment of the account between the State of New York and the United States, adjusted under the authority contained in the act of February 24, 1905 (33 Stat. L. 777), and appropriated for in the deficiency act of February 27, 1906.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to strike out the whereases.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

SERVICE OF ALBERT CARL GRUBE

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by placing therein some letters which I have received from the Navy Department in connection with the services of Mr. Grube, who has done some work in connection with the salvage of the S–51 and the S–4.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, it has been our privilege often on the floor of this House to honor fellow citizens who have rendered exceptional service to the country in time of war. Without lessening in any way our tribute to these men, it is well that we recognize also such services in time of peace, when the need is often as great and the courage and self-sacrifice demanded as outstanding. Such an occasion was furnished by the recent disaster on the submarine S–4 and the earlier one on the S–51. The work of salvaging was fraught with unspeakable hardship and danger and called for utter self-forgetfulness and courage on the part of those whose duty held them there and those others who volunteered their services.

Among these volunteers was a young man who is a resident of my congressional district, to whom I wish to call your attention especially to-day, as one who rendered heroic and patriotic service in this emergency. Although a private citizen at the time, he responded without a moment's hesitation to the special call of the Navy and was sworn in for this especially dangerous piece of work.

Albert Carl Grube was born in Pittsford, N. Y., a few miles from Rochester. On his father's side he was of German descent and on his mother's side of Irish descent. His grandfather was a soldier in the Civil War, serving throughout the entire war and being captured and confined in Libby Prison for nine months. After a common-school education, Albert C. Grube joined the Navy in March, 1924, having served a minority cruise. He was a diver on the U. S. S. S–51 and rendered conspicuous service at the time of the disaster on that ship, which called forth a citation from his commanding officer. When he heard that the S–4 had been sunk, in his own words, he "sent a message to Commander Ellsberg offering my services as diver." Before an answer had been received, the Navy had sent out an appeal for the services he so willingly offered, and he was immediately ordered to Portsmouth to take up his duties in the perilous work of raising the submarine.

When I learned of this unusual patriotic service I communicated with the Secretary of the Navy and received from him, and also from Mr. Grube's immediate commanding officers, communications setting forth the official record of Mr. Grube's services in connection with the salvaging of the S–51 and the S–4. These communications I hold in my hand and will insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

This record will be read, I am sure, with great interest, and I trust will be a source of inspiration to the youth of America.

Subject: Commendation.

1. The officer in charge salvage operations U. S. S. S–51 has brought to the attention of the department the valuable services rendered by you in connection with salvage operations on the U. S. S. S–51.

2. While you had had no previous experience in deep-sea diving, after completing a training course at the navy yard, New York, you were employed, when operations were resumed, as a diver on the U. S. S. S–51, and proved yourself equal to any of the deep-sea men who had been diving for 10 years or more. Your commanding officer reports that you were the youngest diver employed, being only 19 years of age, but regardless of this fact you displayed courage and skill at all times. On one occasion when it was necessary to send a diver inside the S–51 through the engine room to enter the central operating compartment and clear a hose—none of the men who were acquainted with the inside of the boat were available on this occasion, nor was the U. S. S. S–50, which was always used as a model for rehearsals present on this day—you, after being given a description of what to expect inside the boat, entered through the engine-room hatch, went forward through water so black that it was impossible to see to the central operating compartment door, passed through it and cleared the hose inside. You came out and returned to the surface, having accomplished the whole job in the brief space of about five minutes.

3. It is a pleasure to the department to receive such reports, and in further recognition of your services in connection with the salvaging of the U. S. S. S–51, your commanding officer has been directed to advance you to the rating of torpedoman, third class.

CURTIS D. WILBUR.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF NAVIGATION,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN JACOBSTEIN: In reference to your telephonic conversation with the bureau in regard to the naval service of Albert Carl Grube, ex-torpedoman, third class, United States Navy, the records of the bureau show that he enlisted March 31, 1924, as apprentice seaman at the Navy recruiting station, Buffalo, N. Y., for minority until May 5, 1927. He gave date and place of birth as May 5, 1906, at Pittsford, N. Y., and next of kin, mother, Mrs. Elizabeth Drummond, 42 Grover Street, Rochester, N. Y. He was transferred to the Naval Training Station, Newport, R. I. Rating changed June 1, 1924, to seaman, second class. Transferred June 23, 1924, to the U. S. S. Raleigh. On July 29, 1925, he was transferred to the Naval Torpedo School, Newport, R. I., for a course of instruction. Transferred December 23, 1925, to the U. S. S. Falcon for training in deep-water diving during the winter maneuvers, and for further duty in connection with the salvaging of the S–51. Transferred March 8, 1926, to the U. S. S. Camden for further transfer to the receiving ship at New York. Received at the receiving ship at New York March 19, 1926. Transferred April 23, 1926, to the U. S. S. Falcon. Rating changed June 6, 1926, to seaman, first class. He was commended on July 13, 1926, by his commanding officer and the officer in charge of the salvaging operations of the U. S. S. S–51 for excellent services performed as diver. He was engaged in diving during the period of spring operations April 26, 1926, to July 7, 1926. On August 6, 1926, he was advanced to the rating of torpedoman, third class, in recognition of services as deep-sea diver. He was honorably discharged May 4, 1927, as torpedoman, third class, from the U. S. S. Falcon on account of expiration of enlistment.

Grube offered his services in connection with the salvaging of the U. S. S. S–4 and was enrolled in the Naval Reserve as torpedoman, third class, and issued orders to proceed to Provincetown, Mass., by the commandant of the third naval district at New York, N. Y.

The bureau has wired Lieut. Stanley A. Jones, officer in charge, Navy recruiting station at Buffalo, N. Y., for a copy of his commendation, and upon its receipt will be forwarded to you.

Inclosed herewith are letters of commendation to Grube from the Secretary of the Navy, commanding office of the U. S. S. Falcon, and Capt. E. J. King, United States Navy, who was officer in charge salvage operations U. S. S. S–51.

Yours very truly, R. H. LEIGH.

From: The Commanding Officer.
To: The officer in charge salvage operations, U. S. S. S–51.
Subject: Grube, Albert Carl, S. 1c., 233–84–00.

1. The commanding officer desires to call attention to the valuable services of Albert C. Grube, seaman first-class, in connection with the salvage operations on the S–51. Grube was the youngest diver employed, being only 19 years of age. Without previous diving experience he was given a training course in diving at the navy yard, New York, last winter, after which he was employed when operations were resumed in April, as a diver on the S–51. While his previous deep-sea experience was nothing, Grube very shortly showed himself the equal of any of the deep-sea men who had been diving for 10 years or more. His courage, as well as his skill, were well exemplified. On one occasion, when it was necessary to send a diver inside the S–51 through the engine room to enter the central operating compartment and clear a hose (none of the men who were acquainted with the inside of the boat were available on this occasion, nor was the U. S. S. S–51, which was always used as the model for rehearsals, present on this day), Grube, after being given a description of what to expect inside the boat, entered through the engine-room hatch, went forward through water so black that it was impossible to see to the central operating compartment door, passed through it and cleared the hose inside. He came out and returned to the surface, having accomplished the whole job in the brief space of about five minutes.

2. Grube's other work was of a character comparable with this, and it is recommended that, as a partial reward for his services as a diver on this job, he be promoted to the rating of torpedoman, third class, for which rating it is felt he is well qualified, as he was a member of the seaman gunners' class at Newport, when he was taken away for training as a diver.

1. The above report and recommendation of the commanding officer, U. S. S. Falcon, regarding Albert C. Grube, seaman first class, United States Navy, have been seen and strongly concurred in by the salvage officer, Lieut. Commander Edward Elisberg, (CC) United States Navy, who has direct personal knowledge of Grube's work.

2. The report and recommendation in the above case of Grube are heartily approved. The work of the younger divers like Grube demonstrates that the Navy has a new generation of capable divers growing up to take the places of the older divers of whom so many are passing into the Fleet Reserve.

THE CIVIL-SERVICE EXAMINATION FOR PROHIBITION AGENTS

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of civil-service examinations.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, the wholesale flunking by the prohibition force of the examinations offered by the Civil Service Commission has struck confusion in the "dry" ranks. The poor showing made by the prohibition snoopers is indicative of their ignorance. More than three-fourths of them taking the tests failed dismally. Small wonder that prohibition enforcement has been a stench in the nostrils of good citizenry. Ignorance is the handmaiden of other crimes. That is why they retain gunmen and crooks in the service.

Senator BROOKHART'S bill to retain or congeal in the service these crass, stolid, and venal agents is unthinkable. At last civil service will let in the light and bring some intelligent men into the work.

Heywood Broun, in the Morning World, says:

The prohibition agents who flunked their examinations ought to be reinstated. In this matter I line up with the drys. Plenty of good people flunk. Examinations should not be overemphasized. And perhaps the civil-service officials took the snoopers at a disadvantage when they came to write their papers. Maybe they placed them on the honor system.

However, if there is to be another examination, I suggest the following questions:

What is the best way to satisfy an itching palm?
How many times may you "shake down" a bootlegger?
What kind of a bird is a stool pigeon?
How ridiculous is the fourth amendment?
Is "sacredness of the home" as extinct as the dodo?
What is cheating cheaters?
Should local police be permitted to interfere with your game of graft?
Are "Tom and Jerry" good fellows?
Is an oyster cocktail lawful?
Is a "punch" permitted?
Is "sherry cobbler" a shoemaker?
Is "rummy" a good game?
May one sing "Drink to me only with thine eyes"?
Is cotton gin as good as Gordon gin?
Should a prohibition agent whine when a hijacker double crosses him?
Can you buy a nightcap in the 5 and 10?
Is the silver flask a "badge of society"?
How much may one take for "thy stomach's sake"?
Why does money talk in a "speak-easy"?
May one have a "stick" in a golf bag?
How near is "near beer"?

CONCERNING ACTIONS FOR PERSONAL INJURY AGAINST UNITED STATES IN NATIONAL PARKS, ETC.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SNELL). The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

"(d) The clerk of the court for the western district shall maintain an office in charge of himself or a deputy at Texarkana, Fort Smith, El Dorado, and Harrison. Such offices shall be kept open at all times for the transaction of the business of the court."

SEC. 2. This act does not repeal or amend the remainder of section 71 of the Judicial Code as it applies to the eastern district of Arkansas.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on the Judiciary does not have any further bills to call up.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 9022. An act to authorize the town of Alderson, W. Va., to maintain a public highway upon the premises occupied by the Federal Industrial Institution for Women at Alderson, W. Va.

SUBMARINE SALVAGE PROCEDURE OF COMMANDER ELLSBERG

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein recommendations made by Commander Ellsberg relative to the raising of the S–51.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein recommendations made by Commander Ellsberg relative to the raising of the S–51. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I submit recommendations of Commander Edward Ellsberg, forwarded to the Navy Department by Admiral Plunkett October 5, 1925. These recommendations are the result of Commander Ellsberg's salvage operations. (See Navy Department Technical Bulletin No. 2–27.)

These recommendations have never been made public. No reference has been made to them in the many hearings and reports on both the S–51 and S–4. In fact, I am informed that the Navy Department, when called to produce them soon after the S–4 catastrophe, said it had no record of them. They probably had been pigeonholed.

Apparently, no action had been taken upon Ellsberg's report and recommendations. Neither Admiral Hughes nor Secretary Wilbur said one word about these Ellsberg recommendations for salvaging the next sunken submarine and the saving of lives of men in the ship, although at Provincetown both were given copies.

These conclusions and suggestions are highly important, and since the Navy Department has failed to publish them, I take the opportunity to do so.

Although Ellsberg's suggestions were disregarded, he, nevertheless, volunteered to reenter the Navy from private life for rescue and salvage work on the S–4.

I particularly call attention to his uncanny prophecy in recommendation 21 and his suggestion for avoiding criticism of the Navy. Note that Admiral Plunkett sensed, also, 21's importance:

From: The salvage officer, U. S. S. S–51.
To: The Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair.
Via: The Commandant, Navy Yard, New York, N. Y.
Subject: Standard method of salvaging submarines.

1. Based on personal experience in salvaging the S–51, and on consideration of other salvage work on submarines (particularly the S–5, which salvage job resulted in failure), it is believed possible to adopt a standard method of salvaging submarines which will be available in all waters in which divers can work and which will produce quick results.

2. For this purpose two things are required—properly designed pontoons and properly fitted submarine boats.

3. As regards the pontoons, the salvage officer has previously set forth the requirements of a proper design (commandant's letter SS162/L11–1(N–1), August 31, 1926) and the Bureau of Construction and Repair has authorized the necessary work on six pontoons. For completing the equipment minor additions must be provided on the submarine themselves.

4. The problem is in two parts—rescue work and salvage work.

5. Any submarine which sinks, whether due to collision or loss of control by the crew, may have part of the crew alive inside for some days as on the S–5 and the O–5. The presence of life in the boat is bound to be accompanied by the presence of some buoyant compartments. In this case, if one end of the boat can be quickly raised, life can be saved; when that is done the salvage problem requires only the lifting of the other end. Here to get a quick lift on one end, it is not necessary to provide so great a lift as when the boat is completely flooded.

6. If the boat is completely flooded, much more buoyancy is required, but as compared to the rescue problem there is less need for haste.

7. Promptly to raise a sunken submarine boat from the open sea (which is the worst case) the use of proper pontoons and properly equipped submarines are necessary. Pontoons offer the best lifting method as the strain on each lifting cable is limited to the pull of half a pontoon; the use of surface vessels or barges with lines to the submarine is dangerous in the sea where the motion of the surface ship will result in overloading certain of the lifting lines as the surface vessel pitches and rolls—this will part the lines one at a time and in succession.

8. Early submarines had lifting eyes at each end, which eyes were eliminated as submarines grew beyond a certain size. It would appear that this point was reached when submarines grew beyond 200 tons dead weight as at this weight, two large cranes could just about lift the boat, and pads and eyes to stand 100 tons lift each would be about the limit that could be provided. Above 200 tons lifting eyes would take too much weight and in addition, two large derricks (the most that could normally work) would be unable to lift the boat.

9. With the use of pontoons as a lifting method, eyes can once more be provided on all submarines without excessive weight per boat or unduly heavy fittings. Considering pontoons of the size used on S–51, the maximum load per eye (and per hawse pipe in pontoon) is 40 tons. A steel eye to take this lift safely with the necessary pad for riveting to the shell will weigh about 200 pounds. It can easily be secured to the shell of existing submarines, whether single or double hull, in way of any frame or bulkhead without additional stiffening inside the boat.

10. A series of such eyes should be riveted to the shell at the maximum beam on each side, or slightly above it, spaced about 16 feet between each pair of eyes (the same as the distance between hawse pipes on the pontoons), a pair of steel eyes for each 40 feet of length of boat (the length of a pontoon, 32 feet plus 8 feet for pontoon clearance).

11. The lifting eyes, as provided above, would always be immediately accessible to divers. A submarine on sinking will always lay over on one bilge or the other, giving her a heavy list, but no case is known of a boat being rolled completely on her side when first located. Regardless of the heel, the lifting eyes on both sides would be clear of the bottom, clear of all superstructure obstructions, and ready for use. A couple of rungs should be riveted to the shell in way of each eye to give the diver something to stand on while working.

12. The salvage procedure would be as follows:

(a) The sunken submarine being located, the pontoons are brought to the scene by towing. They can be lightered to near-by sheltered water and there put overboard by a derrick.

(b) A diver goes down and secures a light guide line to the first eye or a rung near it. A length of 2½-inch chain about 40 feet long, with a special shackle to suit the eye and a lanyard about 3 feet above the shackle, is lowered on the guide line to the diver, who secures the lanyard to a rung when the chain reaches him, and the slack chain is then lowered to the bottom, where the chain is no longer affected by the heave of the salvage ship. The diver has only a few links and the shackle to handle in shackling to the eye, and it is possible to so design the eye and the shackle as to make the job practically automatic. (A design to make the shackling wholly automatic is possible, and such a device is used by the Japanese on their salvage ship, but it is believed that automatic functioning is improbable in practice, as the submarine will always have a list, which will make automatic engaging a matter of chance; furthermore, in practical cases there is the heave of the salvage ship which prevents keeping the guide line taut and vertical and further complicates automatic engagement.) With a properly designed rig, however, a diver can quickly engage a chain, and then move on to the next one.

(c) All chains may be secured first, or pontoons may be lowered as each pair of chains are secured.

(d) With a pair of chains in place, the ends of the chains are held up by wire lines to the surface. On these two lines, as guides, a pontoon is lowered by the standard method, as used on the S–51; if weather is good, the pontoon is held in its position above the submarine while the divers insert the locking bars through the chains showing above the pontoon hawse pipes. The pontoon is then blown down enough to give it positive buoyancy; the lowering lines to the pontoons and the wire lines to the chains are let go. That pontoon is then in position and all ready for lifting operations.

(e) If the weather is not good enough for divers to work on the suspended pontoon, the pontoon is lowered all the way to the bottom, where the divers put the locking bars in the chains and cast loose all the lines. The pontoon can be easily lifted into position by giving it positive buoyancy in both ends. As each end is independently anchored to the submarine, the pontoon is bound to finish floating horizontally exactly in position; the extreme difficulty in leveling off pontoons on the S–51 is wholly avoided; on the S–51, when one end of a pontoon floated up (they always rose one end first) it dragged the slack chain through from under the boat, and getting a pair of pontoons to float horizontally and both at the same height was troublesome, long drawn out, and to some degree dangerous.

13. With the method above, securing the pontoons is simple and quick; with the pontoons redesigned as recommended, lowering pontoons becomes safe and speedy.

14. Using the old pontoons and chains under the submarine, the Falcon was able to lower and secure a pair of pontoons in eight hours. With proper pontoons and the submarine fitted with lifting eyes for chains, this time can be much improved. Given the diving crew that a salvage ship should have aboard at all times, the salvage ship could certainly secure three pairs of pontoons in the first 24 hours after arrival. If life and buoyancy exist in that half of the boat, it can be raised with such an external lift (480 tons).

15. There is wholly eliminated the need for the longest drawn out and most trying diving operation—that of washing tunnels under the imbedded submarine in order to pass cradle chains under her. The danger and difficulty of this operation in deep water can not be overestimated.

16. As a salvage method where life does not exist and the boat is completely flooded (and also probably damaged), lifting with pontoons solely is the quickest and the cheapest method. Sealing up the undamaged part of the boat is dangerous to the divers, slow in execution, and uncertain in result. The work necessary will be far beyond what is reasonably anticipated.

17. The problem with pontoons becomes solely a question of providing the necessary pontoons and enough eyes for attaching them.

18. With any S boat or earlier submarine, a pair of pontoons for each 40 feet of length will provide 160 tons of lift for each 40-foot section, 960 tons for the whole boat, and is adequate for the job. The six pairs of pontoons can be put on in from 2 to 3 days, and the lift made. As practically all our submarines come in this category, complete salvage insurance requires only the fittings on the boats and a few more pontoons.

19. For larger boats, such as the V class, two solutions are possible. Larger pontoons might be built, which also means heavier fittings and more difficulty in handling pontoons; or the 80-ton pontoons could be secured four abreast in certain portions of the length, still using a separate pair of eyes for each pontoon. The eyes for the inboard pontoons could be attached closer to the fore and aft center line. In this case the outboard pontoon should be secured first and left on the bottom while the inboard pontoon was being lowered, secured, and made buoyant enough to float. After that the outboard pontoon should be floated up. The chains to both pontoons would take something of an angle, but it would come within working limits. This method has the advantage of using the same size pontoons for all boats.

20. It is strongly recommended that all submarine boats in commission be fitted immediately with lifting eyes and that a complete set of pontoons (12 80-ton pontoons) sufficient to lift any S class or earlier boat be assembled at an Atlantic port and at a Pacific port.

21. The exact date of sinking of the next submarine can not, of course, be foretold, but, based on past performances, it can be expected within the next three years. It is desirable that when it occurs there be available such means for quick salvage that no possible criticism can be made of the Navy on the ground of unpreparedness.

22. While this report deals with material only, the problems of a properly trained salvage ship and a sufficient number of trained deep-sea divers must not be forgotten.

23. Aside from the straight salvage problem with pontoons, certain changes in the internal fittings of submarines are necessary for the greater safety of the crew, in case of an accident, and for the easier salvage of the ship if in any individual case it is found necessary to seal up an undamaged compartment.

24. The most important requirement along this line is to fit all hatches and ventilation valves with such locking gear (accessible to a diver) as will make these hatches and valves capable of tightness against an internal excess pressure of at least 30 pounds. The locking gear must not give way at pressures up to the test pressure of the boat, but moderate leakage at excess pressures greater than 30 pounds will not be dangerous while the boat is rising. The locking gear on the S–51 valves and hatches was so weak that bad leakage started at an excess internal pressure of only 2 to 4 pounds, causing extreme difficulty in sealing up.

25. All hatches and all doors should be of such size that a diver can pass through without endangering his life. Conditions in this respect were bad on the S–51. It is noted that on the V–1 and the V–2, conditions are even worse as regards access through hatches and interior doors, and the salvage work on these V boats, if divers must work inside, will be hazardous in the extreme.

26. While the crew of the S–4 had a brief interval in which they succeeded in closing some valves in the engineroom, they were unable to close and dog any of the swinging doors. It is believed that if these doors had been of the long-arm type, all doors in the undamaged part of the ship would have been closed and perhaps half of the crew saved, as the stern would have remained buoyant and the men therein could have lived for some time, certainly long enough for a stern lift with proper equipment.

27. Submarine boats are now of sufficient size and subdivision to warrant the installation of a long-arm door system, in new boats at any rate.

28. In conclusion, it is urged that the necessary steps be taken to provide and keep in readiness the material and the divers who are required for deep-sea salvage work; that all existing submarines be fitted with lifting eyes; and that in future submarine designs the features mentioned above as essential for safety and salvage be incorporated in the design.

EDWARD ELLSBERG.

HON. WILLIAM T. COSGRAVE—RECESS

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce to the House that we are honored to-day by having in the Capitol the Hon. William T. Cosgrave, President of the Executive Council of the Irish Free State. We hope to have him come on the floor and meet the Members of the House. In order that this may be done, I ask unanimous consent that the House stand in recess, subject to the call of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that for the reason stated the House shall stand in recess, subject to the call of the Chair. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House stands recessed, subject to the call of the Chair.

Thereupon (at 2 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess.

DURING THE RECESS

At 3 o'clock p. m. the Speaker returned to the rostrum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair requests the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER,] the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] to act as a committee to escort into the House Chamber the President of the Executive Council of the Irish Free State.

At 3 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m., preceded by the Sergeant at Arms and Doorkeeper of the House, Hon. William T. Cosgrave, President of the Executive Council of the Irish Free State, was escorted into the House Chamber by the committee appointed for that purpose, and was presented to the Speaker by Mr. TILSON.

The SPEAKER. Gentlewomen and gentlemen, it is my pleasure and distinguished honor to present to you America's right welcome guest, the President of the Executive Council of the Irish Free State. [Applause.] The President will be delighted to meet all the Members of the House.

Mr. Cosgrave then took a position in front of the Speaker's rostrum, and the Members of the House were individually presented to him by Mr. TILSON.

At 3 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m., Mr. Cosgrave and his escort retired, amid the applause of the Members of the House.

AFTER THE RECESS

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following communication, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Speaker, as the first head of an independent Irish Government to visit the United States of America, it is my great privilege to convey to the people of America, through their elected Representatives, a message of gratitude and good will from the people of Ireland. Benjamin Franklin, in 1771, told the Irish people, through the members of the Parliament of the Kingdom of Ireland, that America's weight would be thrown into their scale in order that Irish and American liberty might be achieved. His promise has been nobly fulfilled. American ideas of liberty and democracy have permeated the minds of men everywhere. Tyrannies and alien governments have disappeared under their influence. Ireland's freedom has been obtained not merely by American advocacy of noble principles, but by the intense, devoted, and constant support of the American people for the application of these principles to the Irish nation.

I come to thank the American people for the part they have played in the achievement of our liberty and I bear to them through their elected representatives a message of good will and brotherly affection from the Irish people. May God make this great Nation prosper and may He watch over and perpetuate the bonds of blood and friendship which unite our two peoples.

WILLIAM T. COSGRAVE.

DEATH OF ADMIRAL VICTOR BLUE

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, a few days ago Admiral Victor Blue, one of the most gallant officers of our country, died. He was born in North Carolina, but when he was 3 years of age his parents moved to Marion, S. C. The history of his public career has been one of honor and credit to our State, and nothing that I could say would be more appropriate than an editorial which appeared in the State, a newspaper published in Columbia, S. C. I ask that the editorial may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Columbia (S. C.) State, January 24, 1928]

VICTOR BLUE, KNIGHT OF THE SEAS

Never a more gallant fighter ever rode into battle or drove his craft into the midst of sea fray, or bared his breast to terrors that fly by night or beset the jungle paths of life than Victor Blue. He faced, in his career of battle and daring, every shape of terror and of death. And he faced all as if it were but part of the morning pageantry or deepening twilights. He was entirely unafraid.

It was not that he was brave, merely. Most soldiers are brave—merely. That is a portion of their day's work, a routine of duty. Victor Blue drew in such daring and gallantry as lightly as his breath. He did not seem to be aware, the spirit in his breast did not flame, until he was called upon by instinct or exigency or the cry of need and suffering to pass beyond these bounds of military courage, and be the knight errant, the champion of a lost cause or one in frightful jeopardy.

When Nelson signaled for his brave seamen to advance at Trafalgar he threw to the breeze the famous call: "England expects every man to do his duty." And that was not necessary, beyond the mere routine of sounding the trumpet flare for the onset. We wisely and highly reward heroes for doing deeds that are outside of and beyond the line of course and duty.

It was always in this region of daring that Victor Blue lived and fought. It is certain that it was in this region of rare heroism and fortitude and calm that Victor Blue died. We don't think of him as captain, commander, admiral, but as Victor Blue, fighter.

All that his spirit needed was to know or to feel "the power of the night, the press of the storm, the post of the foe." And there fell before his advancing soul all barriers of alarm and frustration. He seemed to feel or to be saying softly to himself, "I was ever a fighter, so one fight more—the best and the last."

When the American fleet, moving in one of its missions without stain and for the redemption of a stricken people, arrived before Santiago de Cuba it was not known definitely whether or not the brave Admiral Cervera was inside the well-sheltered harbor with his small but powerfully equipped and swift squadron. If he lay there, his thunders leashed, we could securely disembark the land forces that were to march on Santiago and break the backbone of the Spanish occupation. If he and his little fleet were still outside, and free to strike, it would be unsafe to act until the Caribbean could be cleared of the terrible swift cruisers. It was therefore essential to know.

Victor Blue volunteered to get this essential fact. He had himself put ashore in the darkness of night and the jungle. He then squirmed his way through the jungles, in and out of the enemy's lines, fetching a compass about the city our guns covered, spied Cervera's fleet at anchor in the quiet bay, and brought to the waiting admirals and generals the tidings upon which depended the final victory by sea and land, the prompt liberation of Cuba. It was a brilliant, as well as a desperately courageous act.

But it was typical of Victor Blue, merely one of a many such brilliants. His own country, slow to recognize and still slower to reward great merit—it withheld its recognition of the brave captain that carried "the message to Garcia" for twenty-odd years—a generation of heroes could have passed into the silent land, and the nations of gallant men throughout the earth hastened to shower decorations and honors upon Victor Blue. For gallantry beyond the line of and limit of duty wherever duty summoned him, in Asiatic waters, and amid the mines and volcanoes of the North Sea, "for extraordinary heroism" * * * "for exceptionally meritorious service."

It is said that only the inspiriting sea as the fierce South has the power to confer this rare and extravagant sort of heroism. Very likely it is the old spirit of the vikings and the sea conquerors whom the Roman poet declared must have had their hearts bound in triple brass.

How we may honor fitly such a heart of vibrant steel and burning gold! It is impossible. We are dumb in its presence, even in the presence of its death.

It is pleasing to feel that Victor Blue, after the fitful fever of his restless spirit fell so swiftly and contentedly upon sleep. Like the splendid soul that Browning burns his incense before in "Prospice," Victor Blue would have hated "that death bandaged his eyes, and forebode and bade him creep past."

> No! Let me taste the whole of it, fare like my peers,
> The heroes of old,
> Bear the brunt, in a minute pay glad life's arrears.

Victor Blue died as he lived and fought, with a courage equal to meet every thrust of fate, to confront every terror that rides the winds of death—superior to and lord of the inexorable hour.

CHARLES EDWIN HIGHTOWER—IMPROVEMENT OF POSTAL SERVICE

Mr. TRAMMELL submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 121), which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads:

Whereas Charles Edwin Hightower, of Tampa, Fla., has prepared a list of suggestions for the improvement of the United States Postal Service; and

Whereas it is claimed by the said Charles Edwin Hightower that to have said suggestions installed would bring about a greater degree of efficiency and also operate for economy in the United States Postal Service; and

Whereas it is alleged that certain of his said suggestions heretofore submitted to the United States Post Office Department have been adopted by the department and that he has not been compensated therefor by the Government: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be, and it is hereby, directed to investigate the merits of the said suggestions made by the said Charles Edwin Hightower for the improvement of the United States Postal Service with a view to determining whether or not the same or any number thereof should be adopted and Mr. Hightower compensated therefor; be it further

Resolved, That the said committee ascertain whether or not the Post Office Department has in operation any suggestions made by the said Charles Edwin Hightower for which, in justice, he should be compensated by the Government and, if so, what compensation would be reasonable for Mr. Hightower for the services rendered by him to the Government.

THE MERCHANT MARINE

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 744) to further develop an American merchant marine, to assure its permanence in the transportation of the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. EDGE obtained the floor.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. EDGE. For what purpose?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I desire to offer a resolution.

Mr. EDGE. I have taken the floor for the purpose of discussing the unfinished business very briefly, for 5 or 10 minutes. I would prefer to proceed.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Very well.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, at the session yesterday I presented an amendment to section 2 of the pending unfinished business—the shipping act.

The bill now provides that it shall require a unanimous vote of the entire board—seven members—in order to dispose of any of the ships. My amendment reduces this requirement to a majority.

Mr. JONES. The Senator means a majority of the entire membership of the board, of course?

Mr. EDGE. I mean a majority of the entire membership of the board of seven which, in other words, would mean the affirmative vote of four members of the board. In fact, the amendment which I have offered to the committee amendment specifies the word "four," striking out the words "unanimous vote" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "vote of four members."

Mr. President, it appeals to me very strongly that unless we are prepared to practically irrevocably commit ourselves to the policy of Government ownership and administration of the merchant marine, we must confer this authority to sell ships in order that it would be, from a business standpoint, possible to sell them. To my mind it is beyond understanding to contend that it would ever be possible for the Government to get out of Government ownership and administration of the merchant marine if the bill as presented here becomes a law, requiring the unanimous vote of seven members of the board to make possible the sale of any of the Government fleet.

We must consider, when we analyze the statement I have made, the complexion of the board. I do not mean from the standpoint of personnel, but from the standpoint of sections of the country. Under the law members of the board must be appointed representing the Atlantic section, the Pacific section, the Lakes section, and the Gulf section. In the ordinary course of considering propositions made to the board for the purchase of ships, it can not be avoided that sectional interests and argument will naturally become more or less involved in the proffers for lines on the Pacific, or lines on the Atlantic, or lines in the Gulf, or lines in the Great Lakes section. When one adds to that the fact that all seven members, whether from the Atlantic or the Pacific, or either of the other sections, must vote "yea" or we can not sell a spar or a sail, I can not see how anyone can contend that the passage of the pending bill as it is now before the Senate does not absolutely assure continued governmental ownership and administration.

I will call attention to the very frank statements of the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], whose absolutely unselfish interest in the perpetuation and maintenance of a merchant marine, of course, is not questioned in the slightest degree by any Senator, whatever may be his view or thought as to policy.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the chairman of the Commerce Committee, representing the majority of the committee made this statement yesterday:

> Some may contend that this commits Congress to permanent Government ownership. I do not think so myself. I think that that, of course, will be determined by Congress; but this does put us on the basis of Government ownership until Congress shall affirmatively declare the time has come for us to put these ships into private hands.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. EDGE. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I am not favorable to Government ownership, but in our present situation unless we do maintain the existing status until Congress determines a different policy, what course would the Senator from New Jersey pursue? We have no alternative proposition presented.

Mr. EDGE. I am very glad to endeavor to answer the Senator's query. It is a pertinent one. Following the frank admission of the Senator from Washington, it is my judgment if this bill becomes a law this policy will continue unless and until Congress shall by a future act decide that the merchant marine owned and controlled by the Government should be disposed of. As I view the action of Congress in the past—and I see no reason why we should consider it will be different in the future—once it is definitely decided, as the chairman of the committee admits it will be by the passage of this bill without amendment, that we are going to operate a Government merchant marine, then it is my view we shall wait for a long time before Congress will ever pass any act to change that policy. I say that for many reasons. Once such a governmental department as this is installed with all of its powers and machinery, with all the tremendous appropriations that are placed at its disposal, even though it is recognized, as it is recognized to-day, that Government operation is more expensive than private operation—and I am not going into the figures to demonstrate that fact, for I think that is generally admitted—it is almost impossible ever to change the policy under which it operates. In my judgment it will be impossible from a practical standpoint ever to transfer the merchant marine to private hands. In the meantime we shall have practically, if not entirely, destroyed every private interest that has been and is operating ships on all the seas of the world. We shall naturally destroy them, because competition with a Government operated and Government maintained activity we always know is a type of competition that can not be met by private interests with no Uncle Sam to meet the deficits sure to result.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Assuming, as I do, that the statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce on yesterday or the day before was correct, that there is but one privately owned American ship operating across the Atlantic between this country and Europe, the destruction of private interests to which the Senator has called attention would be confined at least to that one ship, would it not?

Mr. EDGE. The Senator from Nebraska means as to that particular service?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. EDGE. I assume it would be; and no doubt the statement of the chairman was correct; but, of course, there is not any question in the world but that we have hundreds of other privately owned American ships being operated in other sections and in other parts of the world.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Government did not go into the field where those ships were operating, it would not interfere with them, would it?

Mr. EDGE. Surely, if we pass this bill, it would, unless the Government should not go into that field.

Mr. NORRIS. What is going to happen if we do not pass the bill?

Mr. EDGE. If the Senator will give me an opportunity, I shall try to demonstrate.

I am not opposing the building up and maintenance of the merchant marine, but I am opposing the policy proposed which will practically prevent the board acting when it thinks it is time to dispose of the merchant marine. I am perfectly ready to do my part in voting liberal appropriations. There is not anything in the amendment that I am offering that will in any way in this particular change the policy of the bill championed by the Senator from Washington which is now before the Senate. My amendment in no way changes the policy of providing liberal appropriations or entering upon a building program; it in no way changes the sentiment so well expressed by the Senator from Washington, that it is up to the Government to provide adequate appropriations, for the Government must expend large sums if we are ever going to have a real merchant marine. I am, however, opposed to the method proposed as to the disposition of ships, because I think it shuts the door to any disposition, and to that feature alone my remarks are now directed.

Mr. BORAH. Congress could dispose of the ships, of course.

Mr. EDGE. I have already so stated.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to say, before the Senator proceeds, that I do not want to cast a vote here which would commit me permanently to the policy of Government ownership and operation; but the thing which it is difficult for me to determine, with my limited knowledge of the subject, is what other program have we as a practical proposition, considering the exigency which now exists and the plan which is outlined in the bill?

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I shall again try to make that as clear as I am able to make it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Senator does that, may I make one suggestion? As I understood the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the conclusion would be reached by many that, as a matter of fact, we have only one privately owned American ship engaged in the foreign trade.

Mr. EDGE. I corrected that statement, or at least attempted to do so.

Mr. KING. We have more than 2,000,000 tons of shipping engaged in foreign commerce.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not wish to convey that idea. I referred to the statement of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] that we only have one American-owned ship operating between this country and Europe.

Mr. JONES. I referred to continental Europe.

Mr. BORAH. I want to ask the Senator from New Jersey or the Senator from Washington whether the statement which I read a day or two ago is correct that last year we carried $14,000,000,000 worth of goods in the deep-sea trade.

Mr. EDGE. I will yield to the Senator from Washington to answer the question.

Mr. JONES. I do not know the exact figures, but outside of tankers and special ships owned and operated by companies for the purpose of carrying their own peculiar products, we are transporting now under the American flag something less than 30 per cent of our imports and exports.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to say a word, I think the statement referred to by the Senator from Idaho—and I saw the statement—included coast to coast cargoes, which, of course, would, in a sense, be deep-ocean trade.

Mr. BORAH. It was designated as deep-sea trade, which was said to amount to $19,000,000,000, of which $14,000,000,000 was carried under the American flag.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. EDGE. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. I should like to say in reply to the suggestion made by the Senator from Idaho that in 1926 between north and south Atlantic ports and Europe 1,969,000 tons of freight were carried in combination cargo and passenger ships, and only 4 per cent of that was carried in American ships.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, as apparently it is not clearly understood, I repeat that my amendment would not in any way interfere or alter the program of replacement or maintenance as provided by this bill. My amendment, as the reading of it must clearly indicate, is entirely devoted to the control of the actual disposition of the ships after we have built them, after we have operated them, and while we are maintaining them.

I think I am almost in entire agreement, if not in entire agreement, with the Senator from Washington as to the absolute necessity of the Government spending money and spending some at once in order to replace obsolete ships and build up a merchant marine. We have a construction provision in existing law which has been taken advantage of to a limited extent, but I believe almost exclusively for the coastwise trade.

Mr. JONES. By the coastwise and intercoastal trade.

Mr. EDGE. And very little of it for the overseas trade. Therefore I have reached the same conclusion, I believe, in that connection that the chairman of the committee and, as I understand, a majority of the committee have reached, that we have arrived at a time when we must spend a great deal of money if we are going to build up for the benefit of American producers a real merchant marine. I am prepared to support most of that part of the committee's program. My amendment, I repeat, is simply to afford us at least some businesslike assurance that after we spend this money and the taxpayers pay the deficit that some day we can dispose of the ships. Let me say that the taxpayers may just as well recognize they will be asked to pay a deficit in lieu of a subsidy in order to provide for the extraordinary expenses of Government operation which will be greater than those of private operation, for that has always been the case and probably always will be. I am ready to pay such a subsidy, even though it is unbusinesslike, rather than a scientific subsidy, simply because we can not pass a bill to provide for a scientific subsidy; in order at least to try to develop and maintain a merchant marine I have gone much further than my conviction and am accepting limited Government ownership and operation, in the hope that we may also provide as liberal arrangements as possible, through additional legislation or by an amendment to this bill, to encourage private operators or private owners to borrow money from the Government on proper terms in order to induce them to build ships to add to the American merchant marine and in the hope they will ultimately take it over.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the effect of the Senator's amendment would be to give four members of the board the power really to change the policy from Government ownership to private ownership.

Mr. EDGE. Yes; that in effect would be the result of the amendment if adopted.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. EDGE. If the Senator from Idaho will let me answer his question further, of course there is something more than that. The present law very clearly provides the policy the board must follow in disposing of ships, and the Senator from Washington, I might point out, yesterday presented a further amendment touching that feature alone. That amendment, I assume, will be adopted. In discussing it the Senator from Washington said:

> Some have contended that the primary purpose of that act—
> Referring to the shipping act of 1920—
> was the building up of the merchant marine, and that the secondary purpose was the disposal of the ships so as to bring them ultimately into private ownership.

I will not read further, but in order to make that policy thoroughly understood and definite, the Senator has proposed an amendment to the pending bill stating in plain English the primary purpose of the expenditure of the money to be appropriated is to add to the merchant marine, and the secondary purpose is, under conditions which seem to warrant such action, to have it pass into private hands. So that if the board follows the clear construction of the law, if the amendment should be adopted—and, in my judgment, a clear construction of the law now existing will provide for the same thing—no board could carry out that provision and sell any of the ships unless conditions were such as, in their best judgment, to make certain that it was for the best interests of the future of the merchant marine to do so. If we must grant authority to some one, in my judgment it is better always, particularly in a business proposition, to delegate authority to a board charged with the responsibility than for Congress to attempt to take control or charge of such a business proposition.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, my opinion is that if we actually engage in operating a Government-owned merchant marine in competition with the privately owned merchant marine of other countries, it will not be long until Congress will come to the conclusion that we shall have to get out of the business.

Mr. EDGE. I hope the Senator is right as to that.

Mr. BORAH. I do not believe that a Government-owned merchant marine can really compete with a privately owned and operated merchant marine. The personal ambition, the personal initiative upon the part of those who own it will outweigh the Government's capacity to deal with different situations as they arise and, in my opinion, ultimately we will have to get out; but I am not clear that we ought to get out until Congress, as a Congress, determines to get out. Should not Congress determine that question, rather than leave it to four men?

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, of course that is a perfectly proper difference of opinion; but in my judgment, as I have already expressed it, it will be a long time before Congress really reverses the policy by an act of Congress, especially after a merchant marine is absolutely intrenched under Government ownership and Government administration. While we are considering the subject, I think that just as a common-sense business proposition we should give at least an opportunity to get out, without depending entirely upon Congress; but we shut the door absolutely, as I think the Senator will agree with me, when we say that a ship can not be sold unless seven members of a board vote "aye" on the transaction. There is not any parallel policy that I know of in any governmental or in any private activity in the world that requires a unanimous vote to adopt a motion or to take any other action.

Mr. BORAH. There is the Council of the League of Nations.

Mr. EDGE. I am surprised that the Senator should even use that as an illustration.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. EDGE. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I desired to call the attention of the Senator from Idaho—who has just left the Chamber, unfortunately—to a number of declarations in this bill, together with the statements of the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Washington, in his speeches and reports, that Congress and the Government are committed irrevocably to a permanent governmental ownership merchant marine policy by this bill.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, pardon me—did the Senator from Washington make that declaration?

Mr. JONES. The Senator can not find anything like that in anything I have said.

Mr. KING. Undoubtedly the interpretation I have just suggested will be placed upon the report of the chairman, as well as his remarks upon the bill, and upon the bill itself.

Take, for instance, section 5:

> The appropriations necessary to carry out the provisions and accomplish the purposes of this act are hereby authorized.

What does that mean? Take that in connection with section 3, which authorizes the board to condition vessels, to acquire vessels, and to construct vessels. There can be but one meaning, viz, that the Government commits itself to the operation of a merchant marine and authorizes the necessary appropriations to carry out that purpose. I submit that the speeches made in support of this bill indicate a purpose to have the United States own and operate a merchant fleet. The bill before us is a declaration by Congress that the Government from now on shall engage in the sea carrying business as the owner and operator of merchant ships.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Jersey yield to me?

Mr. EDGE. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Washington—he is the best interpreter of his own expressions—whether or not he has said that this bill irrevocably commits Congress to a Government-ownership policy?

Mr. JONES. Why, anybody knows that it does not. The next Congress can repeal it, or modify it, or refuse to make appropriations to build any more ships.

Mr. WATSON. That is my thought about it; but I should like to ask the Senator whether or not he intends, as far as he can control the matter, to commit the Government to that policy?

Mr. JONES. Absolutely not.

Mr. FLETCHER. The very section we are talking about provides for the sale of ships.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. EDGE. I yield further.

Mr. KING. Notwithstanding the statements just made by the Senator from Washington, I reassert that the construction will be placed upon the bill, upon his declarations, and upon the action of Congress if it passes this bill unamended, that Congress commits itself irrevocably to governmental ownership and operation of merchant ships. Indeed, this construction has already been placed on the bill by the press and those who have followed the action of the committee reporting the same.

When appropriations necessary to carry out the provisions and accomplish the purposes of this act are authorized, what is the message that would be given to the Senator from Indiana if he were operating ships or desired to build ships? He would say, "The board is authorized and required by Congress to build ships, to recondition such as require it, and to build and operate a merchant fleet; therefore I shall not build ships as long as this authorization exists and the Government is engaged in marine activities." The Senator would be driven from the seas, and his shipyards would be closed. The same baneful effects would follow every other person who desired to go into the shipping business. Private yards would be shut down, and a privately owned and operated merchant marine would be impossible of realization.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. The Senator from New Jersey has the floor. I am trespassing on his generosity.

Mr. EDGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. I desire to ask the Senator a question. Nobody can be more bitterly opposed to Government ownership in any form than I am and always have been.

Mr. KING. Then the Senator must vote against this bill, as I shall.

Mr. WATSON. But what I wanted to ask the Senator was this: What is the alternative? What does the Senator propose if this bill is not passed?

Mr. KING. I could propose several alternatives, but I have no right to do it in the time of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. That is rather a long question.

Mr. WATSON. I know, but it requires an answer; and that is the real question at issue.

Mr. EDGE. I will endeavor to answer the Senator.

Mr. KING. If the Senator does not, I promise the Senator that I will try to give him my answer.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. EDGE. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator is very kind. I simply wanted, in response to the observations of the Senator from Utah, to call attention to one paragraph in the report of the committee.

I understand the argument of the Senator from Utah to be that if the Government is in the shipping business it is going to discourage private enterprise, so that no ships will be built. I read the following paragraph from the committee report:

> It is said that the presence and operation of Government shipping prevents the building up of an American merchant marine. For 50 years before the World War we had no Government merchant ships, and yet our merchant marine did not build up.

We had the very situation then for which the Senator now argues, and yet we had no ships.

Again, it is said that we can not have a merchant marine because of the La Follette Seamen's Act. There is no probability that the La Follette Seamen's Act will be repealed; but it is to be noted that before we had the La Follette Seamen's Act we did not get any merchant ships.

I am speaking of this because my own position in the matter is somewhat analogous to that of the Senator. I wish we could have an American merchant marine without governmental interference; but I have seen this thing drift along until, believing as I do that it is essential to the protection of this Republic that we have a merchant marine, I have come to the place where I am willing to take even this step to get it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, of course I would not be unparliamentary enough to say that the Senator is illogical; but when the Senator quotes the statement which he has just read, and then makes the subsequent statement, he confesses that he does not believe that we can have a merchant marine unless it is Government owned, for the Senator now, by his speech, commits himself to Government ownership.

Mr. WILLIS. If the Senator from New Jersey will yield further, I do not think that interpretation is a just one. What I tried to say was this: I wish we could have a merchant marine by some other method; but I have seen this thing going on year after year. I thought at the time of the war we had made a start whereby we would have an American merchant marine, but year after year the proportion of our commerce carried in our own ships has decreased until now it is 20 per cent, or thereabouts, and if we go on in this way it will soon be where it was when the World War came on, when we were practically without ships and were carrying only 10 per cent of our commerce. I think that would be a national calamity.

I thank the Senator from New Jersey for yielding to me.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, in a general way I am in hearty accord with the sentiments expressed by the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Ohio that we are facing a condition and not a theory, and that we simply must meet it, and that we can meet it only by governmental help. I have rather reluctantly come to that conclusion. But I am addressing myself at this time to an amendment which, I think, will prevent permanently saddling upon us Government ownership and administration. That is all I am discussing to-day. We have all reached a situation, I think—most of us, at least—where we believe that if we are going to have a merchant marine the American taxpayer must pay the bill; but I hope to have that bill minimized as far as it is possible for common-sense business methods to help minimize it. One of the practical ways to minimize it is to give at least some authority to some one, without waiting for some future Congress and when conditions seem to be sufficiently stable and opportunities to dispose of ships come along, to do so without coming to Congress for the further authority.

I do not think there is a Senator in this Chamber who will for one moment attempt to assert—I know the Senator from Washington will not, as his speech yesterday indicated—that we will ever sell any considerable number of ships, if any, under a law that requires seven men, representing the Atlantic and the Pacific and the Gulf and the Lakes, to vote "aye" to sell a spar or a sail. Why not at least adopt the recognized business principle of every business activity in the world and of every legislative body in the world—majority rule? To require unanimous approval is mere subterfuge.

For these reasons, and not with any thought of in any way delaying the building and operation and advancement of the merchant marine, but in order to have a definite, logical method some day of getting out of this business without coming back to Congress, I feel that the amendment I have offered is sane and businesslike.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. EDGE. I shall be glad to answer it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have been trying to get his attention for some moments. I was impressed by the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho that Congress could at any time, of course, order the sale of these ships.

Mr. EDGE. There is no question about that if you want to bring it back to Congress.

Mr. FLETCHER. And eventually we may come to that. My point is that if we hold out the idea here that we are going to sell these ships as fast as we construct them, or as soon as we desire to do it—speedily, as the message of the President said—then we never can build up these lines successfully.

Mr. EDGE. But the Senator knows that the Senator from Washington has offered another amendment which prescribes definitely the policy for the Shipping Board and they can not sell them, if they obey the law, until or unless the condition of the commercial traffic of the United States would make it a businesslike proposition to sell them; and if they do anything else they break the law under which they are operating.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am making this point: Here is a valuable property. Here is a great asset of the Nation. Millions of dollars have been spent on these ships. What department of the Government, what bureau, what branch of the Government has authority to dispose of the valuable property of the country without action by Congress?

Suppose the Bureau of Lighthouses owns a little piece of land down here. You can not go and buy it from the Bureau of Lighthouses. You have to get an act of Congress; and it is the same way with the Navy Department or the War Department in regard to military reservations and everything of that sort, not as valuable as this property. They have to apply to Congress before they can sell property of that kind. When the Senator introduced his bill originally he provided, as to all of the ships constructed in pursuance of this act, that authority of Congress had to be obtained before they could be sold.

Mr. EDGE. Apparently the committee did not believe in that. The committee did not approve of that.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; I am getting to that. We have changed that so that it is not necessary to come to Congress to get this authority. Under this amendment the board can proceed to sell the ships; but in order to protect and safeguard the public interest we have provided that there must be recorded the unanimous consent of the board charged with that responsibility.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. EDGE. Will the Senator answer my question? Does the Senator believe that under that provision, should it become a law, there will ever be any ships sold?

Mr. FLETCHER. Absolutely. I have no doubt about it. They will be sold. They will not be given away, as they have been in the past, by a majority vote of the board; but the requirement of the unanimous vote of the men charged with that responsibility will save time in coming to Congress, and save confusion and conflicts that might arise in Congress, and enable this board, selected in this way, by unanimous vote, to dispose of the property; and it is the only way in which we can protect the public interest.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON. With all due respect——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland has been on his feet asking recognition for some time.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from New Jersey a question. I am in accord with the views he has expressed, and I was hoping that some one would touch on this phase of the matter, that those foreign countries which now maintain shipping subsidies, and those foreign countries which maintain shipping lines, are customers in the world's market for our grain surplus. A great deal has been said about the farm question. If we take over the world's business in shipping, as some have seemed to think we should, will we not minimize the power of those foreign countries to buy our surplus? There must be a division of the world's work in order that trade may be carried on. If we remove this line of activity, it occurs to me that our market will be somewhat diminished.

SENATORIAL CONTEST IN PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I offer the following resolution, which I think is highly privileged.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the resolution.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 122), as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections is hereby directed to proceed forthwith and upon the present pleadings to the taking of the evidence in the Wilson-Vare contest, and to report the evidence and its findings to the Senate with all reasonable dispatch.

This resolution shall not be in derogation of the right of the committee at any time to permit all proper amendments to the pleadings which are tendered by the parties to the contest.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, the Committee on Privileges and Elections took action yesterday which the Democratic members of the committee thought required this resolution; but since I came here this morning I am informed that there will be another meeting of the committee at 3 o'clock this afternoon, which may make the pressing of the resolution for immediate action, or action at all, entirely unnecessary, so that I shall not ask the Senate to proceed now with the consideration of the resolution. I assume that I am warranted in saying it will probably not be necessary to press it at all.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I assume the resolution goes over?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri does not ask for its immediate consideration, and it will lie on the table.

Mr. REED of Missouri. It lies on the table.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. At this time I wish to give notice to the members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections that there will be a meeting of the committee at 3 o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. REED of Missouri subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for permission to withdraw the resolution which I offered this morning concerning directions to the Committee on Privileges and Elections touching the Vare-Wilson contest. The committee has passed the necessary resolution to proceed with the investigation. Therefore this resolution is no longer necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLAINE in the chair). Is there objection? There appearing none, it is so ordered.

THE MERCHANT MARINE

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 744) to further develop an American merchant marine, to assure its permanence in the transportation of the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] to the committee amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, a question was asked a few moments ago as to whether there was any likelihood that our merchant marine might go ahead in case the Government did not assume the business of building ships, and go into the business of conducting shipping operations. It was maintained by the Senator from Utah, I think very justly, that the passage of a bill of this kind would be a direct notice to companies that they need not put their money into a business of this nature.

It happens that there has been brought to our attention in the past few weeks a plan of a New York company to construct the fastest and finest passenger vessels in the world, and to operate them under the American flag. I hold in my hand a drawing of one of those vessels, and I have here a clipping from a British newspaper as to what our cousins across the water think of this proposal. This is from the Daily News, of London, England.

This proposal has not received the interest on the floors of Congress which it seems to me to deserve, but it certainly has attracted attention across the water. This clipping from the front page of the Daily News, one of the largest newspapers in England, the way in which the headlines have been played up, and the comment on this bit of news would seem to me to offer convincing testimony of the fact that this proposal is more than a gesture, that this proposal is more than any effort to interfere with what the Senator from Washington proposes, that in fact it is something which very seriously concerns and affects us and even interests that country of the world which has been most successful in conducting a great merchant marine.

The article is headed:

AMERICA'S ATLANTIC CHALLENGE

The United States now appears to be making a strong bid to enter into serious competition with the British Atlantic liner services.

If that statement is true, as our British cousins think and believe it is true, that "the United States now appears to be making a strong bid to enter into serious competition with the British Atlantic liner services," it seems to me we ought to hesitate before passing a bill which would administer a distinct rebuke to such a company, which would practically say to them, "The Government, with all the millions and billions of its credit and its capital at its command, is going into the business of competing with you, and this Congress does not propose to help private enterprises to operate on the ocean, but it is proposed that the Government shall go into this business."

I read further from the article:

A company has been formed to build ships which, with the aid of airplanes (to take off from special decks) will, it is claimed, reduce the time of the Atlantic passage from five days, as at present, to three days, and provide greater luxuries.

The question for us to consider is this: Are we going to pass a bill immediately, before it is seen whether such a proposal as this can be carried out, a bill whose policy offers the greatest possible discouragement to American enterprise?

I shall not take the Senate's time to read the rest of the article, but I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPEED LINERS—AMERICA'S ATLANTIC CHALLENGE—NEW COMPANY TO BUILD PLANE SHIPS

The United States now appears to be making a strong bid to enter into serious competition with the British Atlantic liner services.

A company has been formed to build ships which, with the aid of airplanes (to take off from special decks) will, it is claimed, reduce the time of the Atlantic passage from five days, as at present, to three days, and provide greater luxury.

The Daily News, as far back as last November, foreshadowed such a move, and our New York correspondent, in his dispatch below, describes the formation of the new American company, and what it is aiming to accomplish.

(From our own correspondent, Wilson Midgley)

NEW YORK, Monday.—New competition in trans-Atlantic shipping is promised by a company which has just been incorporated.

At its head will be Mr. Laurence Wilder, who announced the formation of the new company at Washington to-day. He is chairman of the Brown Boveri Electric Corporation, one of the biggest shipbuilding concerns in the United States.

He says the new company will be called the "Transoceanic Corporation."

Its ship, it is stated, will be faster, more comfortable, safer, and more frequent than any now sailing between America and Europe.

The aim is to begin with sailings on alternate days, and to establish eventually regular daily sailings. American efficiency and luxury are both to be applied.

America has developed new methods in industry and the handling of freight, he says, and the new company will apply the refinements developed in American hotels and homes to "putting transatlantic travel on a new level of luxury."

Critics of the Government operation of shipping and the rising costs of the Leviathan and smaller ships welcome the proposal as a promising solution of America's problem of how to acquire a merchant fleet.

Mr. Wilder says he will enter into strict competition with the existing lines. He will build six 33-knot liners to carry 800 passengers each, to start with; thus the crossing of the Atlantic will be accomplished in four days.

"I do not want to buy existing ships," says Mr. Wilder, "but I shall ask the Government Shipping Board for a loan equal to 75 per cent of the value of the new ships, and I shall also ask for a change in the law in order to give American ships preference with regard to mail contracts."

LIKE THE "SARATOGA"

Mr. Wilder disclosed in an interview that the new ships would be similar to the airplane carrier Saratoga, and that models had already been made.

Airplanes will be used in order to cut the crossing down to three days.

Where the Majestic now makes 14 round trips a year the new ships, he said, would make 37.

This would be achieved partly by using the methods developed in America for handling cargo at ports and partly by setting up a new port to avoid congestion, so that ships could be turned round regularly in two days.

Representatives of four great American railways have been helping with plans to this end.

The scheme is said to be assured of £10,000,000 capital, and Mr. Wilder says that in three years there would be enough ships to replace the Shipping Board's lines in the Atlantic.

THE NEW SHIPS MODELED ON A NAVAL VESSEL

The Daily News naval correspondent called attention last November to the American project as likely to revolutionize ocean travel. The plan then was to build 10 high-speed liners, but the new scheme is apparently for 6.

The new American ships are intended to travel at such a speed that the ocean journey will take them four days (as against the White Star Majestic's five), but airplanes, carried on board, would, so it is planned, reduce this time to three days.

These ships were to resemble huge destroyers, but it will be observed that the vessels now under consideration will, according to the American proposals, be modeled on the great American aircraft carrier Saratoga, the most remarkable vessel of her kind in the world, which cost £9,000,000 and can carry 90 airplanes.

The liners will, of course, be smaller, and will apparently be designed to carry 800 passengers, all first class, and to travel at 32½ knots—37 miles an hour. The Mauretania carries 1,800 and the Majestic 4,000 passengers of all classes.

HIGH RATES

As the tremendous speed of the American liners would make them very costly to run, passenger rates would be very high, though the promoters apparently believe that the shorter sea voyage and quicker transit would be a sufficient inducement to the traveling public to pay special rates.

The ships, if they are ever built, will, it is planned, be fitted with a platform enabling airplanes to land on and depart from the vessels when the latter are in motion. In this way it would be possible to carry mails, and, perhaps passengers, between America and Great Britain in three days.

Meanwhile, as the Daily News has already pointed out, the White Star Co. has ordered a super-Majestic, a vessel of not less than 60,000 tons, with Diesel engines surpassing in power every motor installation now in existence.

A projected new Cunarder may be larger even than the super-Majestic.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask unanimous consent to print along with the article just presented an article from the Morning Post of London bearing on the same matter, which confirms what the Senator suggests.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Morning Post, London, England, January 10, 1928]

TO NEW YORK IN FOUR DAYS—BID FOR ATLANTIC SUPREMACY—AMERICAN PLANS—£18,000,000 ASKED FOR

(From our own correspondent)

WASHINGTON, January 9.—If the Government will advance £18,000,000, the Transoceanic Corporation, a company composed entirely of Americans with American capital, will build six vessels capable of making a sustained speed of 35 knots and crossing the Atlantic from New York to British and Channel ports and vice versa in four days. This is the statement made by Mr. Lawrence Wilder, president of the company, now in Washington. He will shortly go before the Shipping Board and present his plans.

These new vessels would be of 35,000 tons, and will cost £4,200,000, each, so that the Government would advance three-quarters of their cost. The six vessels proposed would give a sailing every other day from New York and British ports, to be increased to a daily service later if justified by the traffic.

Mr. Wilder says that his company will not ask for a subsidy, but will endeavor to have the ocean mail contract law modified to give vessels under the American flag a preference in mail contracts.

QUESTION FOR CONGRESS

Mr. Wilder adds that his company is not particularly interested in buying the Leviathan and other Government-owned ships if the Government will advance the necessary capital for the construction of the projected four-day ships. That, of course, can not be done by the Shipping Board, but will require the consent of Congress and the passage of the necessary act, which will lead to prolonged discussion.

It is true that there is a strong sentiment in favor of the Government getting out of the shipping business, but whether it is advisable for the Government to get out by going in as a partner in a private shipping concern seems doubtful to many Members of Congress. They fear the Government will have to grant heavy subsidies if the four-day ships are kept in operation.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD an editorial from the San Francisco Chronicle dealing with the subject matter now before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the San Francisco Chronicle, January 11, 1928]

THROWING STILL MORE MONEY ON SHIPPING BOARD JUNK PILE

On its investment of some three and a half billions in the Shipping Board experiment the Government is losing millions a year instead of showing a profit. Yet the Shipping Board now asks another $200,000,000 to build some more ships, and the program has the approval of the Senate Commerce Committee. It looks like throwing good money after bad, for there is no promise that the additional investment will turn the tide. President Coolidge has made it clear that what the Government needs is not to get deeper into the shipping business but to get out of it altogether.

A large part of the three and a half billions is lost beyond recall. It is part of the waste of war, for the Government went into the shipping business as a war emergency, and this loss can properly be written off as war expense. But there is a great deal of salvage in the Shipping Board fleets. And the Shipping Board's proper function is to salvage, not to perpetuate itself. The sooner the ships are sold on the best terms obtainable and the Shipping Board put out of business definitely and forever, the better off for all concerned.

Senator JONES, of Washington, says that the reason for approving the program to sink another $200,000,000 is that it is the only way to get an American merchant marine operated. American wage scales make the building and operation of American ships cost more than foreign ships. The Senator thinks it unwise to tinker with the seamen's act and impossible to get anything like a subsidy or other direct support to offset the disadvantages under which American shipping operates. The only way he sees is to build and operate ships under private lessees at a loss, thus providing an indirect subsidy. This is plausible, but it overlooks that the deficits are not loss alone, but waste on a gigantic scale. Out and out subsidy would be much cheaper and with fewer disadvantages.

The whole Shipping Board adventure is an ill-starred chapter of disaster. It keeps the shipping business stirred up by politics and unsavory incidents arising therefrom. It puts a drag upon independent private enterprise.

How the disadvantage of high building and operating cost is to be offset remains to be seen. It certainly is a sad commentary on the intelligence of the American people to conclude that the only way is to make a bad bargain worse.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, it seems to me quite significant that from the two great seaports—one on the east coast and one on the west coast—from New York and from San Francisco, there should come these requests to be brought to the attention of the Congress, that nothing that we do at this time interfere with the progress of American initiative and American enterprise and the growth of private initiative and private enterprise.

I can not express myself too forcibly in the belief that the citizens of the State of Connecticut, whom I have the honor in part to represent in this body, are very sincerely and very deeply opposed to Government ownership and Government operation of business of this kind. That is not based on any petty or provincial views of their own; it is based on experience and on sound common sense.

Backing up that opinion, I should like to give the views, as expressed in one of the great papers in England, of a people who have most successfully engaged in merchant-marine operations for a great many years, as has been brought out in the debate. The editor of the Financial News, London, refers to the fact that there is a possibility that state-owned merchant ships in the United States will be sold and the attempts to run state-owned merchant ships will be wound up. He goes on to say:

> Its coincidence with the decision to wind up the Australian state shipping venture points to a manifest moral. There is something about the management of merchant shipping which leaves state ownership hopelessly unprofitable. It may be that in passenger services the official atmosphere does not fit. In a post office the official atmosphere may pass, but not on shipboard. Again, in freight service the inevitable inclination of the officially managed concern to fall into a "take-or-leave-it" attitude does not work. Shipping management is an affair of infinite, various, and small details and constant care, watchfulness, and painstaking attention. These are not, and never were, the strong points of any state management. Yet they make up in sum the difference between profit and loss, between the ownership of a white elephant and the ownership of a useful beast of transport burden able to earn an honest living. The state ownership of merchant shipping therefore passes into the limbo of failure.

Mr. President, it seems to me the very criticisms offered on this floor by distinguished Senators, notably the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], against the operations and the acts of the Shipping Board, point vividly to the fact that Government ownership has not been satisfactory to him and to the people he represents. So I can not understand why they wish to go ahead and extend this admittedly unsatisfactory form of operation in the face of what has recently happened.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator states that his State and his people are opposed to Government ownership and operation of these ships. I will ask him if his State and his people were not in favor of Government ownership and operation of the Cape Cod Canal.

Mr. BINGHAM. That question was raised yesterday, Mr. President. It has been the practice of this Government, ever since the Constitution was adopted, to take charge of the navigable waters. It has never been our practice to take charge of normal business enterprises. We have operated the Panama Canal and many other canals. There is nothing unusual or new in that. Our experience in operating the Panama Canal, dredging rivers and harbors, in promoting the navigation of the Mississippi and other rivers has been in accordance with that provision of the Constitution which calls upon us to promote navigation and gives to the Congress the right of control over navigable waters.

Mr. BROOKHART. In the case of the Cape Cod Canal, a private corporation, private parties acquired that and operated it until it became a white elephant on the hands of the private parties, then the Senator voted to take it over by the Government. Is not that correct?

Mr. BINGHAM. I believe that the Government should operate the canals, and should promote navigation in any way along the lines laid down in the Constitution. But the precedent established during the war, when the Government was in the operation of the railroads so disastrously, shows that the Government should not enter into the business of operating ships.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator says the Government went into the operation of the railroads "so disastrously." The fact is that the first 10 months after the railroads were turned back to private enterprise the private managers of those roads increased the operating expenses, at the expense of the people of the country, fourteen hundred and eighty-five million dollars, nearly a billion and a half dollars, and that was the excess charge of private operation over the last year of Government operation, and only about six hundred million of that was wasted.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss the Government operation of railroads with the Senator. His opinions and mine on this subject have differed for some time, as he well knows. I submit that the people of the United States decided by a great majority a long time ago that they wanted less of the Government in business.

Mr. BROOKHART. I am a strong believer in the Government of the United States. I believe in it from every standpoint. I am not willing to discredit it on an economic proposition or any other proposition, and I am opposed to this idea of constantly saying that the Government is inefficient, and especially when the facts show otherwise, as they did in the operation of the railroads.

Mr. BINGHAM. Of course, that is a position taken by all socialists also.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. Apropos of what the Senator from Iowa has said, and not expressing any opinion just now as to Government ownership, yet in justice to the record and the history of the Government taking over the railroads the Senator must not forget that just previous to the taking over of the railroads by the Government the railroads themselves had acknowledged that they had utterly broken down in their efforts to meet the exigencies of the case under the laws then prevailing, and that under their management they were entirely unable to meet the demands of the situation arising out of war necessities. We were confronted with one of two things—abrogation or suspending of all laws in reference to railroads, or the Government taking them over and meeting the situation as the war conditions demanded.

I do not think that a careful student of the operation of the railroads during the time of Government control would reach the conclusion that it was in any way short of the necessities of the case, but that they met the situation efficiently, particularly in view of the opposition and the obstructions which were thrown in their way in the midst of that terrible emergency. I think credit is due the Government for the manner in which it handled the intricate problem of transportation under the circumstances existing and it should not be held up as an illustration of the Government's failure in business.

I do not know whether it is wise for us to commit ourselves to Government ownership along any particular line, but it certainly is our province to see whether or not certain necessities of the people can be the better run by the Government or by private interests.

If the Senator will allow me just in that connection, I will recall the strong protests which came to this body when we proposed to establish the parcel post. The express companies were doing the business of transporting parcels, and they declared, just as we have it declared now, that private enterprise in the shipping and insurance of parcels would drive them out of business and ruin them. Not only has the parcel post rendered better service to all parts of the country but it has in no way diminished the returns of our express companies.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. An observation made by the Senator from South Carolina prompts me to say a few words, as I fear his position will be misunderstood. He stated in substance that during the war the railroads were "broken down," and requested the Government to "take them over." In my opinion, the transportation companies will not concede that they were so "broken down" that they could not function and were compelled to throw themselves on the mercy of the Government. It is true that some of the railroads, because of the conditions following the war, were placed in difficult situations, and experienced difficulty in meeting their obligations. But I think it will be generally conceded that the railroads, as a whole, were efficiently operated prior to and during the early period of the war. But as the war progressed and the entire structure of the Government, as well as the economic and social fabric were drawn into the maelstrom—many industries were disrupted, and the economic life of the people diverted into new channels. The railroads, perhaps, were more seriously affected by this situation than any other branch of our business life.

The demands of the Government in mobilizing troops and in preparing for the great struggle practically took the railroads out of the hands of the owners—even before the Government actually took possession of the same.

The demands of the United States for billions of dollars dried up the fountains of credit and made it impossible for railroads as well as cities and school districts and corporations to obtain money and needed credits.

Political subdivisions and solvent corporations and business institutions were denied permission to issue or sell securities; many business concerns were ruined and many channels of trade closed.

The princely orders issued by the Government and the preferential treatment accorded it on its stupendous activities brought some railroads to the door of distress and made the operation of others unprofitable. Tens of thousands of employees were taken from technical and other departments of the railroads, thus adding to the burdens they were compelled to bear. A situation was thus created which inevitably resulted in the Government taking charge of the railroads. This was not done because of inefficiency or because the railroads had failed in their duty. Federal laws prevented consolidations and unified operation, such as, perhaps, the war conditions required.

The Government was not restrained by the Federal statutes referred to; it could control them and conduct operations as the exigencies of war demanded.

May I make one further observation? The Senator from South Carolina indicated, as I interpret his remarks—and if I am wrong I ask to be corrected—that the obligation rests upon the Government to see that the needs of the people are cared for, even though in so doing it impinges upon personal rights and invades private fields of activity. It seems to me that even those who place the most latitudinarian construction upon the Constitution may not go so far.

Who is to judge what is best for the individual and the people? Tyrants have usually justified their oppressive measures by urging that they were in the interest of the people. The political struggles of history were for the purpose of emancipating the individual from the power of autocrats and oppressive governments. The welfare of the people is best secured by the development of the individual, the removal of those impediments and restrictions to the development of initiative. Bureaucracy, paternalism, and despotism find a thousand excuses and reasons for the policies which they desire and execute.

The Congress has no power under the Constitution, because we may think that the Government can run the railroads or ships better than individuals can run them, to take over the railroads or engage in the shipping business. Where is the warrant in the Constitution of the United States for the Government to become a common carrier and engage in private enterprise? I concede that in war it can do what it is forbidden to do in peace times. If the Government may own and operate railroads and ships it may engage in any form of industry and business. It may own manufacturing plants and make and sell commodities of every character. Under this view there would be no limitations upon its power; it could be transformed into a huge socialistic experiment or a communist régime similar to that which exists in Russia.

May I say in passing that our communistic friends are looking upon our paternalistic and socialistic policies with gratification, because they believe that they presage destruction of private business and the ownership by the Government of all property and the operation by the state of all business and industry.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would like to ask the Senator from Utah whether he does not think it is a strange line of argument that has been followed here to prove that two wrongs will make a right? In other words, the first wrong is that we have not, for various causes, the merchant marine that we ought to have. The second wrong is that the Government ought not to indulge in the ownership and construction of ships and go into the shipping business; but it is hoped, in view of the fact that we can not get subvention or a subsidy, that by committing the second wrong we will overcome the first wrong and make it right.

Mr. KING. The theory seems to be that "the state can do no wrong" and that Government has some sort of divine authority so that whatever it does is right, no matter how illogical, inconsistent, or tyrannous it may be.

Mr. BINGHAM. Surely the Senator would not admit that the United States Government is not the best Government on earth?

Mr. KING. Under a democratic government mankind may enjoy the highest felicity. There can be no greater or better form of government. But it must be not only in name, in theory, but in practice democratic. The letter killeth but the spirit giveth life. Democracy is not a mere form, it can not be an empty formula. It is a vital, living force, manifesting itself in the individual and leading him to the development and assertion of the divine powers and authority within him. It apotheosizes the individual; it recognizes him as the sovereign, the source of all political power. There is too much pseudo-democracy in the land. There is a growing spirit that the National Government is the source of all political authority and that it is without limitation. A deadly and destructive Federalism is being developed in the United States, which if unchecked will change our form of Government and overthrow our political institutions.

There are those who believe that the States are being destroyed and that the unitary theory is supplanting our dual form of government, so that there will eventually come an oligarchy of wealth or an oppressive socialism or paternalism.

When the Senator from Iowa so apotheosizes the Government it seems to me the time has come for some one to speak for the individual, for the State, and for local self-government. We are going too far in building up a central government and centralizing political power in the Federal Government. The States are being devitalized and efforts made to take away the power of initiative and of the individual and the sovereignty which belongs to them.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator from Connecticut threw out the suggestion as to my remarks that "that is the way that socialists feel." I do not want that statement to pass without a little further notice.

The financial crowd in this country and their representatives in the Senate invariably come back with those flings at anybody who has an idea. I know if I disagree with the financial crowd once, they call me a socialist. If I disagree with them twice, they call me a communist. If I disagree with them three times, they call me an anarchist. If I disagree with them four times, they call me a bolshevik. I have been clear down the line with that outfit. I have been called all those names, and I am proud of it. The fact that the question is right or wrong is all that I care anything about. If it is right that we should take charge of the merchant marine to keep the American flag on the seas by the funds of the Government, I do not care how many other people believe in the same thing, and therefore I stand for the Government in performing its proper function.

The Government has performed functions for the people of the State of Connecticut. Its tariff laws are paternalistic, socialistic, and communistic laws for the benefit of the people of the Senator's State, the same as this bill, if enacted into law, might benefit my people indirectly. Its patent laws give special privileges and its banking laws give special privileges and special powers of that kind. But when we come to do something for the common people, something that is going to help the whole people, then it must be stigmatized as socialistic, communistic, and some of these other worse names.

Mr. BINGHAM. I did not apply to my good friend the Senator from Iowa the term "socialist." I said that his is a position taken by all socialists also. I merely intended to convey my impression, as I think everyone will agree, that for the Government to go into the shipping business or into any other form of business which is naturally a place for private enterprise, which is naturally the way to increase individual initiative, is according to the principles of socialism. There are many people who have told us that the principles of socialism are steadily infiltrating into our body politic, and that we are more and more becoming paternalistic, becoming socialistic, and tending toward the doctrines of communism.

Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa makes a very unfair implication in his opening statement when he would seem to imply that I am here representing financial interests. If all the people of the State of Connecticut who take pride in their thrift and in their hard, common sense are to be considered financiers, I have no quarrel with him. I represent no interests except the interests of the people of my State. I represent no desire except the desire to benefit the great mass of the common people, to which he so lovingly refers. It is because I believe the interests of the common people are threatened by this kind of legislation that I enter my feeble protest against it.

What is it that has made the people of our country great? It is because the boys and girls of the country have had the opportunity, no matter where they were born, no matter of what families they came or what their previous condition of servitude, to make much of themselves. But if they shall have to compete with Government in business, then that is the most stupendous obstacle that can possibly be placed in front of them. The great objection to socialism and its principles, the great objection to communism and its principles, is that they offer the most tremendous possible handicaps to the development and future of the individual poor girl or poor boy. It is because ours has been a land of opportunity that it has succeeded. It is because it has been a land of opportunity that it is the country of which we are so proud. When the Senator from Iowa and those who think like him desire to have the Government go into business for the benefit of the common people, they seek what may be for their immediate benefit but not for their ultimate benefit. Their ultimate benefit can come only from opportunities to develop themselves and to develop their abilities in business without meeting the handicaps of the Central Government.

Now, Mr. President, I should like to read from the President's message one paragraph, for it bears directly on the matter before us. It is under the heading "Merchant marine." The President in his message of December 6 says:

> The United States Government fleet is transporting a large amount of freight and reducing its drain on the Treasury. The Shipping Board is constantly under pressure, to which it too often yields, to protect private interests, rather than serve the public welfare.

I ask those who believe in Government ownership please to note that Government ownership must operate through some such body as the Shipping Board, and here is the direct charge made by the President that in his experience he has found it true that "the board is constantly under pressure, to which it too often yields, to protect private interests." Even when we get Government ownership and Government operation we do not get Utopia. The President goes on to say:

> More attention should be given to merchant ships as an auxiliary of the Navy.

That is done in foreign countries and has greatly tended to build up their merchant marines. The President further says:

> The possibility of including their masters and crews in the Naval Reserve, with some reasonable compensation, should be thoroughly explored as a method of encouraging private operation of shipping.

That is a suggestion which I do not understand has been considered by the committee which reported this bill; there has been no evidence of their having considered it; and yet it seems to me to be a suggestion involving great possibilities of usefulness. The President goes on to say:

> Public operation is not a success.

I think everyone, even the members of the Committee on Commerce, will agree with that.

> No investigation, of which I have caused several to be made, has failed to report that it—> could not succeed or to recommend speedy transfer to private ownership. Our exporters and importers are both indifferent about using American ships. It should be our policy to keep our present vessels in repair and dispose of them as rapidly as possible, rather than undertake any new construction.

That is, public operation—

That recommendation of the President has been directly——

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a minute?

Mr. BINGHAM. I will yield as soon as I finish the sentence. That recommendation of the President has been directly ignored by the pending bill. The President ends the paragraph on the merchant marine with these words:

> Their operation—

That is, the operation of the present vessels—> is a burden on the National Treasury for which we are not receiving sufficient benefits.

Now I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I merely wish to suggest an answer to three thoughts that the Senator has emphasized. As to the one regarding the pressure that is brought to bear on the Shipping Board, I desire to say that the amendment which the committee proposes, requiring the unanimous consent of the board, it seems to me, would protect the board against an unusual and unjust pressure.

I will ask a question of the Senator from Connecticut, who insists that this is purely a field for private capital and private individuals to engage in and that the Government ought to get out of it. Leaving aside the commercial features, the necessity of expanding and enlarging and taking care of our foreign commerce—leaving that to one side—the Senator will admit that we require merchant ships to serve our Navy in time of need. Auxiliaries, sometimes called "supply ships," are just as important as are our battleships in time of trouble. The Senator will admit that we require such ships. Is that a distinct and clear field for private enterprise to occupy? Is not that a field which justifies the Government in undertaking to supply such ships, and especially since private enterprise does not supply them? Why should we say the Government ought not to build auxiliaries for the Navy or own or control or operate them any more than we should say that the Government ought not to build naval ships? The Government builds naval ships and owns and operates them. Merchant ships are just as important as auxiliaries of the Navy as they are to serve our commerce; in time of trouble they are essential. So in this matter of foreign shipping—I do not have any reference to the coastwise trade at all, for that properly belongs to American shipping and American ships, and all that sort of thing, and is splendidly equipped now—is not that a field, I will ask the Senator, keeping in mind the necessity for auxiliaries and supply ships for the Navy, that has features that make it rather distinct from the ordinary business undertaking which the Senator feels ought to be left to private enterprise?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator's question, I should like to make two points. In the first place, it will be generally conceded that it has been Great Britain's policy to provide as many of the auxiliary ships to which the Senator refers as possible, so that in time of war her navy might be strengthened by auxiliary cruisers of every description. In following that policy she has not indulged in Government building and Government ownership and Government operation, but has followed other policies with great success, as the Senator himself has brought to our attention in the figures showing the large number of ships operated under the British flag to-day. In other words, if we wish to secure that kind of auxiliaries for the Navy of which the Senator speaks, the most practical way to do it, as shown by experience, is the way followed by Great Britain.

Secondly, my answer would be——

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, our people will not do it. That has been the experience of the past. Our people will not undertake it as the British people do.

If the Senator from Connecticut will allow me just a moment further, I wish to say that I think the message of the President, which the Senator has quoted, is destructive and not constructive. I differ with the President in the statement that the conduct of the shipping business as it has been carried on by the Shipping Board is a burden on the Treasury and that we do not receive adequate remuneration therefor. I have not any question at all that the benefits to the American people arising from the operation of ships by the Shipping Board are many times in excess of the cost of operation.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, in reply to what the Senator from Florida has said, that the people will not undertake to do this work, let me ask how do we know they will not undertake it? We never before have had made a tangible, clear-cut proposition such as has been referred to by the Senator from Connecticut this morning. A definite proposition has been made to the Shipping Board that under certain conditions a private company with American capital will build six ships, each one of them capable of making the trip from port to port, from our country to Europe, in four days, and with an airplane connection so that mail actually could be sent from Chicago to Paris in three days. Never before has there been made such a proposal.

How does the Senator from Florida know that the people will not enter into this field? We should test the temper of the people. We should find out if the people of this country are unwilling to have private enterprise go forward in this way, because if we do not do it, what is the alternative? The alternative is to recondition two ships, each 21 years old, and attempt with a 20-knot ship and a 22-knot ship to compete with the great, fine ships now in operation and being built by the Cunard Line and the White Star Line. I do not think it is fair to say that the people will not do it. Let us test the people and see whether or not they will do it.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, what is the proposition that the company referred to makes in reference to financing the construction of these ships?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, the proposal in regard to these ships which has been made to the Shipping Board—and I speak entirely unofficially and subject to correction—I believe has met with the approval of the Shipping Board to such a unanimous extent that they are extremely desirous of having the whole proposal laid before Congress at once for its consideration. The proposal is this: This company, with a design for ships—which, I may say to the Senator from Florida, would make the best auxiliary cruisers in the world, because they would be in the nature of auxiliary aircraft carriers in time of war—is willing to put up some fifty or sixty million dollars of junior money if the Government will put up some ninety million dollars of senior money, to be loaned—not given—to the company at the same rate of interest which the Government must pay when it borrows the money. In other words, the Government can borrow it at little more than 3 per cent, and under the plan proposed would loan it to the company at a little more than 3 per cent, the company to pay interest on it, so that the Government would not lose one penny by it. The Government then would receive a first mortgage on all the ships and the company, which puts up fifty or sixty million dollars, would have only a second mortgage on the ships. This proposal, then, if accepted, virtually would not cost the people of the United States one penny but would enable the United States to bring into being the fastest fleet of merchant ships in the world—a fleet which the British papers are already speaking of as serious challenge to their supremacy in ships crossing the North Atlantic. It is that proposal which is to come before Congress in the near future.

What I am asking for, I will say to the Senator from South Carolina, is that we do not pass this bill and give this enterprising group of citizens a slap in the face by telling them, "No; we are tired of trying to do anything for the merchant marine; we have tried for 60 years to help the merchant marine and we are tired of it; we are not going to give you any chance; we are going to go into the business of building ships and operating them ourselves."

Mr. SMITH. And in the meantime, while we are waiting for this experiment to be tried, we shall have disposed of all our ships, the Shipping Board will have "gone to pot"; the old status will be reestablished, and then shipping interests will come back and ask for a subsidy. Now I want to call the Senator's attention——

Mr. BINGHAM. What the Senator from South Carolina states would not necessarily follow at all.

Mr. SMITH. It has necessarily followed up to the present time.

Mr. BINGHAM. The idea is not to postpone action on this measure until the experiment has been tried; but to wait until we see what the proposal involves and what the Congress thinks about it before definitely going on record as saying that we are going into the shipping business and to remain in it.

Mr. SMITH. Let me suggest to the Senator that some Members of Congress, after a very long experience, have pretty definitely made up their minds that they are going to test the present situation in a common-sense way. We own the ships; we have got a board appointed; we now propose to legislate to have that board function to demonstrate whether or not under these circumstances we can do what we have utterly failed to do by virtue of a subsidy. We have all the elements with which to try out an experiment.

The Senator read from the President's message in which the President said the present operation of ships was a drain on the Treasury, but if we are to take what the Senator and others have proposed, and provide a ship subsidy, I should like to know if that would not be a drain on the Treasury, without any hope of anything like the remunerations of the American people that the proposition of the Senator from Washington holds out to them?

If we admit that it is essential to the public welfare and the progress and development of this country that we should have a merchant marine, and it has been demonstrated that we can not have it along the lines of private ownership, then we have no other alternative but the one which is now facing us. We have tried for 50 or 60 years to build up the merchant marine under other plans without success. Now we have a fortunate condition that arose by virtue of the war that puts us in a position where we can try a justifiable experiment as to whether or not we can build a merchant marine under the auspices of the Government, and have auxiliaries for the Navy all splendidly equipped to respond in time of war, and in the meantime adequate to meet the necessities of the trade and commerce of the United States.

I can not see why it is not just as democratic—to use the broad meaning of that term—for us to engage in competition with foreign nations for the distribution of our goods to the markets of the world as it is for us to enter into an international agreement for the distribution of our mails.

Mr. COPELAND and Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, not one of the disasters contemplated by the Senator from South Carolina is likely to follow if this bill is amended as is now proposed. This does not contemplate at all whether the ships are to be sold or not to be sold. That is not involved in it. The law prescribes that they shall be sold when the sale can be made in a way that will guarantee the continued operation of the ships. The ships that have been sold, except those which were sold to Henry Ford and scrapped, are being operated as a part of the American merchant marine, under the American flag, as auxiliaries to our Navy in time of war. There is not a thing involved in the bill before us that has any reference whatever to the fundamental fact that the United States has decided that it will continue the operation of an American merchant marine until private interests come in.

The Senator from Connecticut, when he talked about this proposed line across the ocean, was not talking about disposing of or destroying the ships which we now have. This morning, before the Appropriations Committee, there was a discussion relative to this very question. The question of the rehabilitation or reconditioning of the Agamemnon and the Mount Vernon was before us, and this question was asked. I asked the question myself of the chairman of the Shipping Board, General Dalton, who has operated these ships:

> Suppose these ships are reconditioned. Suppose they are run in the meantime to accompany the Leviathan, of the United States Lines. And then suppose this private company impresses the country sufficiently so that this plan can be carried out. Will there be no use for these ships?

The reply of both these gentlemen was:

> Yes; certainly; because they will be put in the south Atlantic service. They will be running from Savannah, Ga., or from some other point into the Mediterranean or to Europe.

There is not anything here involving the question of the maintenance of an American merchant marine, a large part of it under the Shipping Board. That question is not involved. The question which has been raised by the Senator from Connecticut is, Shall we perform any act which will say to private interests, "We do not care to have you bid for any part of this service. This country is committed forever to the idea of Government ownership and Government operation"?

Mr. SMITH. May I ask the Senator in what respect the passage of the proposition now before us would interfere with the proposition of this company? Why could they not come on and make their proposition after the passage of this bill as well as now?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if the Senator from Connecticut will bear with me for a moment——

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. The reason is because this bill is in effect a notice to the world that the United States of America proposes to continue and maintain as a permanent policy Government ownership and operation. It seeks to destroy any hope that the Government will modify the ocean mail act so as to make possible the distribution to ships of funds which we now acquire from the sending of the mail. Does the Senator from South Carolina realize that last year, for carrying the mails across the Atlantic from New York to Europe, the United States Government paid a million and a half dollars to British ships? Why? Because we have no American ships capable of carrying that mail.

Mr. SMITH. Why have we not American ships capable of carrying that mail?

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator think the Government of the United States is going to appropriate the $100,000,000 or $150,000,000 necessary to give us those ships?

Mr. SMITH. That is not answering my question. If the Government has to pay out that much money to British ships there certainly must have been a profit in it to the British ships, or they would not have accepted that amount. They would have demanded an increased amount.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. But if there is a profit to be made in the shipping business, why have not private American interests engaged in it and earned that profit?

Mr. COPELAND. I want to answer that question, and I will give a responsive answer. The law does not permit the Postmaster General to make any contracts for the carriage of the mails except within the limits of the appropriation. I ask the present occupant of the chair whether I am correct about that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is this a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. COPELAND. This is a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The answer is in the affirmative.

Mr. COPELAND. Last year, when the Post Office appropriation bill was before the Senate, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] put a rider upon the bill which provided that no part of the appropriation should be used for the carrying out of contracts theretofore made between the Postmaster General and these private shipping interests. Until we pass a law stabilizing the making of contracts and the arrangements between the Government and shipping concerns, there will never be built a ton of vessels capable of such speed as to carry the mail, and capable of such speed as to be of service to the American Navy in time of war.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I have only a very few moments more to speak, and I should like to be permitted to finish. I yield, however.

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator will permit me, I just want to call attention to one sentence that the Senator from New York used, where he said "until the Government stabilizes contracts." He meant, until the Government makes a subsidized contract we will not have any shipping.

The Senator from New York knows that on account of certain conditions that would involve the modification or perhaps the abrogation or repeal of numerous laws, private concerns are not going to go into the shipping business. He knows that, because he knows that of all people in the world the American Yankee can smell the possibility of making a dollar farther than any other individual on earth; and if there had been a reasonable profit in the shipping business the American flag would be floating in every bay and in every harbor of the world. The reason why it is not there is because there is no profit in it.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I was thinking of asking unanimous consent that this colloquy be placed in the RECORD following my remarks.

Mr. COPELAND. I will answer the Senator's statement in my own time. I thank the Senator from Connecticut. I intend to answer it fully if I am able to do so.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I merely want now to address a few remarks to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE].

His amendment, it will be recalled, relates to that part of the bill proposed by the Senator from Washington which would make it impossible for the Shipping Board to carry out the desires of the President or anyone else in selling any of these ships to private interests, to be operated under the American flag by private companies, unless every single one of the seven members of the Shipping Board was unanimously in favor of so doing.

It has been brought out, particularly in the remarks of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] yesterday, that the reason for putting in this provision was because he did not believe that the Shipping Board ought to sell any ships, and that they have been too liberal in selling ships before, although just why anyone who is interested in the merchant marine should be so resentful of having Americans desirous of going into the business of conducting our foreign trade in American bottoms I do not know. The fact remains, however, that the committee recommended this unanimous-consent proposal.

As one reads history one finds that legislative bodies have almost never been willing, or have not been successful if they tried to do it, to operate continuously under unanimous consents. The Senate does a great deal of business under unanimous-consent agreements; but whenever anyone does object it is perfectly possible, by motion and by the vote of the majority, to bring about the result which is objected to by one or two Senators. In history we read that the Polish Diet, in the Middle Ages, operated under a constitution which provided that any single member of it could block business; and the result was that it was one of the most unsuccessful legislative bodies in all history and led to such bad government on the part of Poland that Poland was unable to continue its national entity for a great many years thereafter.

In modern times, as has been referred to by the distinguished senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], we have the example of the Council of the League of Nations, which operates only by unanimous vote. It can not do anything if any single person objects; and, of course, if the committee feels that the League of Nations and its council have been so successful under this unanimous-consent clause that they desire to have the Shipping Board operate under it, they are at liberty to think so; but personally, I do not care to copy the method under which the League of Nations attempts to do business.

There is no board of directors in the world that operates under any such clause. People who are interested in their own property; people who are interested in making a living; people who are interested in securing interest on their investments; people who have the interest of their families at heart; when they give to boards of directors, as we are giving to the Shipping Board, the duty of operating their business successfully, have in no case that I have ever heard of told the board of directors that it could not sell any of the property of the concern unless the board of directors was unanimously of the same mind.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. I am curious to know whether or not the Senator has investigated to find out whether or not the members of the present Shipping Board have ever agreed, at any time, on any proposition presented to that body.

Mr. BINGHAM. Not so far as I have ever heard, Mr. President.

Mr. WATSON. They never will.

Mr. BINGHAM. In fact, human nature is such that we seldom find seven citizens agreeing on any matter, whether it be church or state, whether it be politics or business, or even as to where a bunker shall be placed on the fifteenth hole at the local golf club. Fortunately it is so; otherwise the world would be the most disastrously, hopelessly monotonous place in the world if people's minds were all built on the same lines so that they were in accord. Taking advantage of human nature being what it is, it has been our practice from time immemorial to give to legislative bodies the right to decide matters by a majority vote or by a two-thirds vote and to give to small bodies like the Supreme Court or the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Shipping Board the right to decide by a majority vote.

The present proposal is contrary to all our practice, and there is only one reason for it, Mr. President, and that is the attempt to prevent the Shipping Board from operating at all under the provisions provided in the act.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. May I ask the Senator if he has pointed out the fact, too, that the Shipping Board is organized as a regional institution, with two members from the Pacific coast, two from the Atlantic, and so on?

In other words, if any matter which apparently involved the highest interests of the country at large were involved here, the local influence would lead at least two members of the board to vote against what might be for the interests of the entire country. So it seems to me absurd to think that the interests of the country could ever be served by requiring a unanimous vote on the part of the Shipping Board.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I agree entirely with the Senator. The point which he has raised is an excellent one, and has been seen exemplified in the history of the Shipping Board, when local interests who desired that certain things be done attempted through the Shipping Board to prevent it by securing the votes of the members who lived in that part of the country.

We are none of us unwilling or unable to receive suggestions from our friends or to operate under the circumstances under which we have been brought up and the surroundings under which we have lived. It leads us to take a different view of things. In conclusion, I should like to repeat, so far as I have been able to discover the only object of introducing that particular feature in the law is to prevent the Shipping Board from operating at all, and therefore I am heartily in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey. It seems to me that anyone who is opposed naturally to Government ownership or Government operation of business enterprises of this kind must of necessity be willing to support the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts desires to propound a question to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator does not need to answer my question unless he wishes. I was about to ask him who were the individuals and companies now making the proposal to build new, modern, and fast ships that were to engage in interocean shipping under private ownership. In view of the many obstacles which it is alleged have been resorted to to obstruct the developing of an American merchant marine, some of us are suspicious that these propositions are not now made in good faith, being made at the very time of the discussion here of this important measure and never heard of before. I would like to have the Senator, if he sees fit to make reply, tell us who these individuals are, what their connections are with the shipping business, to what extent we can rely on their present promises? Are they doing this in good faith and to what extent they have been engaged in the shipping business, or is this simply a gesture made here on the eve of the attempt to pass this bill to raise further obstacles and objections to the development of an American merchant marine?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I am surprised and astonished that the Senator from Massachusetts should think this was some new thing, some new gesture raised at the last moment. It is a matter which has been talked about in the public prints for some months, and I read about it last summer for the first time after I came back from China. The company concerned is one of the largest and best known shipbuilding companies in the world. The implications of the Senator from Massachusetts are entirely unworthy of him and of his knowledge of public affairs.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will say to the Senator that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. JONES], who sits right here, who has studied this question more than any man in this country, says he first heard rumors about what the Senator is talking of a few weeks ago.

Mr. BINGHAM. The London papers as far back as last November were talking about it. The Daily News, of London, in its issue of January 10, in the article to which I referred a while ago, and which I asked to have printed, said: "The Daily News, as far back as last November"——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is why some of us are suspicious, because so many of these reports and statements come through London papers; and of course the Senator knows——

Mr. BINGHAM. If the Senator wants to continue along those lines, I have no desire to engage in debate with him.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It is apparent the Senator is not willing to answer my question.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am willing if the Senator will give me an opportunity. He wants to know who the company is and who is the head of it. It is headed by Mr. Lawrence Wilder.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Who is he?

Mr. BINGHAM. He is the chairman of the Brown Boveri Electric Corporation, formerly the New York Shipbuilding Co. I submit to the Senator from New York, who knows more about it, whether I am correct or not.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I would like to say to my beloved friend, the Senator from Massachusetts, that I have heard the same rumor around the Chamber, that this is only a gesture, that this is put out simply to defeat this legislation. Of course, if I believed that, I would join the Senator from Massachusetts and every other honorable man and say, "We will have nothing to do with this crowd of men." But let me say this to my friend: The company proposing this fleet of vessels is the company which has just completed the Saratoga. The Senator is aware of the fact that we have just had placed in commission a $35,000,000 airplane carrier, to carry 100 airplanes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is not that a shipbuilding company, and not an operating company?

Mr. COPELAND. That is a building company.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What ships have ever been operated by this company which makes this proposition and which is suggested as the possible making of a privately owned merchant marine?

Mr. COPELAND. I would not say this company has ever operated any ships.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. They are going to start in the operating business when they get these ships?

Mr. COPELAND. If I may judge at all from the personnel named—and at a later time in my own remarks I am going to put into the RECORD a statement made by this company of the men involved in it—they are men of the highest business integrity, and men who have demonstrated their skill not alone in operating a great shipbuilding plant, but in operating railroads, and in operating steamships. There is no question about the honorable business integrity of these gentlemen.

Furthermore, let me say to my friend from Massachusetts that there is nothing here involved, so far as I can see, that has any important relationship to this measure.

If the Senator from Connecticut will bear with me for a moment, this bill has to do with our general policy. I am sure the Senator from Washington will bear me out in saying it has to do with our general policy. The statement of what these gentlemen are offering to do is not intimately related to this measure, except to this extent: That in a sense this bill is a warning to private interests that "We do not want your help, we do not want you to consider anything in the way of private investment in ships, because it is the intention of our Government to go forward forever in the operation of an American merchant marine."

Just one more word. I do want to impress upon the mind of the Senator from Massachusetts that these are honorable men, and I do not believe for one moment that there is anything coincident in this proposal, so far as seeking to defeat this legislation is concerned. As a matter of fact, they are not intimately related; and I hope at some future time, in my own time, to go into the matter extensively. But let me say now to the Senator that, so far as I know, this is a perfectly honest, legitimate, straightforward business proposal, and in no sense a piece of political chicanery.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the Senator from Washington and the Senator from Massachusetts had happened to live along the Connecticut shore, or the Long Island shore, last summer, they would not now be led astray by any of these rumors about this being a gesture, an attempt to defeat this bill. Those of us who live along the Connecticut shore and those living on Long Island heard of this project last summer, long before this bill was ever proposed, or any of us supposed it would ever come to the attention of the Senate.

Interests representing very large and powerful financial connections looked into the possibility of securing a terminal at Montauk Point, and looked into the possibility of securing a terminal at Narragansett Bay, and at New London, Conn.; particularly because at New London the State of Connecticut has built a million-dollar pier.

The Governor of Connecticut was keenly interested in the project. His attention was brought to the fact that this line of rapid steamers, if operated from New London, might bring to that port a great deal of business, and that these rapid steamers, and airplanes which they would carry when operating near shore, would be greatly to the advantage of the State of Connecticut.

A great enterprise of this kind, requiring, as it does, a certain amount of Government support, particularly in connection with the loan which I have mentioned, can not be rushed through, and this company and these gentlemen were proceeding in an orderly manner all through the summer and through the fall and through the winter, and they are now faced by this law. We are told we are to have a vote on it to-day. They are now threatened with a slap in the face, and naturally they have made their presence felt more than they did before. They did not suppose, nor, may I say, did the great majority of the citizens of the State of Connecticut suppose, that the Government was going back into the business of running ships. It was utterly strange and astonishing to me, knowing, as I do, the fact that the great majority of the people of this country do not want to see the Government in business, that the committee should propose this bill. That is why it was only in the last few days or weeks that Senators have heard about this new enterprise. Had they lived, as I have said, in Connecticut, or in Rhode Island, or on the Long Island shore, they would have heard about it last summer. The people who are back of it are entirely upright, outstanding, responsible citizens, who have had for many years the reputation of conducting their business in a thoroughly satisfactory and businesslike manner.

I hope the Senator from Massachusetts is satisfied with my answer to his question.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am not satisfied that there is a definite proposition presented to the American people by an existing company engaged in interocean shipping that is ready to establish private shipping lines that will assure us an American merchant marine.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understand from what the Senator says that there is a company that builds ships that is willing to build more ships, and very excellent ships, if the designs are to be relied upon, after they get Government aid. That there is an existing group of men and that there is on hand the money and that there is a disposition to at once, now, open up, under private interests, an American merchant marine, I am not satisfied. If I were, I would vote along the lines indicated by the Senator for something else than Government ownership and Government administration of an American merchant marine.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator is very hard to convince. It has been brought out repeatedly on this floor that under present conditions it is almost impossible for anyone to engage in the foreign trade, and yet the Senator says that because this company that proposes to do this and is willing to bind fifty or sixty million dollars' worth of private capital, if it can do it in a way that seems reasonable and businesslike, has not been operating ships, therefore he is unwilling to support their proposition.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Because their plan is one of uncertainty, and we have been passing through seven years of that, I want to end it. In view of our defense and our trade needs, I refuse to longer delay the establishment of an adequate merchant marine. With the only alternative being a Government merchant marine or the uncertainty of—I might add practical abandonment of hope—a privately owned merchant marine, I am for a definite policy of Government operation as an auxiliary to our Navy.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York desires to address an inquiry to the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. I do; I want to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut resume for that purpose?

Mr. BINGHAM. I do, if I may have the floor for that purpose.

Mr. COPELAND. I want to ask my friend from Massachusetts if he is aware of the significance of section 7 of the merchant marine act of 1920? The only interest this company about which we are talking now has in the matter pending before the Senate is this: Before this company can undertake to put a line in operation under the conditions of our law, they must have first in effect a certificate of necessity from the Shipping Board.

The only possible interest this company may have in the pending amendment is that if the amendment were to carry, and a unanimous vote be required in the Shipping Board on a matter of importance, it might well be that there are one or two men on the board—I am not saying there are, but there might well be—who are determined that no private interest shall engage in the shipbuilding business, that the Government shall continue to do it.

There is nothing in the Jones bill now pending that these people have said to me they oppose. They have said they are perfectly willing to have the bill. The question is not involved at all.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Then why prolong the discussion? If Senators are willing to have the bill passed, why are we postponing the vote? Why are Members now delaying action by quoting private interests who are willing to take over our merchant marine and develop with Government aid a merchant marine of private lines?

Mr. COPELAND. I am sure my friend from Massachusetts does not consider that any one of us is going to vote for or against the measure or any amendment because of this proposal. I am opposed to the amendment, because I think the highest interests of the country are involved in an arrangement by which a majority of the board can act. It does not relate at all to this question. It relates to the entire question of policy.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I appreciate the Senator's position. He is opposed to the amendment because it requires a unanimous vote of members of the Shipping Board to sell any Government-owned ship, and the Senator thinks that that requirement will result in discouraging private individuals from going into the shipping business. Is not that the Senator's position?

Mr. COPELAND. That is part of it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. My position is exactly the reverse. I want the Government to declare that the primary purpose of the existence of the Shipping Board is to maintain and operate a Government-owned and Government-operated merchant marine.

I take the amendment to be of great importance in declaring a definite policy. I want the members of the Shipping Board to know that it is the position of the Congress of the United States that they are not to seek customers, that they are not to sell ships by a mere majority vote, that it is not going to be the policy to liquidate our ships, but, on the contrary, the ships are to be sold only when there is a clear, unmistakable necessity and that all sales of ships must be justified on the ground that it is further contributing to the development of an adequate merchant marine.

I want the selling of our ships to be a secondary function and the developing of our merchant marine the primary business of the Shipping Board. Heretofore they have apparently thought more of getting out of the business than making an earnest effort to establish a successful and adequate merchant marine. That is the present administration's position—one of disfavor to Government operation. My position is that we must have Government operation or resign ourselves to the fate of possessing no American merchant marine.

My position, I repeat, is exactly contrary to the Senator's. He does not want any amendment to the bill which will affect the present policy of disposing of our ships. I want a policy which will end, and end once for all, the uncertainty of the present policy, and which will give notice to the world that we are looking forward to the development of an adequate merchant marine under the auspices and direction of our own Government, not simply for commerce but for naval and defense purposes.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BINGHAM. With the kind permission of the Presiding Officer, I desire to yield the floor.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is recognized.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. May I say this final word to the Senator from Massachusetts? I understand fully his position and honor him fully for any position he takes, because I know no Member of this body has loftier sentiments and motives than he. But, of course, the Senator has practically committed himself to professional ownership and operation. He is seeking through this measure to do what I said the other day is proposed by it. It is legislation by indirection. There are other features of the present law which are still in existence. It continues to be the duty of the board, when they are satisfied that a line or service should be sold, to sell it. The only difference is that in one instance it would be by majority vote, as it is at present, and under the pending bill it would be by unanimous vote. So the Senator does not accomplish all the things that he has in mind by the adoption of the amendment, because still the duty would devolve upon the board, under certain circumstances, to sell the ships. Of course, it would have to be, with this amendment, a unanimous vote of the board.

THE MERCHANT MARINE

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 744) to further develop an American merchant marine, to assure its permanence in the transportation of the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I am thoroughly convinced that the degree of interest in building up and maintaining an American merchant marine is not to be determined by the number of Senators who are in the Chamber at this time. absence of others largely because of committees which are in session at this hour.

I am of the opinion that there is no question which commands a more sympathetic interest from those who see the importance of this arm of industry and defense, because from the beginning we have recognized the growing possibilities of our overseas trade. From the nature of the case the consumptive power of the world is continuously increasing. The diversity of production in all parts of the world is on the increase. We recognize the fact that the trade between our country and other countries is bound to be continuously enormous, with an increase from year to year. Only a few years ago our foreign trade was counted in the hundreds of millions. Now, it is counted in the billions. Last year it was very close to ten billions. That is only a suggestion of what it is to be in the future. Even without the increase of population there would be an increase in the foreign trade. That is inevitable.

I am thoroughly convinced that the United States ought to build up and maintain an American merchant marine not only because it is absolutely necessary as a national defense but also because it would be very wise in the growth of commerce, from a commercial standpoint as well as from a defensive standpoint. The argument to me is incontrovertible. Therefore, I have no sympathy with the suggestion that we can afford to abandon the American merchant marine to the carrying powers of other countries. I have not the slightest sympathy with that suggestion. On the other hand, I think it is rather a fatal position to take, for what would be the situation of the country should we be involved in war with foreign countries and have to depend upon foreign countries for ships to carry the necessary munitions and men which would be involved in a war? To me it is unthinkable that we should voluntarily abandon the merchant marine from the standpoint of national defense.

Then from the standpoint of commerce I can see tremendous possibilities in the development of a merchant marine, not only in the number of ships that would be on the sea or in the people that are employed in the running of the ships, but I can see it reflected in the shipbuilding yards and shops of America. I am of the opinion that American genius is such that if once we were launched upon a legitimate shipbuilding program, we would easily build the ships for our own country, if we did not enter upon the building of ships for other countries. The latter, of course, is quite problematical, but there is no doubt about the former.

From the standpoint, therefore, of defense and of commercial growth the question is hardly open to debate so far as I am concerned. That part of the resolution, therefore, which affirms, as a permanent policy of the Government, the building up and maintenance of an adequate merchant marine meets with my very hearty approval.

When we pursue the question further we seem to be met with what appears to be an alternative. That is, can we build and operate the merchant marine by private enterprise? If not, what is the recourse? If we can build a merchant marine by private enterprise, I think it would be very unwise not to open the way and keep it open to do it. In other words, I am fundamentally opposed to Government ownership and operation of any great enterprise that can be owned and operated by private enterprise. That is a fundamental principle with me, and I need not argue it here. We have had experience in the past which closes that argument so far as I am concerned.

There is, therefore, a very striking difference between my view and the views just announced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. To remove the uncertainty that is in both his mind and my mind, he would immediately pronounce as a definite policy the abandonment of further sales of ships to private enterprise and definitely launch upon a Government operation and administration of the shipping interests. In that degree we are in very sharp difference. The only thing I could say about Government operation is that it would be the last resort with me. If I am convinced that there is no chance for a merchant marine owned and operated by private enterprise, I shall not refuse to vote for the Government to do it when the alternative would be to abandon it altogether. In other words, as between abandoning an American merchant marine on the one hand and Government ownership and operation on the other hand, I am going reluctantly to choose the latter, because I think it is extremely important that we do maintain this agency of our people, hopeful that it might be done by private enterprise rather than Government ownership and operation.

The question is before us now whether we are convinced that there is no chance for private enterprise. I know that the outlook is rather gloomy. The past has been unusually displeasing. It has rather been a disappointment.

I would not hesitate a moment—and I have in the past so voted—to make up the difference out of the Treasury of the Government between the cost of the operation of ships by foreign operators and the cost of such operation by American operators. There are certain things that are definitely known. It is known that the cost of operating American ships is greater than the cost incurred by our competitors in operating their ships. We pay a certain scale of wages; we require under the law certain standards of living accommodations and food. We discriminate against the employment of persons who are not citizens of our own country. We impose such restrictions as to make the cost of the operation of an American ship under the American flag vastly beyond the cost of operating a ship under a foreign flag. I would be perfectly willing, if the amount could be specifically determined, to pay the difference out of the Treasury, making an allowance to labor. That would be a subsidy, it is true, to the labor employed in the American merchant marine; but, in a sense, we do that in the case of industries operating on land. We do not pay out of the Treasury, it is true, any subsidy to labor in industry, but we do protect the laborer engaged in industry by building a wall between him and the cheaper labor of his competitors across the sea. In this respect we have absolute control of the industries of the country because our law covers them. That tariff law, in its operation, is coexistent with the boundaries of the country. It does not, however, extend beyond the physical limits of our territory, and as soon as we go beyond that, out into the open sea, where our law by the imposition of tariff duties can not prevent foreigners competing with us, we are incapable of maintaining by law our standard; in other words, we can maintain our scale of wages in continental America, and continue our industries in operation, but the moment we undertake to do the same thing on the open sea our law does not protect. Therefore open competition drives American shipping off the sea though we do maintain our industries on the land.

If the difference between the cost of operating our American merchant marine and the cost of our competitors in operating their merchant marine could be determined definitely—and it could be—I would be willing to make up that difference by a subsidy to the labor employed, but unfortunately that proposition has never met with sufficient support to enable us to inaugurate it. A bill containing such a provision did pass the House of Representatives at one time, but it failed to receive sufficient support here, and I am rather constrained to believe that there is such a prejudice against the idea of making up the difference between the cost of operation here and abroad under the name of a subsidy that the prospect of the enactment of such legislation is not promising, nor do I believe that we are ever going to be able to enter upon that phase of the solution of the problem. There are, however, Senators here who think that there will be a change of opinion on the subject. If I could think there would be such a change, I would not have any distress of mind at all as to what we should do.

I am rather of the opinion that there are only three alternatives—private ownership with some governmental assistance; Government ownership and operation; or else our ships are going to disappear from the sea. The latter course, I think, would be fatal.

There is a contention among Members that we could meet the difference by some form of subvention under which the Government would pay for what appeared to be some specific public service, such as carrying the mails, and so on. I am not convinced that that would work; in fact, I do not think it would.

It has also been suggested that we could solve the problem by discriminatory tariff rates, providing for the imposition of lower duties on goods imported in American bottoms. I do not think that would work. It has worked in times past in the history of other governments, but it would not work with us. I respect the position of certain Members who think it would, but here is the situation that would face us: As certainly as we should provide discriminatory duties in favor of goods coming in American bottoms as against those coming in foreign bottoms, the governments against whom we discriminated would retaliate and do the same thing as to us, favoring the goods coming in their bottoms as against those coming in American bottoms.

The fact that our export trade is in excess of our import trade throws the balance of trade in our favor, and thus a discrimination of the kind to which I have referred would not help us but would hurt us. The discriminations we might make would be much less than the discriminations which would be made against us; so I think that logically the method of building up the American merchant marine by a system of discriminatory tariff rates would work against the American merchant marine instead of for it. So I am not convinced of the strength of that argument.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to make a suggestion to my colleague, if it will not interrupt him for me to do so.

Mr. FESS. It will not interrupt me at all.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to suggest in this connection, quite in harmony with the statement my colleague is making as to the inadequacy of the discriminatory duty proposition, that in the act of 1920 the President was specifically requested to negotiate as to that matter, but three Presidents—President Wilson, President Harding, and President Coolidge—representing two different political parties, have absolutely declined to act in that direction. So whatever Congress might think about it, we have found from experience that the Executive has encountered such difficulties that such a method can not be considered practical as an aid to the merchant marine.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I am very much obliged to my colleague for calling my attention to that; and it reminds me of an interesting situation.

I was one of the Members of the other House who at the time very bitterly criticized President Wilson for not enforcing that particular provision of the law. I thought it was a case of a President openly ignoring a decree of the legislative branch of the Government in the form of a bill which had already been signed by the Executive. Then when President Harding came to the White House and the same question was presented to him, I was so much concerned that I talked to him about it. I found that he took the same position as that taken by President Wilson and that he could not see his way clear to violate at least the spirit of treaties and therefore he could not attempt to enforce the provision. I thank my colleague for reminding me of rather an interesting situation when we attempted this very method of solving the problem a number of years ago. I do not believe even if the way were open to administer such a provision of law that it would afford a solution or give any adequate relief.

Mr. President, there is another feature that makes the case of still more interest to me, and that is that we have had a merchant marine in our history. At one time we were in first place in the carrying trade of the world, which indicates that we did have the genius to build up and maintain a merchant marine. When, however, Great Britain, as one of her chief activities, began to reach out for the overseas trade of the world she became so efficient in shipbuilding that apparently we could not keep up with her and our ships gradually left the seas.

Then in the course of humanitarian legislation we have constantly increased the difficulties of operating an American marine. I refer to such legislation as the seamen's act and other enactments not dissimilar to it. In other words, we are constantly growing away from the ability, privately, to build and operate ships.

That brings about a situation that is very depressing to me as one who is fundamentally opposed to Government operation and ownership. At the same time I recognize that the idea of such operation and ownership is encroaching upon the country step by step. The Mail Service is an example. Then that was enlarged by the Parcel Post Service, which is another example along the same line. The Parcel Post Service is bound to be increased in the future, and, of course, we are never going to abandon it as a Government-operated agency.

The same tendency may also be noted in connection with the building of waterways. There was some opposition to the construction of the Panama Canal on that ground, and I had considerable sympathy with that opposition; but the construction of that canal was such a stupendous undertaking, involving the expenditure of $400,000,000, that it was pretty generally conceded that if the canal ever were to be built it would have to be built by the Government rather than by private enterprise. So the Government of the United States entered upon that task and we are operating that canal to-day as a Government agency.

There are other steps which we are taking along similar lines which indicate that there is a strong sentiment growing up in our country on behalf of Government ownership. I deplore it. I think it presents a serious situation, and I believe the movement to be quite unwise, and yet no one can close his eyes to this growing sentiment. I need but refer to the transportation act. When the railroads were taken over by the Government it was purely a war emergency act.

I have sometimes wondered whether it would not have been better not to have taken them over, but that is water over the wheel, and is not now a subject for discussion. When, however, the time came for making good the promise to return the railroads to their owners in as good a shape as when the Government took them over, and President Wilson specifically, in various messages submitted to Congress, urged that the obligation be fulfilled, I was in the other body at the time, and I recall how the recommendation of the President was resisted. There was an effort to make Government operation perpetual, to avoid entirely the obligation under which the roads were taken. And when that proposal was defeated I recall the desperate efforts of Members of the House who believed in Government ownership and operation to defer the time for returning the roads. The fight came first on preventing the roads being returned. That availed nothing; then next came the fight against returning them at the time the President asked, but finally, after a tremendous struggle that lasted over months, we did reach an agreement to return the railroads to their owners in 1920. I mention that to indicate the popular sentiment back of Government operation or Government ownership.

We have the same principle in the Muscle Shoals matter. I am quite certain that if we could decide definitely, one way or the other, that Muscle Shoals is either to be a Government owned and operated agency, or, once for all, that it is to be leased upon a basis satisfactory to the authorities, to be recaptured in time, Muscle Shoals would not hang in the balance as it has been hanging all of these years. Our trouble is to determine what the policy shall be; and the dispute is between Government ownership and operation on the one hand and private ownership and operation or private leasehold and operation on the other.

I mention that to indicate the growth of sentiment in the country, whether wise of otherwise. I think it is rather unwise, but it is here supporting the idea of Government ownership and operation.

Now as to this particular proposal: I am opposed to the committee amendment to the bill requiring a unanimous vote of the Shipping Board to sell a ship. I never use the word "camouflage"; I think this is the first time in my life I ever used it; but it is the word that covers this subject. That amendment can mean only one thing, and it is useless for us to deceive ourselves about it. It is a definite announcement that the Government is abandoning a private merchant marine. There can not be any doubt about it.

Mr. EDGE. For good and all.

Mr. FESS. Yes; once for all.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TYDINGS in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. FESS. In a moment. If that is the alternative, and if I were convinced that we can not do it by private ownership and operation, then rather than abandon the enterprise altogether, I would be willing to go to operating and owning the merchant marine by the Government. But, Mr. President, I am not convinced that every avenue is closed, and that we must now announce, once for all, that we are entering upon this enterprise as a Government operation; for I am convinced, as I am certain every Senator must be convinced, with the growing sentiment and with the light of the past in our struggle over the return of the railroads and all of these other tremendous movements that are increasing Government ownership that if we take this step to-day or to-morrow we will never retrace it, because we will have then the interest of all of the Government with the tremendous influence of bureaus that when they once get a job it takes a 40-foot pole to pry them loose from it. It is scarcely possible.

Only to-day a suggestion was made to a committee about our doing certain things for a certain great agency of the Government; and it was stated that the difficulty with our closing the thing up is that if we closed it up certain bureaus would be disbanded, and they do not want to lose their jobs. That is a horrible statement to make, and yet all of us must recognize that that force is here, and the more you enlarge Government operation the greater becomes the force of that element; and I should like to be free to keep the Government away from everything that private enterprise can do. I think it is the wiser policy.

Did the Senator from Nebraska desire to interrupt me?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I wanted to ask the Senator if I understood him correctly as having come to the conclusion that private ownership is not possible at this time, and therefore he is willing to try Government ownership?

Mr. FESS. No. I was saying that our past history is very gloomy upon private enterprise having an opportunity on the sea, because of the difference in cost of operation between our vessels and those of our competitors. It is gloomy; but I am not convinced that we have reached the point where we can definitely say now that every avenue is closed to private enterprise, and that we are entering upon Government operation once for all. I am not ready to do that.

Mr. HOWELL. Then do I understand that the Senator is in favor of this bill as amended?

Mr. FESS. Yes; if the amendment is adopted which was offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE], permitting the sale of a ship when four members of the Shipping Board agree—that is, a majority out of the seven—instead of all of them. If that amendment is put in the bill it still leaves open the way to continue our efforts, through the Shipping Board, to build up a merchant marine.

If that is left open I will vote for this bill; but if the bill is framed in such a way that the vessels can not be sold, then I think the Senator will agree with me that that means closing all avenues to private enterprise, and we will have started definitely upon a Government-operation plan; and I do not want to do that until I am convinced that there is no other way.

Mr. HOWELL. A majority of the board has the right now to sell a ship.

Mr. FESS. The Senator means under the present law?

Mr. HOWELL. Under the present law.

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. HOWELL. Therefore, if this bill is passed with the provision set forth in the Edge amendment, it merely provides for reconditioning and building new ships.

Mr. FESS. Precisely; that is to say, that is in this bill, and it is not in the present law. I am willing to vote for that.

Mr. HOWELL. And those ships can be sold by the present Shipping Board the next day after delivery or reconditioning for such a price as the board sees fit.

Mr. FESS. Provided all of them vote for it.

Mr. HOWELL. No; provided the majority vote for it.

Mr. FESS. Oh, yes; if the Edge amendment were adopted.

Mr. HOWELL. The Shipping Board has been selling ships that cost our Government $100 a ton or more that could not be reproduced for $50 to $60 a ton, for $7.50 a ton. Is the Senator from Ohio in favor of building and reconditioning ships to be sold on any such basis?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, let me answer the Senator by making a little fuller statement.

When the shipping bill was up for discussion there was an offer for sale at something like $210 a ton. The Senator will recall that there was a tremendous agitation in the two Houses on the ground that that was less than it cost us to build the ships, because the building was done in war time, and it was done at a peak price.

Mr. HOWELL. Two hundred and ten dollars a ton for what class of ships?

Mr. FESS. These must have been merchant ships.

Mr. HOWELL. An ordinary specification cargo ship can be purchased now for from $40 to $50 a ton—at least abroad.

Mr. FESS. Yes; but I am speaking about how the Shipping Board was thwarted in making the sale because of the clamor that broke out in Congress that it was selling the ships for less than they cost. That was not quite a legitimate clamor, however, because the cost was abnormal. They were built in war time at tremendous cost, and we could not hope to get for them anything like what they cost us.

As to whether we would sell a ship to-day for less than it cost us, very likely we would have to or we could not sell it at all, because many of those ships are not efficient. They were built hastily; they were not built for the purpose of merchantmen, and consequently they would naturally cost us a good deal more than the price they would command in the market. So I think the Shipping Board should not be criticized if it sells a ship for less than cost if there is a reasonable ground for doing it, and frequently I should suppose there is.

Mr. HOWELL. Is the Senator satisfied that there was justifiable ground for selling the fleet of ships that plied between New York and Mediterranean ports for $7.50 a ton, payable 75 cents a ton a year?

Mr. FESS. I will say to my friend from Nebraska—and I say it very kindly—that I would take the judgment of the Shipping Board on that subject a great deal quicker than I would my own. I do not know the value of the ships, and I assume that they were justified in it. I have not any desire to criticize their action, because I do not see why there would be any reason for doing it unless it was on justifiable grounds.

Mr. HOWELL. The justification is that the Government should get out of the business at any price; and if we pass this bill we will be simply taking a necessary step to provide more money for more ships and for reconditioning present ships which may be sold on a similar basis the next day after completion.

Mr. FESS. I do not think so.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator a question. Is not that an admission on the part of my friend from Nebraska that this provision for a unanimous vote is put in there for the express purpose of preventing any ship ever being sold?

Mr. FESS. Evidently.

Mr. HOWELL. I will acknowledge that, so far as I am concerned, I am not willing to have any more money appropriated for the purchase or building of ships to be sold to private interests at sacrifice prices. Furthermore, I am satisfied from what has been stated here in the Senate during this debate that the only possible method of developing a shipping service for this country is for the Government to develop it and operate it.

If we are to do so, let us face the problem squarely and no longer temporize. Let us build up an organization to do this in the proper way, and not endeavor to continue running a receivership for our shipping business. A receivership is the worst possible kind of an organization for developing or even carrying on a business, and will always result in loss, as it has resulted in loss in connection with the Shipping Board up to the present time.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska must be conceded by every Member who knows him to be a man who thinks clearly and expresses his views without any equivocation, and I thank him for making that statement. Let us meet the issue squarely. This bill does not do it. This bill raises the square issue of whether we are going to abandon private ownership and operation and launch into Government ownership and operation. The Senator from Nebraska does not hesitate to say that that is what we ought to do, and he believes that we ought to do it by Government ownership and operation. I respect him for his statement; but there are utterances that have come yesterday and to-day from people interested in the passage of this bill in which that statement is denied.

I assert that the Senator from Nebraska has not only stated what the bill will do, but he has stated what the purpose of the bill is, namely, what I have said. Let us have the issue met here and now. Let us decide whether we want to abandon private ownership and operation, and whether we are for all time going into Government ownership and operation. The Senator thinks the latter would be the wiser. I differ from him. I think the latter would be unwise, unless it is the only thing that is open, and I am not yet convinced that it is.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. HOWELL. I do not regard this bill as finally fixing a policy for this Government.

Mr. FESS. I think it will.

Mr. HOWELL. I would hope, as a practical man, that it would. I believe that the only way for us to develop and maintain a merchant marine as an auxiliary to our Navy is to do it in just the same way that we have developed the Navy—run the business for blood, and not to aid our competitors. There is no private operation of American oversea shipping now, practically, from the ports of this country. Our shipping is constantly decreasing. The amount of cargoes of American goods carried in American bottoms is less to-day than a year ago or two years ago.

If we want an American shipping service for this country, also as an auxiliary to our Navy, we ought to face the situation as it is and no longer throw money away, as we have done, by conducting a shipping business under a legislative receivership.

Mr. FESS. When the Senator says we have no private operation, does he mean that the 336 ships that are run by the Shipping Board are run as public ships? Are they not privately operated? There are 336 such ships, with a dead-weight tonnage of 2,968,000 tons plus.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, two years ago, being very much interested in this shipping problem, I proceeded to the Mediterranean, and then down through the Red Sea and around Africa and back to New York, most of the way on cargo ships, for the purpose of learning something about the shipping business as it is conducted. I learned at that time that whereas the Shipping Board was doing a shipping business in that part of the world, they were doing it through agents and upon a plan that could result in nothing else but loss to the United States Government.

Mr. FESS. If the Shipping Board loses, what would the Government do?

Mr. HOWELL. I am talking about the board transacting its business through private operators, the private operators taking the profits when there are profits, and the Shipping Board taking the losses whenever there are losses.

Not long ago I met in the corridor of the Senate a former head of the Shipping Board. I asked him, "Why the failure of the Shipping Board and its constant deficits? Is it because you are trying to run a commercial business without hurting your competitors?" His answer was, "It is worse than that; it is running a commercial business aiding your competitors."

That is the trouble with our Shipping Board. You can not win in any business unless you run it for blood, and if the individual can not win otherwise, how can we expect the United States Government to succeed in any other way? But if a business is run under public ownership in that manner, it can be made successful, and I am confident that if we will establish our Shipping Board upon a permanent basis, and insist upon results, we can have results, yes, and profits—not these constant deficits.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I do not follow the Senator in his statement that the Shipping Board is committing these great errors and suffering these losses, and then arguing that if the Government should undertake what the Shipping Board is doing it would avoid all these things. My observation has been that with every agency which the Government operates the Government is much less efficient than private enterprise. I can understand that the same urge on the part of private enterprise might not materialize in the Shipping Board, in that the Shipping Board is not the owner of the ships, and therefore would suffer any loss that might accrue. I can see that difference. But the Senator is not convincing me in saying that because the Shipping Board has made blunders, as he alleges, that would not be experienced if a Government agency had charge of it.

Mr. President, in further reference to the possibility of private enterprise ultimately owning and operating the ships, when the war closed we had probably 1,100 ships tied up at the wharves. I was one of the Members of the other House very much interested in whether we could not use those ships in reviving our merchant marine, and I was perfectly willing to vote with others to make the experiment. We authorized the installation of as many of those ships as were necessary to continue service on the routes which then had been outlined.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. If the Senator will just wait until I finish this statement, I will yield.

We undertook to put these ships in commission; there was a good deal of extra expense that would not be met in the operation ordinarily, and, as I recall, the first year we suffered a loss of about $200,000,000, which seemed to be abnormal and shocking. The figures of loss kept decreasing from year to year, until year before last, as I recall, the deficiency appropriation called for was about $50,000,000. As I recall, last year the deficiency appropriation was somewhere about $18,000,000.

I take it from that that the Shipping Board from year to year was gradually approaching the point where the service was paying, and during all those years the Shipping Board did find markets for sales of ships, which indicated that the ships must have been profitable or they could not have been sold, for nobody would buy under conditions of loss.

I have felt all along that if we permit the Shipping Board to continue in the light of what we have been able to do in these eight years, we will reach the point where, under the board, we will be a paying institution on the sea. I think I am justified in that statement, in view of what has been done in these years.

My concern about the matter is that we have not made any provision for building new ships, and no provision especially for reconditioning old ones. That is taken care of in this bill, and I shall not hesitate at all to vote for those provisions which authorize the building of new ships or the reconditioning of old ones, because we know that a ship constantly in service depreciates and in time will be useless. That is why I do not hesitate to vote for that provision in the bill. Such a provision is not in the present law and is, therefore, in my judgment, essential. In other words, in the light of the progress of the Shipping Board, reaching the place where shipping might be made profitable—and I think, judging by what has been done, we are justified in thinking it will reach that point—I am willing to vote that the Government shall not only recondition old ships but shall replace ships, at Government expense, to continue in operation, in the hope that in the progress of time we will be able to have an American merchant marine that can easily be sold, if occasion arises, because it will be profitable. But I can not vote for the bill if we keep the committee amendment in it, which, in my judgment, means an abandonment entirely of the theory of a privately owned and operated merchant marine.

Now I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio has already said in better words than I could choose what I had in mind, that if we are to continue a Government owned and operated merchant marine there must be replacements; and I think I am right in saying that the Senator from Washington estimated those replacements at $25,000,000 a year for 10 years. Am I right in that?

Mr. JONES. The Shipping Board program submitted covered a period of 15 years, and it would be about twenty or twenty-five million a year; about $250,000,000, in round numbers.

Mr. COPELAND. That is what I wanted to bring out, that these replacements which will be necessary to put the merchant marine owned by the Government on a paying basis must be made.

Mr. FESS. This bill provides for it.

Mr. COPELAND. And that will be $25,000,000 a year for 15 years. We have to face that.

Mr. FESS. I have heard most of the suggestions of the Senator from New York and he and I agree on this, that we must not abandon the merchant marine.

Mr. COPELAND. Oh, no.

Mr. FESS. And if we can avoid Government ownership and operation, it is wise to do so. In the light of what the Shipping Board has been able to do, I feel that, with the assistance of the Government, we will be able to put the merchant marine on a safe-paying basis and need not take it over by the Government in toto.

Mr. COPELAND. If the Senator will permit, I am in the fullest accord with the Senator from Ohio, and I want to say, further, that I think that there are certain services which will always be maintained by the Government. There are services out of the Gulf, there are some services in the South Atlantic that will never be attractive to private interests, because they have not in them the possibility of profit. Then there must always be surplus ships. We have had two examples, one a very recent experience in connection with the coal strike in England. Our citrus fruits in the West and the cereals from the Central West were not being moved because all the surplus foreign bottoms, particularly British ships, were occupied in carrying coal to Newcastle; and if we had not had a supply of surplus ships this country, and particularly the western parts of the country, would have suffered severely. The maintenance of certain lines will never be attractive to private interests, and in the maintenance of a supply of surplus ships, of reserve ships, the Shipping Board, in my judgment, for the next 50 years will be needed and will carry on a very important function. So I am in full accord with what the Senator from Ohio has said about the perpetuity of this work.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I have covered about what I had in mind when I rose. I am deeply concerned about the maintenance of the merchant marine. I think, from the standpoint of national defense, it is fatal to leave the sea. I think it is most unwise to permit the great agency of overseas commerce to be conducted by other countries and we not have any share in the activity. Both from the standpoint of defense and commerce I think a merchant marine is quite important, and I do not want by my vote to abandon the sea. I want it as the very last resort to come to Government ownership and operation. I would come to that if it were necessary, but I do not believe it is necessary, and I think I am justified by the progress of the Shipping Board since it has been in existence.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President——

Mr. FESS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HOWELL. If I understood the Senator aright, recently in his remarks he referred to the sales made by the Shipping Board and expressed his belief that they must have been made as a result of the lines becoming profitable. In other words, he practically admits that just as soon as a shipping line became profitable the Shipping Board has sold that line and continued to run the unprofitable lines. Such being the case, is there any wonder that the Shipping Board is always showing a deficit?

Mr. FESS. If the policy of the Government is to get out of the shipping business and the instruction to the Shipping Board is to that effect, one of the chief methods is first to build up the business to the point where there can be a purchaser obtained, and there is no purchaser as long as there is a loss. Of course, there will be no sale unless there is a profitable line. If we can say we are not going to sell a line because it is profitable, of course that is tantamount to saying that we shall not sell it at all. The Shipping Board was acting under the policy of the Government when it was selling these lines.

Mr. HOWELL. Is it wise for the Shipping Board to sell only the profitable lines and continue to operate the unprofitable lines? Why, under such circumstances it is playing into the hands of private interests. Whenever a dollar is to be made, a private interest is at hand to take it away from the Government, but if there is a dollar of loss the Government must continue to operate. Why should the Government not continue to operate the profitable lines and use their surpluses to offset the losses of other lines? The contrary is in accord with the policy involved in the purchase of the Cape Cod Canal. The Cape Cod Canal did not pay 6 per cent on $1,800,000 and, therefore, the owners of the Cape Cod Canal wanted to sell it. The only interest that could be prevailed upon to buy such bankrupt concern was the United States Government, and they actually prevailed upon the Government to pay $11,500,000 therefor.

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Nebraska can not "shake his gory locks" at me on the Cape Cod Canal question, because I voted with him on that matter.

Mr. HOWELL. Here is the reverse of the proposition. Whenever the Shipping Board, the Government, has developed a particular line of vessels to a point where they are profitable, immediately steps up a private interest and says, "We will take these off your hands, and as soon as you get another line in a profitable condition and have borne all the losses of development we will take that also." That is exactly what the Shipping Board has been doing for such interests. That has been the policy of the administration and, if I can judge, it is the policy advocated by the distinguished Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the Senator is certainly not disturbed as to what the policy of the Government is as announced in the law. It was not a Government-operated merchant marine. The policy was for the Government to get out of the operation of a merchant marine. The Shipping Board was operating under that policy under specific directions. Of course, they could not sell any line until it became profitable, because no buyer would buy it; and if they are to be condemned because they did what the law required them to do, on the basis that they should not have sold anything until they could bring it to a profitable basis, the Government would still be operating the ships. I think the Senator must concede that.

Mr. HOWELL. Does the law provide that the Shipping Board must sell a shipping line as soon as it is profitable?

Mr. FESS. The policy of the Government was announced to get the Government out of the shipping business.

Mr. HOWELL. That is also the policy of the administration?

Mr. FESS. That was the law.

Mr. HOWELL. Does the law provide that as soon as a line of vessels becomes profitable it must be sold?

Mr. FESS. Not "must," but it was the policy that it should be sold.

Mr. HOWELL. I think there is a question about that.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. FESS. I am glad to yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. JONES. There has been quite a sharp difference of opinion with reference to the policy as laid down in the shipping act of 1920, but I do know, and I think we clearly expressed it, too, that it was the idea of those who framed the act that these ships should be sold only when the board was convinced that by such sale they could promote and would promote the establishment and development and maintenance of a permanent merchant marine.

Mr. FESS. That is what the Shipping Board has been attempting to do, as I understand.

Mr. JONES. There is quite a difference of opinion with reference to that.

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Nebraska takes the view that under the development of the Shipping Board, where a route had been efficiently operated and the trade was large enough that it became a paying route, that then it should not be sold by the board, because it was a paying route. Evidently they should have sold the ships which were not on a paying route. In the first place, they could not find any buyer for any route that was operated at a loss under the operation of the law which required that it had to be carried on. The only route that could be sold would be one that had been brought to the point where there was a profit, else there would not have been any purchaser. I do not think there is any ground for criticizing the Shipping Board because they sold a ship that was operating profitably. That needs no comment at all. They simply could not have sold any ship if it had not become profitable, and if we say they should not do it, what is the purpose of criticizing the Shipping Board?

Mr. HOWELL. If the distinguished Senator from Ohio had appointed me as his business manager of an enterprise, and whenever I was able to make some particular department profitable I had sold it and denied him the profit, but kept on operating the unprofitable departments, it would not have been long before the distinguished Senator from Ohio would have informed me that my services were no longer desired. Why should we do differently by the American people than the distinguished Senator from Ohio would do in like circumstances with reference to his own business?

Mr. FESS. Article 5 of the act provides:

That in order to accomplish the declared purpose of this act and to carry out the policy declared in the act (section 1), the board is authorized and directed—

It is not permissive; it is mandatory—

the board is authorized and directed to sell, as soon as practicable, consistent with good business methods and the objects and purposes to be attained by this act, at public or private competitive sale, after appraisement and due advertisement, to persons who are citizens of the United States, except as provided in section 6 of this act, all of the vessels referred to in section 4 of this act or otherwise acquired by the board.

Mr. HOWELL. In accord "with good business methods."

Mr. FESS. The good business practices were the judgment of the group which were selling them.

Mr. HOWELL. What would the Senator think of that group if they should similarly conduct a business for him?

Mr. FESS. If I wanted to go out of that business, I would——

Mr. HOWELL. The Senator would employ that group, would he not and with a certainty of getting out?

Mr. FESS. I would.

Mr. President, in the course of my remarks I mentioned the declining losses in the operation of ships. I asked the chairman of the Shipping Board for those figures. I hold in my hand his statement and a letter accompanying the statement. I ask unanimous consent to insert these in the RECORD at the close of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD, OFFICE OF THE CHAIRMAN,
Washington, January 26, 1928.

Hon. SIMEON D. FESS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR FESS: In accordance with the request of Mr. Martin, of your office, I am transmitting herewith a statement of net appropriations received by the United States Shipping Board from the United States Treasury for the period July 1, 1919, to June 30, 1928, covering both the Shipping Board proper and the Merchant Fleet Corporation.

The appropriations for 1920, 1921, and 1922 under the head of "Construction of vessels," and totaling $583,129,771.72, was an outgrowth of the war construction program, and can be said to be chargeable to our war activities. Our operation activities up to and including the fiscal year 1920 showed a substantial return or profit and no appropriation for operations was necessary. You will note that in 1922 we had a $48,500,000 appropriation, which has dwindled from that time down to the fiscal year 1928, when it is $17,000,000, and our estimates for 1929 are $12,000,000.

This figure, of course, does not cover the original money spent in 1918 and 1919 for purely war construction purposes, but covers the period from and after we began to operate ships.

Very truly yours,

NOTE.—All the above appropriations are stated net of unexpended balances which have been actually returned to the U. S. Treasury.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, on yesterday I made some very brief comments regarding the Shipping Board and the proposed sale of ships. I stated that the purchaser of numbers of these ships, the Dollar Co., with headquarters in San Francisco, had had numbers of ships under the British flag and one or two under the Japanese flag. That statement of mine has been very sharply denied by Robert Dollar, the president of that company, in San Francisco. After making a denial and accusing Senators of stating what was not the fact, he said, referring to the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and myself:

If the Senators would refer to the records of the United States Shipping Board, they would find all the material necessary to correct their remarks. Nothing else need be said.

His son, Stanley Dollar, the vice president of the Dollar Co., who is now in the East, made the statement yesterday that—

The Dollar Line is not only one of the largest shipowners under the American flag but it is the largest owner of passenger tonnage and the only company engaged in the trans-Pacific trade wholly under the United States flag and has been for years. We sold the last of our British vessels a few days ago. We have none now. Every one of our vessels now sails under the American flag. We have never owned a vessel under the Japanese flag in our history.

Mr. President, there are two British companies in Canada, of which Mr. A. Melville Dollar is president. The headquarters of those companies, I believe, is in Vancouver, British Columbia.

The Journal of Commerce of New York of Monday, January 21, 1928, on page 20, section 1, contained this statement:

The steamers Albert Dollar, M. S. Dollar, and Alice Dollar, all under British registry, have been purchased from the Dollar Steamship Line by the Canadian-American Shipping Co. (Ltd.), of which A. Melville Dollar is president, for a consideration of about one and one-half million dollars. They are to be operated in the United Kingdom and Continent and oriental service, which the Canadian-American Co. has been operating for the past few years with chartered tonnage.

Mr. President, I need not comment to any considerable extent on this situation. The statements speak for themselves. Mr. Dollar has told the truth in saying that within the last few days his company has sold its British ships, but he failed and neglected to tell the American people in this public statement that the Dollar Co. sold them to a British company, of which his brother is president.

I do not propose to-day to discuss at length the policy of our Government in regard to shipping. I do not approve Government ownership unless it shall be absolutely necessary. I approve private ownership of our shipping if it can be properly conducted and if the ships can be placed in the hands of proper persons.

Mr. President, we must establish a national policy. I am a member of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee. As a member of that committee I consider it of the utmost importance that we look into the question of the sale of American ships, as to where they are going and by whom they are being purchased and operated. I am going to call a spade a spade. There is a banker on the Pacific coast, the president of the Anglo-London-Paris Bank, named Herbert Fleishhacker, who has a large interest in the Dollar Line. My understanding is that he has advanced large sums of money to that company. His agent has been in Washington for a long time past negotiating with our Shipping Board looking to the purchase of the remainder of our ships. This agent was active in Washington with our Shipping Board for some time prior to the sale of the last ships to the Dollar Co. Mr. President, I know who that man is and I disapprove his methods thoroughly. Mr. Fleishhacker has engaged agencies to do his work whom I do not consider proper agencies.

The President of the United States in his message, which was read this morning by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], stated:

The United States Government fleet is transporting a large amount of freight and reducing its drain on the Treasury. The Shipping Board is constantly under pressure, to which it too often yields, to protect private interests, rather than serve the public welfare. More attention should be given to merchant ships as an auxiliary of the Navy. The possibility of including their masters and crews in the Naval Reserve, with some reasonable compensation, should be thoroughly explored as a method of encouraging private operation of shipping.

My opinion is that Mr. Fleishhacker has been exercising entirely too much influence on our Shipping Board through his agents. He is seeking to obtain a monopoly of the Pacific coast shipping through the various companies in which he is interested financially. He has, through his influence, secured a clause in the tenders for these ships which, in my opinion, will strangle competition on the Pacific coast, will shut out numbers of the small independent shippers and also some of our large shippers, and which will do harm to the various shipping centers of the Pacific coast. By the interchange-of-ports provision in the bids he is thus attempting to strangle competition and to get the control of the Pacific Ocean in his own hands through the Dollar Steamship Co. and other companies in which he is interested.

There is another company to which I will refer briefly in which Mr. Fleishhacker is interested to a certain extent, which is a British company—the "China Import & Export Co." with agents in China. I have here an article from the New York Herald Tribune, of January 6, in which it is stated that from the information coming from Shanghai, foreign interests are attempting to secure the balance of our ships. This same article has appeared in the press on the Pacific coast. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NYE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune, Friday, January 6, 1928]

UNITED STATES HOLDS UP FREIGHTER SALE FOR INVESTIGATION OF POOL BID—BOARD AGENT AT SHANGHAI DEMANDS EXPLANATION OF SOURCE OF $1,000,000 BELIEVED SUPPLIED BY ALIENS TO GET CONTROL OF PACIFIC TRADE

By Thomas F. Millard. By cable to the Herald Tribune

(Copyright, 1928, New York Tribune, Inc.)

SHANGHAI, January 5.—Alertness of the United States Shipping Board to prevent foreign capital from obtaining a hold on American shipping in the Pacific Ocean was shown here to-day when William Hunt, local agent of the Shipping Board, required C. L. Seidtz, shipping agent here, to explain the source of $1,000,000 to be subscribed to a pool bidding on 37 freighters recently ordered sold by the Government.

Members of the pool are the Dollar Steamship Line; Columbia Pacific Shipping Co., operated by Dant & Russell, of Portland, Oreg.; another American firm, believed to be Swayne & Hoyt, of San Francisco; and Seitz, of Shanghai.

The total amount bid was $8,000,000, of which Dant & Russell subscribed $4,000,000, the Dollar Line $2,000,000, Seitz $1,000,000, and San Francisco interests the remainder. Suspicion was aroused regarding Seitz's subscription, because, although he is an American citizen born in China, his entire business life has been associated with British interests. He also is head of the China Export & Import Lumber Co., a British corporation, and is a director of Arnhold & Co., who are associated with the Davic Sassoon Co., which, in turn, is related extensively to British oriental trade.

Seitz made an affidavit denying that British capital was involved and stated that his subscription really was provided by Dant & Russell. It is understood that the local Shipping Board agent is not satisfied with the explanation and is wondering why part of the Dant & Russell subscription seems to come from China. There is much interest about the disposition of these ships, which will play a big part in shipping here.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, certain shipping interests have been heard extensively; those who are trying to secure the monopoly I speak of who are interested in purchasing the ships; but I contend that a large part of the shippers themselves should have their day in court which they have not had, and that the Shipping Board should hold public hearings on the Pacific coast in order to give those men opportunity to be heard.

I shall not go further into the details of the interlocking directorates, so to speak, and of the various companies in which Mr. Fleishhacker is interested further than to state that, in my opinion, from the information I have, foreign interests are with him in this matter to a certain extent, and I think to a very large extent.

Mr. President, some months ago it became necessary for this Government to send marines to China. We had no available ships at the time, and one of the Dollar Line ships was selected—the steamship President Grant. It was on April 17, 1927. By the way, this ship was purchased from the Shipping Board by the Dollar Co. for about $900,000—25 per cent down, and the balance of the payments to be made over a period of 15 years. On the trip outbound that ship followed practically its regular course; it took on our marines and officers, something like 1,500 men all together, and as I recall something like 1,100 tons of cargo, which it was necessary to carry along with them. It left San Diego on April 17, arrived in the Philippines, where the men disembarked on May 4. The next day the ship, after unloading, proceeded on its regular course. The Dollar Co. charged the United States Government $216,000 for that trip. Mr. President, it was a case of being able to force the United States Government to pay an exorbitant price after that company had secured the ship at a price which was little or nothing compared to its cost. I think it was a miserable, unpatriotic piece of business to hold up the Government to that extent, charging for one trip consuming less than a month practically all that company had paid for the ship up to that time.

Mr. President, there is a condition on the Dollar ships of which I do not approve. It would be necessary in case of national emergency for those ships to be brought into the service of our Government. Those ships are manned to a large extent by Chinese crews. That is a fine state of affairs for the United States to face in case of an emergency—to have to call on ships manned by coolie labor. Only a few weeks ago one of these ships, the President Polk, of the Dollar Line, in New York Harbor, had a fire on board and the coolie laborers in the crew of the ship attempted to escape, but they had to be prevented by force. I am in favor of an adequate merchant marine owned and manned by Americans.

We have a situation facing us to-day which calls for the scrutiny of the Members of the Senate. The Shipping Board is about to make a contract and has advertised that it will make a contract which will give a strangle hold to practically one man on the Pacific coast as to virtually all our ships which sail the Pacific Ocean. This thing should be stopped. It has gone far enough. I thoroughly disapprove of the actions of certain members of the Shipping Board. They have yielded to the influence of which I have spoken, and the time has come when that influence should be driven out and when these questions should be aired before the public. The time has come when the cards should be placed on the table, and I for one demand that they be placed on the table. As a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I protest against this proposed sale, which is mixed up so closely with foreign interests.

I am not a "jingoist"; I do not believe that we will ever have war with our great neighbor across the ocean; I for one hope not; I believe that we have advanced too far for any such thing; I believe in talking peace; but I also believe in an adequate national defense, because with an adequate national defense the chances of trouble will be very materially reduced. But with foreign interests dominating our ships we can not be in a safe and secure position, as we will be in if we have thorough Americans in control.

Mr. President, yesterday I mentioned some of the British ships which were owned by the Dollar Steamship Co. I will give that list again. It is taken from the Shipping Board and Department of Commerce records.

The Melville Dollar was transferred to the Japanese flag from the Dollar Co. May 16, 1916.

The M. S. Dollar was transferred to the British flag by the Dollar Co. on September 15, 1915.

The Mackinaw was transferred from the Dollar Co. to the Japanese flag July 12, 1915.

The Robert Dollar, according to the Department of Commerce's records, has always been under the British flag.

The Alice Dollar, according to the Department of Commerce's records, has never been under the American flag.

I mentioned two or three other Dollar ships yesterday under British registry. Now, I have a few more of them from the Shipping Board records:

The Janet Dollar was transferred to Chinese registry on April 5, 1927, from the Dollar Co.

The Lake Farrar was transferred from the Dollar Co. to Japanese registry on March 2, 1926.

The Lake Onawa was transferred from the Dollar Co. to Japanese registry on March 30, 1926.

The Lake Gitano was transferred from the Dollar Co. to Philippine registry November 16, 1926.

Mr. President, we have an example from what I have just given as to the reliability of Mr. Dollar's statement regarding these ships. If he treats America and American interests in the same careless manner, I fear for the future of America should an emergency ever arise. I prefer to have the bids to which I have referred so changed and altered that the various Pacific coast carriers and shippers may bid, which they dare not do to-day.

Under the plan now proposed there will be a fleet of something like 16 ships which can go from port to port on the Pacific Ocean and ruin any company that is operating on that ocean from those ports. The various communities of the Pacific coast have built up these trade routes. The Government has expended something like $4,000,000 in building up these routes. The purpose of the shipping act is to maintain those routes for those shippers. I believe it would be a crime for our Shipping Board to sell the ships as they are planning to sell them to-day, which would result in stifling competition in shipping. It would make any independent operator, not in the combine, afraid to bid.

Mr. President, I shall not discuss this matter any further. I want to call the attention of the Senate to the seriousness of it. It has already been sensed by the chairman of the Commerce Committee. He has introduced a resolution—Senate Resolution 116—which recites the conditions regarding shipping on the Pacific coast, and calls on the Shipping Board to desist from proceeding further with the proposed sale of the three cargo services between American, oriental, and other Pacific ports under the conditions as now advertised. I urgently call that to the attention of the Senate. It means much to American shipping and to American national defense to stop the swindling operation that is about to be perpetrated on us.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, there are a few matters in connection with this amendment which I should like to discuss before the Senate.

As a member of the Committee on Commerce I have but lately entered upon the study of the question of the American merchant marine. One fact, however, has struck me quite forcibly, and that is that the public of this country are not well acquainted with the difficulties under which an American merchant marine must be sustained by this Government.

As a Member of the Senate for the last two years, and familiar in a general way with the legislation that has gone forward, I think when I entered that committee I was in the position of many of the general public who have seen the need of a merchant marine discussed in the newspapers, and felt really incapable of knowing why there was no privately owned American merchant marine.

It costs more to operate an American merchant marine than it costs to operate the shipping of other countries. There is some slight additional cost of operation, which is attributable to the laws which we have seen fit to pass and which no American citizen would ever like to see withdrawn, though that difference in the cost of operation is estimated at only a comparatively small amount. It is estimated by some not to exceed 2 per cent, and by others as high as 12 or 14 per cent, when compared with the cost of operating similar ships on similar routes under similar conditions by other countries.

It would seem that American enterprise and the ingenuity of American shipowners could in a large measure overcome so small a difference in the cost of operation. It is also true that it costs a great deal more to build ships in American shipyards than it costs to build them in European shipyards. We have to allow for the difference in scale of living of American workmen, and we have to allow for a large increase in price of materials due to American law. None of those things would our people willingly see withdrawn, as they are benefits to American workmen; and yet it is very necessary that American shipyards be given sufficient employment to keep them in a position to operate when the need arises.

There are many instances of ships sought to be built in American shipyards where bids have been taken both in America and in foreign countries, and it is said that as high as 50 per cent additional has had to be paid in some instances for similar vessels in American yards as compared with those of foreign countries.

Again, America is new as the operator of a merchant marine. It has not connections in foreign countries; it has not agencies built up in its own land which are devoted exclusively to securing cargoes for American ships. Whenever any enterprise seeks to enter a new field there are development costs which must be met over a period of years until the business is stabilized and until a demand for the use of the ships is created.

There is another reason why it is difficult for American ships to compete with those of foreign countries, and that is due to the help which foreign Governments give to their privately owned ships; and if we are to compete we must take that subsidy and add it to our cost of operation.

These different additions to the cost of operating an American merchant marine made it necessary for the United States Government to adopt certain plans to bring about a situation that would warrant American ships plying to the ports of the world.

I do not believe anyone feels that the American Nation could prosper without the requisite amount of American shipping available without the established routes to reach the foreign markets which are absolutely necessary to take care of the surplus of our various American products in the world markets. I do not myself want to see the American merchant marine go back to the old days, when practically all our shipping was carried under foreign flags. But when we come to ask the question of how we are going to meet these great disadvantages we are brought up to the solution that the Government must give a certain amount of aid to overcome the disadvantages under which it is necessary for our ships to operate.

It seems to be the general impression that the American people are not willing to grant subsidies for the operation of American ships, or to grant subsidies for the construction of American ships in American shipyards, and that without the opportunity of having those subsidies there is no method left but for the American Government to enter into the business itself, undertake to build the ships, undertake to run them, and undertake to establish the necessary connections and agencies over the world, so that they may operate with proper cargoes. The thing that the American people do not quite grasp is that even under those conditions some help has to be given in the operation of the ships through an application of the Treasury funds of this Government.

It makes only a difference of terms whether it be made by a subsidy to the various departments which have to be aided to equalize shipping costs or whether it be charged against the surplus Government revenues in the payment of the losses incurred in the operation of those ships.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SACKETT. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator recall how much we have paid in sum under the operation of the present law?

Mr. SACKETT. If the Senator please, I have so recently taken up the study of this question that the matter of statistics has hardly become firmly fixed in my own mind.

Mr. COPELAND. Permit me to say to the Senator that in seven years we have paid $200,000,000 in operating the ships under the Shipping Board.

Mr. SACKETT. I appreciate the information. I also remember distinctly that I have been told that the annual losses in operating those ships were $30,000,000 a few years ago. They are down to $17,000,000 now; but I do not think the people appreciate that the reduction of those losses has been due to the fact that each year more and more of the Government ships in connection with which the Government paid the losses have been turned over to private operation through sale or lease of the ships, and that if the same number of ships were being operated to-day that were being operated in 1920 as a Government service, under Government ownership, that decrease in losses would not be apparent in the statement of the Treasury.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just a moment?

Mr. SACKETT. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. For the sake of having it in the RECORD at this point, let me say that the encouragement we have in the present decline in operating expenses we have had before. For instance, in 1922 we had a loss of $48,500,000 in the operation of the vessels. The next year, 1923, when we got greatly encouraged because things were going so well, we lost only $12,000,000, and so things looked bright; but the next year we lost $50,000,000; and then we had another bright year, when the loss was only $30,000,000.

Mr. McNARY. What year was that?

Mr. COPELAND. Nineteen hundred and twenty-five was the year when it was $30,000,000. In 1926 the loss dropped to $24,000,000, in 1927 to $13,900,000, but this year it jumped again to $17,000,000. So, you see, the loss goes on year after year; and what the Senator has suggested is really in the nature of a subsidy paid year after year and will be for an indefinite time to come.

Mr. SACKETT. It has to come out of the Treasury finally anyhow.

The objection to a subsidy seems to be on the ground that a subsidy is a gift to certain individuals, whereas the payment of a loss by the Government in Government operation is not a gift to any individual but benefits the whole people. Nevertheless the result is the same as far as our ability to carry on a merchant marine is concerned; and whether it be by a subsidy or whether it be by the payment of the loss at the end of the year's operation, the people of this country will have to pay that loss in order to have the benefit of the ships to carry our American products under the American flag.

I think the important thing for this body to consider is that it seems to be almost the universal opinion of the membership of the Senate that it is of great public benefit for us to have an adequate merchant marine, and that we ought to consider, in making the laws and passing these bills, whether it is going to bring about immediately an improvement, and whether it is going to assure us a merchant marine.

In determining that question, it seems to me that we ought to consider that the executive branch of the Government has certain theories in regard to a merchant marine, and the legislative branch has certain theories. I speak of that because I want to call the attention of the Senate to the last message which the President sent to Congress on that subject at the opening of this session, simply to give voice again to the opinions that are held by the executive branch of the Government. In speaking of the merchant marine, the President said:

> Public operation is not a success. No investigation, of which I have caused several to be made, has failed to report that it could not succeed or to recommend speedy transfer to private ownership. Our exporters and importers are both indifferent about using American ships. It should be our policy to keep our present vessels in repair and dispose of them as rapidly as possible, rather than undertake any new construction. Their operation is a burden on the National Treasury for which we are not receiving sufficient benefit.

I do not bring forward that part of the message for the purpose of creating the slightest antagonism between the executive and the legislative branches, but I am looking to the main chance of getting some sort of a bill passed now at a time when there is great need that the vessels which we now have be improved and new vessels added, in order to have before the Senate the idea that there must be a cooperation between the legislative and the executive, if it is possible to bring it about, in order to accomplish the purpose we have in mind.

The bill which the chairman of the Committee on Commerce has brought in adds three things to the existing shipping laws. It adds to the merchant marine act of 1920, first, a provision giving the board the right to recondition ships. Second, it adds to the present powers of the Shipping Board the power of building new ships to take the place of ships that are now out of date. Then, third, it brings in as a committee amendment what has been referred to here as a direct change in the policy of the United States Government as to the method of handling these ships, when it provides that no ship shall be sold except by the unanimous vote of the board.

The original act of 1920, if I may call it the original one, it being the act under which we are now working, provided a policy—

That it is necessary for the national defense and for the proper growth of its * * * commerce that the United States shall have a merchant marine of the best equipped and most suitable types of vessels sufficient to carry the greater portion of its commerce—

And so forth. Then it provided:

In order to accomplish the declared purposes of this act—

Which I have just read—

and to carry out the policy * * * the board is authorized and directed to sell, as soon as practicable, consistent with good business methods and the objects and purposes to be attained by this act, at public or private competitive sale after appraisement and due advertisement, to persons who are citizens of the United States * * * all of the vessels referred to in section 4 of this act.

The third provision of the pending bill seeks to curtail that direction to the Shipping Board to the extent of saying that they are directed to do it if they can do it unanimously. If they can not do it unanimously, then it is not to be done. It puts a brake upon the very purpose and policy of the original act.

The amendment which we are now considering, which is an amendment to the committee amendment, instead of providing that the vote shall be unanimous, provides that four members of the Shipping Board shall agree upon a sale. That is the only difference from the present act, in that under the present act a majority of the board can act, and a majority of a majority can bring about a sale, whereas under the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey it would take a majority of the full board.

There is a great deal of criticism of the methods and practices of the Shipping Board. Personally, I have no knowledge of the membership of the Shipping Board itself, having, I believe, met only one member. But I do recognize this fact: That it is easy to say, "Sell the ships." It is easy to fix a price under which some one believes that he can operate a ship at a profit, and if the price is fixed at which a person believes he can operate a ship at a profit, he is likely to buy the ship. But that does not carry out the purposes of the act. The purposes of the act require a continuance of the operation of the ship upon the lines and in the trade established by the Shipping Board when it opened up the lines.

The difficulty of selling a ship for a proper price compared even with its cost price when built in a shipyard of a foreign country is that the Shipping Board necessarily feels itself under obligation to attach such conditions to the sale of the ship as to continue it in operation, under which the purchaser must burden himself and must charge himself with the additional costs required by those conditions before he can arrive at a price which he can afford to pay for the ship.

It has been objected that after a ship has been reconditioned it has been sold for a very low price with a guaranty of operation of five years only. That may be an entirely just criticism. As a business proposition it does not require the continuance of that ship in the trade of the United States for more than five years. It would seem to me that it would be the part of wisdom on the part of the Shipping Board if, instead of getting a price with a guaranty of a five-year operation, some method could be devised by which we could dispose of those ships with a guaranty of a much longer term of operation. It may take more than five years for many of those ships to become self-sustaining. I can very well conceive of a method by which the Government could afford to take a lower price even than the prices at which they have been willing to sell those ships, provided the operation should be continued for 10 or 15 years.

What the American people want is a continuance of the service. They know they have to pay the loss in some form, either as losses of operation or by subsidies to help build or by subsidies to help operate, and if they can get away from those losses by a low sale price and fix the amount of their loss but continue to have the benefit of that line operating to definite ports over a long period, they can very well afford to take a low price in the sale and, if necessary, to take back the ship if it was not a success, ordinary wear and tear excepted, and try it again with another shipping company which did feel it could make a success.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLAINE in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SACKETT. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. At this point it seems to me it would be well to say that it is contrary to the law to sell the ships to any foreigner.

Mr. SACKETT. Absolutely.

Mr. COPELAND. No matter whether they have been in the hands of these private parties a long time or a short time.

Mr. SACKETT. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. Under very severe penalties, they are under obligations not to sell to foreigners.

Mr. SACKETT. Anybody who buys has to take every condition into consideration in arriving at the price he feels he can affords to pay for a ship.

I hold no brief for the Shipping Board. I do not know the shipowners of this country, but I do know the people of the interior. I know what it means to our agricultural and industrial interests in the central part of America to have opportunities of transportation to the markets of the world. I am intensely interested for my section in seeing that this Government maintains a merchant marine. I am also intensely interested in seeing the loss that will be incurred in operation cut to the minimum, because it is a constant drain upon the Treasury and makes necessary the raising of taxes.

If, therefore, we can find a way by which the merchant marine may be maintained; if, therefore, we can find a way by which the losses can be cut, it seems to me it should make comparatively little difference as to the method that is employed.

We have operated these ships now over the period since the war. We are in competition with the building of ships in other countries under the stimulus of the subsidies which they pay, and we have had no plans in the United States for reconditioning on a large scale or for building new ships. We have, therefore, fallen behind from year to year, and it is perfectly apparent that our ships of 9 and 10 knots speed are now in competition with foreign ships of 12 and 14 knots speed running over the same routes. It is very easy to see that the greater length of time of a voyage adds to the cost of the shipper in interest alone for the time occupied.

In order to compete favorably with the ships of foreign countries we have to be prepared constantly to recondition, to increase the speed, and to increase the facilities of each of the ships under our flag, whether those ships be under Government operation or whether those ships be leased out to private parties for the purpose of operating an American merchant marine.

At the same time, if we are going to run lines in competition with the great English, German, and French lines which cross the Atlantic, we have to provide ships which are in every way equal at least, and probably a bit superior, because it is a new service which we are instituting, to the ships in those foreign lines.

I have heard it discussed in a meeting of the Commerce Committee that our United States lines running to England need two new ships; that we have on hand two old ships, one of which is called the Agamemnon; that both of those ships can be reconditioned and put into service with the Leviathan and make those lines self-supporting or at least competitors of the foreign lines. It will cost $12,000,000 to recondition those two ships. That is $18,000,000 cheaper than would be the cost of two new ships to replace them. But it has come out in our discussion that these were German ships interned in our ports and that one sister ship of those remained in Germany; that a few years ago the German people reconditioned that sister ship, put it in shape to run upon these trans-Atlantic lines, but because it was an old ship, because it was out of date, it was withdrawn from the service within two or three years.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SACKETT. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. This morning in the committee hearing—and I would not have referred to it had it not been referred to by another member of the committee—the question of reconditioning these two ships was brought up. We were advised that they were in such condition that if reconditioned they would run at least 10 years, and the board thought possibly 15 years; that they have been examined by the best experts of the Navy Department as well as of the Shipping Board, and that they were confident that the two ships mentioned were in such condition that they could be reconditioned and would last not less than 10 and possibly 15 years.

Mr. SACKETT. I am not criticizing the statement. I am simply repeating the statement that was made.

Mr. CURTIS. That same statement was made yesterday, and I brought it to the attention of the members of the board this morning, and that is why the answer was made.

Mr. SACKETT. The point I wanted to make was that with Government operation the amount of the immediate saving that can be made appeals politically to the country. We can get by with the reconditioning of those ships. The question is, Can we not get by a great deal better for the American merchant marine by building new ships? That difference of opinion is a question which, it seems to me, works disadvantageously to the Government when it is considered by a political body as compared with a privately owned corporation. The experience of Germany was that the ship which they reconditioned, as I am informed, was within two or three years sent to the scrap heap.

Mr. CURTIS. I understand the plan to be to recondition those ships because they can be reconditioned within a year, while it would take more than three years to build new ships. The idea is to build the additional ships, and when they are completed these two ships can be used in another service.

Mr. SACKETT. There are various questions of that kind involved, all of which are susceptible of being taken hold of by the management of the ships, whether it be private or public ownership; but it is more difficult to get a just and proper business decision when it is under public ownership than when it is under private ownership.

There are various elements of cost in the securing of business for these lines which enter into the relative value of private initiative and public initiative. I can see very readily how, if we have the ships, the pressure to get advantages for one trade or another will bring influence to bear upon a public board having control of the operation of those ships to grant rates which may be more and more disadvantageous to the United States.

If it is a private ownership where people are required to make their money out of the operation of the ships, they are not by any means going to yield as readily to the demand for lower rates as they would under political conditions.

Personally I am not opposed to the Government going forward with the reconditioning of the ships where it is wise, because it does not seem possible at the present day to get private enterprise to recondition old Government ships. I am in favor of the Government bringing about the construction of new ships under some system, and the system offered in the pending bill is one of those methods. But I am opposed to a complete change of the whole shipping policy of the Government as is provided in the committee amendment which, as has been well said, practically decides that the Government is going to continue to operate its own merchant marine.

I appeal to the Members of the Senate, who are better informed, I believe, to-day than is the country at large as to the real problems which confront the Government in the operation of its merchant marine, not to take a step which is subversive of the entire policy which we have pursued for the last eight years under the shipping act which was passed immediately after the war. That did provide in no uncertain terms that the Shipping Board should bring the ships into private ownership in order that we might have the benefit of the ingenuity of American business men in developing and carrying on the world trade and that the matter should not be locked up in any Government bureau which is hard to dislodge at any future time and thereby curtail the privileges of American citizens to have their goods carried under the American flag to every port of the world.

Mr. WILLIS obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. JONES. I was requested to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] is detained in committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from Ohio will proceed.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I understand that the Senate is about to vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE]. As I understand, that amendment proposes to strike out in lines 7 and 8, on page 2, the provision there found for a unanimous vote of the Shipping Board and to substitute in lieu thereof language, the form of which I do not for the moment have before me, but the effect of which is that vessels may be sold by a vote of four members of the board.

Mr. President, if it were in order under the rules of the Senate so to do, I would ask at this time to amend the pending amendment by striking out "four" and inserting "five." Such an amendment, however, would, of course, not be in order, being an amendment in the third degree. I wish to say, however, that if the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey shall be voted down, as I hope it will be, I shall then offer an amendment to require the affirmative vote of five members of the board instead of a unanimous vote, as is proposed in the bill as it stands.

While I am on my feet, Mr. President, I wish to say only another word and then, so far as I am concerned, a vote may be had, for I certainly do not desire to delay the consideration of this measure. In a former statement I have, I think, explained my position on this question. If I had any assurance that without the passage of some measure of this kind we could have an American merchant marine, I should very gladly welcome the opportunity to vote for some other measure. I very much prefer individual initiative to the activity of the Government, but, Mr. President, we have been pursuing for 50 or 60 years the will-o'-the-wisp that we may have an American merchant marine by private initiative. As has been pointed out, it has been said at various times, "Well, there is this reason or that reason why we do not now have an American merchant marine." Some gentleman say it is because of the seamen's law. Well, before we had the seamen's law we did not have a merchant marine to speak of. The percentage of our commerce carried in American ships was gradually decreasing until it became practically nothing. If it shall be said, as it has been said, that the activities of the Government in the shipping business discourage private enterprise, it ought to be pointed out that when the Government was doing nothing of the kind we still were not building any ships. We are coming rapidly again to the situation in which we shall be practically without a merchant marine, a situation which we found at the outbreak of the World War to be exceedingly dangerous.

We do not look for war; we hope there will be no war; we all want peace; and yet I suspect the Senate and the House of Representatives will make provision one of these days for the enlargement of the Navy of the United States. What does it amount to to have fighting ships unless we have a merchant marine to back them up? I believe, therefore, Mr. President, that it is of the most vital importance not only to the Nation as a whole, but particularly to the farmers, the producers, and the shippers of this country that we have an American merchant marine.

There is not the slightest hope of securing any form of subsidy legislation. Everyone acquainted with the situation in Congress knows that to be the case. So I have about come to the conclusion that if we are to have an American merchant marine it must be along the lines provided in this bill. So believing, I propose to support the bill, particularly if certain minor amendments can be made.

As an indication of our decreasing power as a mercantile nation upon the seas, I call attention to a statement in the most recent commerce report. Senators talk about the American merchant marine in the overseas trade as if it were really, compared with deep-sea trade of the rest of the world, an important thing. What are the facts as set forth in our own commerce reports? I read only a portion of this statement from page 1 of the last commerce report:

> Great Britain and Ireland, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, and France retained their positions in the order named. Sweden, however, which stood eighth in the September quarter, with 82,000 gross tons, is now sixth, with 100,700 tons.

Now note this:

> As a result, Denmark drops from sixth to seventh place, and the United States from seventh to eighth.

So that this mighty Nation, as a commercial nation, measured by its merchant marine, stands in the eighth place, with Denmark ahead of her and Sweden ahead of her. It would seem, Mr. President, in view of the experiences that we had at the time of the World War there ought not to be any doubt in the mind of any man as to the necessity of the maintenance of a great American merchant marine; and yet I note in this report that there is in new construction in this country now only 97,370 tons, as compared with 1,579,713 tons in Great Britain, 472,295 tons in Germany, and so on. I will publish this list in the RECORD, if I have permission to do so, Mr. President. I think it is rather illuminating.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLAINE in the chair). Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

In addition to the gains for Great Britain and Ireland and for the United States, construction increases were reported for Holland, Denmark, Sweden, Russia, and Japan. Sweden is now building more tonnage than the United States. Germany shows a decrease of 44,000 gross tons from the figure for the September quarter; Italy, one of 25,000 tons; and France, one of 15,000 tons. Great Britain and Ireland alone are now building more merchant shipping than all the other maritime countries combined.

RELATIVE POSITION OF LEADING MARITIME COUNTRIES

No change is shown in the ranking of the leading shipbuilding nations during the quarter ended December 31. Great Britain and Ireland, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, and France retained their positions in the order named. Sweden, however, which stood eighth in the September quarter, with 82,000 gross tons, is now sixth, with 100,700 tons. As a result, Denmark drops from sixth to seventh place, and the United States from seventh to eighth, with Russia and Japan retaining, respectively, ninth and tenth places.

Gross tonnage of vessels under construction in principal maritime countries of the world on indicated dates

Country	Sept. 30, 1927	Dec. 31, 1927
Great Britain and Ireland	1,536,416	1,579,713
Germany	514,933	472,295
Italy	208,000	183,216
Netherlands	163,000	174,887
France	131,000	115,029
Sweden	82,000	100,700
United States	91,070	97,370
Other countries	347,638	395,511
Total	3,074,057	3,118,721

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. Let me suggest to the Senator that the American tonnage to which he refers is all being built for the intercoastal trade.

Mr. WILLIS. Absolutely so.

Mr. JONES. Not a ship is being built in the yards of this country for the overseas trade.

Mr. WILLIS. Not a ton of shipping is going into the overseas trade. Therefore, I repeat my announcement, as some Senators have but recently entered the Chamber, that if the amendment now pending providing that ships may be sold on the vote of four members of the board shall be defeated, if I can thereafter get the floor, I shall offer an amendment to make the number five.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me for a question?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BLEASE. I understand there are only seven members of the Shipping Board.

Mr. WILLIS. That is correct.

Mr. BLEASE. Then, I should like to ask the Senator, what is the objection to majority rule?

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, the experience we have had leads me to believe that it would be safer to have a vote of five rather than a vote of four. I do not think it would be absolutely fatal, but I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey. I believe if we shall provide that these ships shall not be sold except on a vote of five members of the board that we shall be more likely to have a merchant marine than otherwise.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield the floor, but I will be glad to have the Senator ask me a question.

Mr. HOWELL. I will ask the distinguished Senator from Ohio if six would not be safer than five?

Mr. WILLIS. I think that would be carrying the matter just a little too far. I do not think so. I would not vote for six; I will vote for five; but the Senator will not vote for either.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield the floor.

Mr. EDGE. I understood the Senator had yielded the floor.

Mr. President, I desire to say only a few words in addition to what I have already said on this subject.

I have presented the amendment requiring in connection with the sale of vessels the vote of only a majority of the board for the reason that it follows the generally accepted policy, as I think I pointed out this morning, in every line of activity ruled over by boards. If an amendment providing that five members should have to vote in favor of a given proposal were adopted it would mean that a vote of more than two-thirds of the members of the Shipping Board would be required; it would mean a greater vote than is required in Congress to pass a measure over the veto of the President of the United States. My amendment provides merely a common-sense division. If we believe in majority rule, we must accept that as our policy.

It is not a question of the personnel or membership of the Shipping Board. The personnel will change as the days go on. We are discussing a bill which, if it shall become a law, is to be the absolute controlling factor in the administration of the American merchant marine in the future; and so we must make up our minds whether we want a board in the exercise of whose administrative powers in managing the merchant marine there will be required a unanimous vote or, as is provided in the amendment I have offered, following the usual traditions and the usual customs, a majority vote.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. EDGE. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. It is necessary that we should determine what our policy shall be, is it not?

Mr. EDGE. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. If we do not determine the policy we will not develop a Government-owned marine and private interests will not enter the field will they? They are not doing it. We are making no progress.

Mr. EDGE. At the present moment, of course, the private shipping interests of the country, if the Senator wants me to answer his question, are very much larger than the interests of the Shipping Board, according to my understanding.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am not antagonistic to the Senator's view.

Mr. EDGE. I understand that, and I am trying to answer the Senator.

Mr. CARAWAY. I live a thousand miles from the sea. All I am trying to say is this: We have got to fix one policy or the other, for private capital is not going into the business with the Government competing against it.

Mr. EDGE. No; I think the Senator is quite right in that respect.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then if the Government is going to stay in, why not make it apparent to everybody that it is going to stay in? The amendment as reported by the committee, making a unanimous vote necessary to sell, of course, means that the Federal Government is going to stay in the shipping business——

Mr. EDGE. Exactly.

Mr. CARAWAY. And people may make their contracts accordingly. Why is it not wise to do one or the other?

Mr. EDGE. If the Senator is propounding the question to me, personally I do not consider it wise because I am fundamentally opposed to the Government for all time operating and administering a merchant marine. I am quite content, and so expressed myself frequently to-day, to have the Government spend the money to provide a merchant marine where private capital to a great extent has failed; but I do not want to drive a nail in and rivet it down so as to tell this country and private interests for all time to come that there never will be a chance to get out of the shipping business. I want at least to have some little loophole; and I think there is a loophole when a majority of the board can, if a business proposition is presented to them, sell ships.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator has just said that private capital would not go in as long as the Government was in.

Mr. EDGE. Oh, no; I have not said that. I have said that private capital naturally is not quite so anxious to go in; but the fact is that it has gone in. I can not give the Senator the percentage; but I will say that to-day with the Government having been in the shipping business since the war—eight years—the amount of private shipping owned by American individuals or corporations is far in excess of all the tonnage of the Government.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is that overseas traffic, or is it just coastwise traffic?

Mr. EDGE. Both.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] was just showing that we were falling behind and not going ahead, and that not a ton was being constructed for overseas traffic.

Mr. EDGE. I am afraid that is true; but we will go still farther behind if the Congress of the United States announces to the shipping interests of this country that for all time to come the Government is going to compete with them.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey a question. If the bill should be passed as the committee has reported it, I assume it will be tantamount to saying that until private capital enters the field of merchant-marine investment Congress shall assume its duty to provide some form of merchant marine for the American Nation.

Mr. EDGE. I think the whole policy of the bill is to assure, as far as Congress will permit appropriations, not only the rebuilding of ships but the building of new ships; in other words, to provide an adequate merchant marine.

Mr. BARKLEY. Assuming that that is the effect of it, if the Senator's amendment should be adopted allowing four members of the Shipping Board to sell ships, they might reverse the entire policy of Congress by a vote of the majority of the Shipping Board, might they not?

Mr. EDGE. Not if they followed the law. The law very distinctly states, or will state if the amendment already offered to the pending bill by the Senator from Washington is adopted, and I presume it will be, that the first responsibility of the Shipping Board shall be to furnish, as far as the appropriations permit, an adequate merchant marine. That will be, I think, to use his words, the primary object of the shipping act.

Mr. JONES. That amendment has already been adopted.

Mr. EDGE. It has already been adopted, the Senator from Washington tells me; and the secondary responsibility of the Shipping Board will be, when business and commercial conditions warrant it, the sale of the ships into private hands; but they will absolutely defy the law if they do what the Senator from Kentucky implies.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator's amendment, as I understand, leaves it to the discretion of a majority of the Shipping Board to decide when these ships shall be sold?

Mr. EDGE. Yes; with the proviso in the law that they shall not be sold unless it is for the best interests of an American merchant marine.

Mr. BARKLEY. And it also leaves it within the power of the majority of the board, under the Senator's amendment, to decide how many of these ships shall be sold?

Mr. EDGE. Oh, yes; absolutely.

Mr. BARKLEY. So that they might sell all of them?

Mr. EDGE. They might sell all of them if they felt that it was to the best interests of the American merchant marine; and, as far as my viewpoint is concerned, I should be delighted to see them sell every one of the ships and have the ships operated in private hands, if it would furnish this country with an adequate merchant marine.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate the fact that the Senator would like to see that done now——

Mr. EDGE. Yes; because I am opposed to governmental operation.

Mr. BARKLEY. In spite of the fact that Congress might wish to have some string upon the authority of the Shipping Board to sell these ships. Under the Senator's amendment would it not be possible for four members of the Shipping Board to decide, without recourse to Congress, or in spite of its wishes and intentions, to sell all of these ships, regardless of the fact that the time might not have arrived when private industry would take over and operate them?

Mr. EDGE. If the Senator wants to assume that any board of this Government will absolutely defy the law, will absolutely do an unwise business act, when the law clearly defines when and how and under what conditions they shall sell, of course they have the physical or voting power; there is no question about that.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course the observation of all of us, I think, has been that when one of these boards or commissions is created it frequently finds a way to circumvent the law and the plain intention of Congress by usurpation of authority never intended.

Mr. EDGE. Of course, the Senator will admit that most boards of the Government, however, can do that very thing by a majority vote, excepting where the law restrains them; and in my judgment the law restrains them here.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, on further consideration I am of the opinion that I would be in order in offering the amendment.

I therefore move to amend the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey by striking out "four" and inserting in lieu thereof "five."

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. The Senator himself has admitted that he is now offering an amendment in the third degree; and it simply can not be done under the rules of the Senate, as I understand.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I desire to be heard on the point of order. I have given the matter some consideration since that time. I have examined the rules somewhat. I am of opinion that this being a committee amendment there are precedents in this body that that committee amendment is considered as an original proposition, and therefore that this amendment is only an amendment to an amendment. I think, if I had time, I could turn to decisions by the Chair to that effect. Furthermore, Rule XVIII has language which seems to indicate the same situation.

In referring to a motion to strike out and insert, the rule reads in part as follows:

but the rejection of a motion to strike out and insert one proposition shall not prevent a motion to strike out and insert a different proposition.

In view of those two considerations, Mr. President, I submit that the point of order made by the Senator from New Jersey is not well taken, and that my motion to amend is in order.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss the point of order. That is one activity I have never engaged in as long as I have been a Member of this body, some nine years. Without taking time to turn to the rules—and the rules are rather voluminous—it is my thorough understanding and conviction that an amendment in the third degree is out of order; and the Senator's contention to the contrary does not change my viewpoint that this is an amendment in the third degree. So I will submit to the decision of the Presiding Officer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds that under Rule XVIII the part proposed to be inserted by the committee is regarded, for the purpose of amendment, as a question. The amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey is one in the first degree. Therefore an amendment to it is in the second degree; and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio is in order.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Presiding Officer, before he actually finishes his ruling, tell me what the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is? If mine is an amendment in the first degree, what is his amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendment is a motion to strike out and insert, and therefore is subject to amendment.

Mr. EDGE. I am not going to appeal from the ruling; but if the Presiding Officer will look over the RECORD I am quite sure he will find that when the Senator from Washington offered his amendment he called it an amendment to the committee amendment; so that it must be the first amendment. Therefore mine is the second amendment, and this is the third amendment.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I am perfectly satisfied with the ruling of the Chair; but the statement now made by the Senator from New Jersey would seem to put the Chair in an awkward position. I am sure the Senator does not intend to do so. He is simply mistaken in his arithmetic.

The Chair has held, in conformity with the precedents, that this is in effect an original proposition that is here, and that the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey is, of course, in the first degree, and the amendment I now offer is in the second degree; and therefore the Chair correctly held it in order.

Mr. EDGE. May I ask the Senator from Ohio, what does the Senator from Ohio term the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WILLIS. I have already stated it twice. It is in effect, as a parliamentary matter, an original proposition.

Mr. EDGE. I bow to the decision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to refer to page 40, part 2, of the Precedents of the United States Senate as complete authority for the ruling announced by the Chair.

The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE].

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that with the proposed amendment the Shipping Board policy will be identical with what it is now.

We have been conducting a bargain-counter business in ships, and this bill will simply add and provide for an additional stock of ships to be sold at bargain prices if the amendment is adopted.

The bill as amended by the committee provides a policy whereby we may expect the gradual building up of our shipping business, but if this amendment is adopted the very purpose of the bill is destroyed, and I for one am not willing to vote to give the Shipping Board more money to recondition ships or to build new ones that they may sell them just as they have been selling them in the past.

Mr. President, one of the sales that has been made I called attention to this afternoon. Some 18 ships, as I recall, plying between this country and Mediterranean ports, were sold, and they sold those ships for $7.50 a ton, payable in 10 annual installments of 75 cents a ton; yet the depreciation on those ships was not less than $2 a ton per annum.

Mr. President, I insist that this amendment ought not to be adopted. We should follow the recommendation of the committee.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I should like to have the privilege of asking the Senator from Washington a direct question; not, he may be very sure, in any offensive sense, but because I want the information. The Senator is as candid and honest and frank a man as there is in this body or anywhere else, and I know he will tell what he believes.

I want to ask the Senator whether or not, when this provision was put in the measure providing for a unanimous vote, he did not intend, and those who helped him put it in did not intend, that these ships should not be sold in the future, and whether they did not thereby intend to launch the Government in the permanent policy of Government ownership and operation of the merchant marine?

Mr. JONES. Of course, I can not speak for the other members of the committee as to what their intention was; I know what my idea was. I did not consider and do not consider now that this means permanent Government ownership and operation of ships. I do not have the belief that some seem to have. I think that the next Congress could repeal or modify this proposition. Some say, "Well, Congress will not do it." I think Congress will do what it thinks is the right thing to do when the matter is presented to it, and if in 10 years from now somebody proposes that Congress shall repeal or modify this provision, Congress will pass upon it in the light of the conditions at that time and the public sentiment of that time. Frankly, that is my position. I may be mistaken about it. I do not consider that this commits us or binds us to permanent, perpetual Government ownership and operation.

Mr. WATSON. Of course, it is a question of individual opinion.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator says the next Congress may do right.

Mr. JONES. No——

Mr. WATSON. In my judgment this present thing is wrong.

Mr. JONES. The Senator did not say that the next Congress might do right. The Senator said the next Congress might modify or repeal this proposition, and the Senator did go on to say that he felt that Congress, whenever any proposition was put up to it, would do what it thought was the right thing.

Mr. WATSON. But, at the same time, the Senator is of opinion that in order to have a merchant marine we must have Government ownership and operation now.

Mr. JONES. I am confident of that; that is, I am confident that is the only way we can get it.

Mr. WATSON. Although the Senator and I for 30 years in both the House and the Senate have been working for a privately owned merchant marine.

Mr. JONES. I have been working for it for 29 years.

Mr. WATSON. And I know that in the House he and I stood together at one time in favor of a mail subvention.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. And brought that out from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries together.

Mr. JONES. I also worked for discriminating duties, and I have abandoned that.

Mr. WATSON. What I want to ask the Senator is this: Why is he so firmly intrenched behind the idea of clinging to this unanimous vote instead of permitting the decision to be made by four, or a majority?

Mr. JONES. I state frankly to the Senator—I do not suppose it will influence anybody one way or the other—that I am representing the committee. The committee has recommended this to the Senate, and I propose to stand by the recommendation of my committee.

Mr. WATSON. Without the Senator committing himself personally as to his own views on the proposition.

Mr. JONES. I expressed my views in the committee. The committee, by a majority vote, authorized this amendment.

Mr. WATSON. Being the chairman of a committee myself, I know how embarrassing it is sometimes when the committee binds me by their vote.

Mr. JONES. I am going to stand by this proposition.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I took occasion a short time ago to interrupt the Senator from New Jersey, and I stated that in my opinion no interpretation would ever be placed upon the attitude of the chairman of the committee, and upon this bill, other than that the Government was irrevocably committed to the policy of Government ownership and operation of the merchant marine.

I invite the attention of the Senate to the statement contained in the report submitted by the Senator from Washington. On page 2 of the report this language is used:

> Unless a definite and constructive policy is adopted at this session nothing can be done for at least two years, but then our ships will be hopelessly deteriorated and helpless to meet world shipping competition. There seems to be no way by which we can get an American merchant marine privately owned.

No other way than what? Than to have the Government own and operate our merchant marine. I read further:

> The only other recourse is a merchant marine constructed and owned by the Government. Concede for the sake of the argument all the objections that may be urged to the Government conducting the shipping business, we must choose between a Government merchant marine or no merchant marine at all.
> Under these circumstances the committee has not hesitated to recommend the adoption of a policy looking to the construction by the Government of such ships as may be necessary.

Is it possible to deduce from this language any conclusion other than that the Government is to own and operate merchant ships?

The chairman states that there can be no merchant marine privately owned or operated. His view is that we have failed to have a merchant marine; therefore the Government must own and operate merchant ships. I repeat, Mr. President, this bill commits the Government to this policy, and it is all nonsense to pretend—and I say that without desiring to be unparliamentary at all, or to criticize anybody—that this does not commit the Government to the policy which I have indicated.

The bill seeks to do that, and if enacted into law will accomplish that deplorable result. No one reading the bill will reach any other conclusion than that the Government will purchase, acquire, build, and operate ships in ocean trade. The first section of the bill declares that to be the policy.

The section now under consideration is a complete veto upon the sale of any ships run by the Government at any time in order that it will be impossible to get the Government out of the shipping business. When the sale of any ships is prohibited it is for the purpose of committing the Government to the ownership and operation of all ships now or hereafter belonging to the Government.

The fifth section, to which I called attention hastily this morning, carries out the same ideas:

> The appropriations necessary to carry out the provisions and accomplish the purposes of this act are hereby authorized.

What are the purposes of the act? Are the purposes of the act to sell the ships? No. Are the purposes of the act to encourage private persons to engage in foreign shipping? No. The purposes of the act are to put the Government into the shipping business; into the ownership and operation of ships; into the acquisition of ships; into the reconditioning of ships; into the building and purchase of ships. It seems to me that it is idle to say that we are not at the parting of the ways and that hereafter we may not retrace our course or have a privately owned merchant marine.

The Senator from Washington has indicated his interpretation of this bill in the language which I have just read in the report, and he says there is no other way—and in that, of course, I differ from him—to have a merchant marine than to have the Government embark upon it. Of course, with the passage of this bill the board will immediately formulate a program, they will urge the construction of ships. Already, I am told, a bill has passed the House for the reconditioning of ships at a cost of millions of dollars. We will have a bill along those lines presented to us before Congress adjourns, and we will be urged to pass it, because it will be claimed that we will be morally bound to do so, having solemnly committed the Government to this paternalistic policy.

The board is authorized—and this is a command that they are to carry out the purposes of this bill—they are authorized to acquire ships and to devise plans to expand the operation of the Government owned and operated merchant ships.

Mr. President, this section which is now the subject of attack, and upon which we will soon vote, is intended to rivet upon the country the policy of Government ownership of ships, and to aid this plan it becomes an interdiction against the sale of any ships owned or hereafter acquired by the Government.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE].

Mr. EDGE. I will ask the Secretary to state the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the amendment offered by me.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey strike out the word "four" and insert the word "five," so as to read:

That only upon the affirmative vote of five of the members of the board, duly recorded.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Should the amendment of the Senator from Ohio prevail, will there then be a vote upon the committee amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The vote would then be on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey as amended. The question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I want thoroughly to understand the situation. If the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio should be adopted, then would the Chair put the question on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey as amended?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That would be the question.

Mr. JONES. In other words, we will then vote as to whether the provision for five shall be adopted or not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will not the Chair state the effect of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio is to the effect that any sale made must be approved by five members of the board.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], which I transfer to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS]. Were the Senator from New Jersey present, he would vote "nay," and were the Senator from Arkansas present, he would vote "yea." I am therefore permitted to vote, and I vote "nay."

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]; and

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY].

The result was announced—yeas 43, nays 34, as follows:

So Mr. WILLIS's amendment to Mr. EDGE's amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] as amended.

Mr. FLETCHER. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. Being unable to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] and vote "nay."

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS] and vote "yea." If the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS] were present, he would vote "yea." If the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce the following general pairs on this vote:

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I give notice that I shall ask for another vote on this amendment after the bill has been reported to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. JONES. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote in regard to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. JONES. I was requested to announce the following general pairs on this vote:

So the committee amendment as amended was agreed to, as follows:

SEC. 2. The United States Shipping Board shall not sell any vessel or any line of vessels except when, in its judgment, the building up and maintenance of an adequate merchant marine can be best served thereby, and then only upon the affirmative unanimous vote of the members of the board duly recorded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is now on the second committee amendment.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Washington just one question. To what extent do the employees connected with the United States Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation fall within the scope of the Federal laws relating to the classified civil service?

Mr. JONES. I do not think they are under the civil service at all as yet.

Mr. BRUCE. None of them?

Mr. JONES. I do not think so.

Mr. BRUCE. I am not speaking of mariners and sailors, of course.

Mr. JONES. I understand that; but I do not think the clerks are under the civil service as yet.

Mr. BRUCE. Does the Senator know why that is?

Mr. JONES. I think it is because the Shipping Board has been considered as being more or less of a temporary governmental organization.

Mr. President, I ask that the amendment on page 3, striking out section 5 may be agreed to, because that is covered by the amendment which we have already adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee, to strike out section 5 in the following words:

SEC. 5. No vessel constructed pursuant to this act shall be sold without the consent of Congress hereafter given.

The amendment was agreed to.

ALTERATIONS IN THE SENATE OFFICE BUILDING

Mr. DENEEN. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report back favorably without amendment the resolution (S. Res. 111) and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 111) submitted by Mr. MOSES on the 16th instant was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Architect of the Capitol hereby is authorized and directed to make certain necessary alterations and repairs in the Senate Office Building under the supervision of the Committee on Rules, at a cost not to exceed $6,000, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, miscellaneous items, fiscal year 1927.

AFFAIRS IN NICARAGUA

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a brief editorial from a recent issue of the Star, of Seattle, Wash., entitled "The gathering storm."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE GATHERING STORM

It is a terrific indictment that Senator BURTON K. WHEELER draws against the Coolidge-Kellogg war in Nicaragua. It is, he says, warfare conducted for a group of New York bankers, without authorization of Congress, in which women and children are ruthlessly bombed by American airplanes.

WHEELER asks what the Star has asked time and again, without reply: "What American lives are in danger in Nicaragua?" There has never been any reply to that; there never can be. No American lives have been in danger—only dollars have been in danger.

Throughout American history it is traditional that American lives must and will be protected anywhere on earth. That is right and just. But the dollar that forsakes its own country and goes rolling to exploit foreigners must look out for itself. Statesman after statesman has reiterated that dictum. It meets with the hearty approval of every patriotic American.

Doctor Coolidge's dictum, however, is that American boys may be killed, women and children may be bombed, friendly nations may be attacked—to save a few dollars. It is a fearful dictum and the American people shudder at its application.

Senator WHEELER knows this administration. Its agents tried to frame him and with perjured evidence send him to jail when he dared to pry into the unspeakable oil mess. It took a jury a very short time to see through this preposterous conspiracy and free WHEELER—but the sting remains.

All over America to-day people are echoing what WHEELER said at New York; the storm is gathering.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, January 27, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, January 26, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Lead us, O Father, to give our faith in truths that keep us going and that we can live by. Direct us toward goals that are worth working for. We pray that our Nation may be given instruction that shall inspire our fellow citizens to live in peace and have the utmost liberty consistent with the liberty of all others. May the wisdom that comes from obedience to Thy laws prevail everywhere. Thou canst see every tear; and wilt Thou in mercy answer its appeal as it glistens from the bed of sickness and when it calls from men who are struggling for their own? Be with us, and always point out the way of moral and spiritual certainty. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ADJOURNMENT OVER UNTIL MONDAY

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet next Monday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet next Monday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the address by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN] I be allowed to speak for 10 minutes on the subject of naval officers and naval activities.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Arkansas he be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the address by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC] I be given four minutes in which to address the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the address by the gentleman from Oklahoma he may be permitted to proceed for four minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

HON. JOHN W. GRIGGS

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very short tribute to Hon. John W. Griggs, of the State of New Jersey, former Attorney General of the United States and former Governor of the State of New Jersey, written by Dr. William B. Gourley, one of the leading members of the bar of New Jersey.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that he be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a tribute to the late Attorney General John W. Griggs. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following tribute to Hon. John W. Griggs, of the State of New Jersey, former Attorney General of the United States and former Governor of the State of New Jersey, written by Dr. William B. Gourley, one of the leading members of the bar of that State:

May it please the court, I have been requested by the president of the bar association of this county to add a few words to the resolutions that have just been read. It is fitting that something should be said, however summary. It would not become the dignity of our bar to allow the first figure among us to pass beyond the horizon of life to join the ranks of the illustrious advocates who have gone before him without expressing, however inadequately, the sense of our great loss.

John W. Griggs was one of the many sons of Sussex who have added luster to the State. He was graduated from Lafayette at the age of 19 and came here shortly thereafter, and here he remained until the end. He was admitted to the bar in 1871. It seems a far cry now to that distant day, yet his public life spanned this great period. At that time no district courts were established here. The courts for the trial of small causes were in general use. All suits involving more than $100 were tried at the circuit, and yet the court calendar of the time had only 40 causes a term. To-day we have 1,200. The justice of the supreme court presiding in this circuit, in addition to his labors in that tribunal and also in the court of errors and appeals, tried all our circuit causes. He also presided in the orphans' court and the court of common pleas, as well as in the court of quarter sessions. Some relief was afforded in the year of his admission to the bar by the creation of the court of special sessions with a president judge.

HAD ABLE COMPETITION

Mr. Griggs found able competitors here at the time, chief among whom were Socrates Tuttle and Absalom B. Woodruff. These names are new to this generation—but a memory. They share the transitory fame of so many eminent advocates and are now fast fading into the dim and deepening night. He won early distinction at the bar. He formed a partnership with Mr. Tuttle and the firm of Tuttle & Griggs became one of the most eminent in the State. In 1875 he was elected to the assembly, where he served two years. In 1878 he was counsel for the board of chosen freeholders, and in 1879 he was city counsel of Paterson. He was chosen State senator in 1881 and served six years. He was president of the senate in 1886. He became governor in 1895, and two years later Attorney General of the United States. He reflected honor on this exalted office and was universally held to have performed its duties with marked distinction.

I prefer to speak to-day not of the statesman but rather of the advocate. A Justice of the Supreme Court said to me once that it was a pleasure to hear him argue a cause. It was a great pleasure also to hear him before a jury in an important suit. He had an unexcelled knowledge of the law and was always master of the facts. His penetrating mind readily separated a complex cause into its component parts and his eloquent tongue lifted it to new heights. As an advocate he was facile princeps. I think his most outstanding quality was the clarity of his mind. His luminous intellect carried light into the darkest places. He could accomplish more legal work in a given time than anyone I ever knew. It can be truthfully said of him what was said of Judge Dixon, that he displayed a cultivated capacity for work that made the assumption of any task the assurance of its immediate performance.

PAST ASSOCIATIONS

I had the honor of being associated with him in many important causes and among them several as special counsel for the city of Paterson. I learned to admire this rare characteristic. I was on the other side many times in the old days and sometimes in later years. The last case in which I was on the opposite side was Weidmann v. Passaic Water Co. I said to him at the close of this case, "Governor, I like to try a case with you, because you know what you want and you know how to get it." His answer was, "Gourley, this is the last case you will ever try with me. I have just two important cases remaining and then my work will be done." I need hardly add that these words made a profound impression upon me.

The passing of such a lawyer from among us is a distinct loss to us all. It is a very distinct loss to the young members of the bar. Such high technical skill, I regret to say, is rarely seen. It is largely by observation of great advocates that the bar grows in strength. And now this brilliant leader is gone from the sight of men.

It will be a long time—a very long time indeed—before such an advocate appears again among us.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, when the original order was made it was not stated that when the Private Calendar is considered it should be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. It is for the convenience of Members and for the expedition of business that bills on the Private Calendar be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and I now ask that this be done the same as heretofore.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that bills on the Private Calendar to-day be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that the consent agreement which was entered into for the consideration of the Private Calendar to-day was for bills unobjected to?

Mr. TILSON. Bills unobjected to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the Private Calendar will be called after the Consent Calendar, I presume.

The SPEAKER. That rests with the House, of course, but I think the gentleman from Connecticut said that would be the procedure.

Mr. TILSON. The Consent Calendar was mentioned first.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 17]

On motion of Mr. TILSON, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the order of the House the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN] for 25 minutes. [Applause.]

LEGISLATION TO PREVENT DISTRIBUTION OF INDECENT LITERATURE

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, in case I fail to conclude my remarks in the time allotted to me, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FROTHINGHAM). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would not use the time I expect to consume this morning if I did not intend to discuss a matter of nation-wide interest and importance. It is a nonpartisan question.

I propose to discuss two bills that are now pending in the House, whose purpose is to prevent the distribution of obscene, filthy, and lewd literature, and I shall offer in evidence one magazine and one volume—the magazine labeled "Telling Tales," the volume labeled "The President's Daughter," and which—the book I particularly mean—ought never to be allowed to circulate in a civilized country. [Applause.]

To show the interest that people have in this matter I offer three letters from different portions of the country before I begin my remarks. I select one from the North, one from the South, and one from my own district.

The first is a letter from Lincoln, Nebr., from L. L. Coryell & Son, grain merchants. I assume the gentlemen from Nebraska know the firm. It is a reputable one, I am informed. The letter is dated January 21, 1928, addressed to me, and, after the caption, says:

I congratulate you on your resolution to establish a national board of books and magazines censorship.

The next letter I desire to read into the RECORD is from Summerville, Ga., written by B. W. Farrar, cashier of a bank in Summerville, Ga., and reads as follows:

If you can put through your bill to censor magazines, you will go a long way toward curing one of the greatest evils of the age. I am not a "reformer," but something certainly needs to be done along this line for the good of our children and wives. Good luck to you.

Yours very truly,

B. W. FARRAR.

I do not personally know these people.

I have made a study of this matter for a number of years, and a year or two ago I had the following letter and this magazine [indicating] from a constituent in my own district. He says:

Really what I wish to write you about is something relating to barring from the mails the salacious publications that seem to be sold at about all the news stands of the country, such vile literature as Snappy Stories, Telling Tales, College Humor, and perhaps a dozen or more of other publications, their suggestive vileness should not be put in the hands of the young people or anybody for that matter.

He may not know we have a statute now which prohibits the sending of such matter through the mails, but that statute is not very well enforced, and I propose a broader statute, which, if it can be enacted into law, will prevent any kind of agency circulating this kind of literature from State to State, in the District of Columbia, or anywhere in the country.

It seems the public schools are full of this nasty literature that tells everything by suggestion that could happen and some things that are nauseous. The effect of these things you well know. You spoke of in one of your letters that you and some colleagues were framing a bill that would remedy this situation; I sincerely hope it will have a good hearing and will pass at this session. Now, I have boys and a daughter; these books are handed to them at times by fellow students, and sometimes the news dealer will hand out a copy, knowing that some people are intensely interested in sex matters, and will read this suggestive literature and want more of it. I have seen enough of it to prove that it has a bad effect on good morals, it surely is a bad situation to contend with along moral lines. It does seem that the Government needs good, pure lives, and anything to try and conserve the right kind of morals is a benefit to the Nation, to the State, to the community. It does seem that present laws are not ample to control this evil; I have referred some of these publications to the post-office inspectors, but one inspector refers the matter to another, it finally goes to Washington, D. C., and then seems to die there.

People in general have hardly been aroused sufficiently along this line; they would be if they knew the enormity of this evil.

T. A. WINKLEMAN,
Rogers, Ark.

I now direct attention to H. R. 7476, introduced in the last Congress and again at this Congress by my brilliant friend from Mississippi, Mr. WEBBER WILSON, and to my own bill on the same subject, H. R. 9777. I desire that Mr. WILSON have full credit for the initial movement looking toward the passage of legislation that the two bills seek to promote.

These bills give the Congress an opportunity to enact a statute intended to prevent the public and private publication and distribution in printed form of obscene, lewd, lascivious, or filthy stories, poems, verses, books, or any material whatsoever of an indecent nature.

Assuming that Congress has jurisdiction to deal with this subject matter, no argument should be required to justify the course suggested. The case argues itself convincingly.

I hold in my hand and offer as exhibits the magazine and book as samples of the kind of printed matter that the bills mentioned seek to outlaw.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. I would like to say to the gentleman that there are thousands of people in the State of Florida who approve his efforts along this line.

Mr. TILLMAN. I thank the gentleman for that assurance, and I think that may be said of other States in the Union.

This is Exhibit A, my colleagues [holding up a magazine]. It is in evidence. Telling Tales, you observe, in blood-red letters at the top of the page and labeled in midnight black as "a magazine of speed, spice, and sparkle." Speedy it is.

It sells for 20 cents and was sent me by Mr. T. A. Winkleman, my friend and constituent, who states that this magazine is placed on sale each month in one of the largest towns of my district.

On the cover you will note the dazzling picture of a flaming flapper, with just a few more clothes than were worn by Eve before she tied on, with a young grapevine, her first apron of fig leaves. [Laughter.]

Under this entertaining picture is the interesting announcement that a "limited number of artist's proofs of this cover, without lettering, can be supplied for 35 cents each." That is to say, they will eliminate the lettering, like the female eliminated most of her clothes, so that nothing will divert the attention of the spectator from the short-skirted flapper aforementioned.

This "lettering" that they promise to remove tells of the contents inside: "The temptation of faint Anthony, a titillating tale by Nancy Lowe, in which the girl is willing and the man is weak"; "Once a divorcee"; "Whirlpools of love"; "New York nights"; and "Don Juan, jr." The senior Don Juan was quite a rake.

At the bottom of the cover, in Niagara-blue caps, is this boastful statement: "Combined monthly distribution, 1,500,000 copies." This bill, if passed, will curtail that number exactly a million and a half.

Here follow some of the advertisements:

"Send for our .32 automatic pistol, $8.95." Another one: "Send for our amazing quick-acting 'Pep Tablets'—will give you needed 'pep' in 20 minutes." Quick action.

Glance through the putrid pages of this publication and you will find it teeming with vile obscenity, disgusting suggestions, lewd jokes, and rank sexual appeals. It might not harm such blasé oldsters as you or me, but it is quick and deadly poison for the young.

Bring this issue home to our own firesides. None of us want our boys and girls soiled by contact with this filth. The young people do read these magazines; they can easily procure them; they constitute a material part of the monthly one and a half million of this magazine's readers.

Whose business is it to attempt at least to stop the far-flung circulation of this rotten and harmful literature. It is our business. There are many abuses that we can not control, but we can end this sorry practice. [Applause.]

Now, do not misunderstand me. I am not narrow, hidebound, or radical. I simply desire to mitigate or end an admitted evil for the public good.

COMPARISONS NOT INTENDED TO BE ODIOUS

I am not a pessimist on mankind or womankind. I do not believe the race is hell bound. I am an optimist on America; I doubt it we are growing very much worse; we may be getting better in many ways, but in some things, in some practices, old customs seem to me superior to the new. I am not attempting to lecture, but while I am discussing the one great abuse that I have just gone into I beg to offer a few observations with the very best of intentions. I am interested in young people, always have been, and always expect to be, and desire to help them and not to insult or injure them. Hence, what I say is intended to warn and to benefit them. The sole motive that prompted me to introduce the bill under consideration was to attempt to separate young people from certain contaminating influences. So, if I may, I will point out a few things that to me seem alarming.

COLLEGE MEN AND CO-EDS

The membership will recall that Congress is responsible for the great work of establishing agricultural colleges throughout the States. Congress each year makes large appropriations to maintain these institutions of learning, so we have the right to keep an eye on their conduct and their method of imparting instruction, discipline, and so forth.

Yesterday I talked with a former college president now a Member of this House. He agreed with me that the pendulum as regards social relations between college men and women has swung dangerously away from where it was 20 years ago. I hope and believe it will swing back to normal. I have the utmost faith in the good intentions and character of the average college man and woman.

I recently talked with a progressive dean of women in one of the co-educational colleges. She complained of the deportment of college men and women on the campus, at social gatherings, at fraternity houses. She said, "When I began my deanship I observed but little of the gross petting that one sees now. Then the girls did not smoke cigarettes, did not smear scarlet paint over their faces, and when walking with a boy they would not allow him the liberties he now takes. They often walk hand in hand, often with arms intertwined." That is her observation, not mine. I think that is true. Now, there is less knightly respect, less polite consideration, less gracious courtesy once everywhere in evidence at the higher institutions of learning. I emphatically disclaim charges of gross wrongdoing, but long for a return of the rule of conduct in the respect mentioned, that obtained formerly.

SOME YOUNGSTERS NOT IN COLLEGE

Some young women smoke, some swear, some use enough red paint in a year to cover the west side of a barn. Some wear skirts as abbreviated as those of the flapper pictures on the magazine cover in evidence. Passing a small town between here and St. Louis, at about the twilight hour, I saw a packed auto, of both young men and women, with their limbs tangled and intertwined like a nest of amorous water moccasins. [Laughter.] These suggestive and foul publications, so easily obtained, so widely read, are in some degree, a great degree, I think, responsible for reckless conduct on the part of young people, and some old people, too. Elderly people are not free from folly; but God save the boys and girls, the oldsters do not matter so much. [Applause.]

OLD CUSTOMS AND NEW

The old ways are not necessarily the best, but there was more chivalry then than now, more manly respect for women, and respect for women is a manly virtue indeed. There are those who favor companionate or trial marriage in lieu of real marriage. God forbid. The movies have destroyed the lecturers, the drama. Jazz has crowded out real music. The Bat draws better than Macbeth, doggerel is more read than the fine lines of Tennyson or Milton. I may be old-fashioned, but I think of the Virginia reel, and the stately minuet as preferable to the twisting, wiggling modern dance. [Applause.] It is a trite saying, but distance does lend enchantment, and familiarity does engender contempt. All people, especially the young, are safer away from the blighting touch of indelicate suggestion. [Applause.]

The charioteer of a warlike king was killed in battle. He sought a new driver. One candidate presented himself, and the king said: "How close to yonder precipice can you, with safety to me, drive my chariot?" Said the man: "I can drive your chariot within a foot of the edge of that bluff and carry you safely by." To the second applicant the king said: "What can you do?" "Why," said No. 2, "I can drive you so close to the edge of that precipice that one-half of the rim of the tire will project over the edge of the bluff, the other half on the solid stone, and not endanger your life." The last man said to the king: "Your majesty, if you should ask me to drive your chariot by that deep chasm I would drive you as far away from the edge as I could drive you." "You are the man I want for my charioteer," said the king. And so let us keep our children as far away as possible from all dangerous, suggestive, corrupting agencies . I do not know of a father or mother in the land who would want the boy or girl to read this or similar magazines or would put into their hands the book known as the President's Daughter. [Applause.]

So I seek by this proposed measure to keep our children from contact with damaging suggestiveness. I take no pleasure in finding fault. I had rather look at the stars than into a cesspool, but I know that it will not suffice simply to quote "to the pure all things are pure." In truth and in fact we first endure vice, then pity, then embrace it.

The outraged Lucrece gave us classic advice on this very subject:

O opportunity, thy guilt is great
Thou makest the vestal violate her oath;
Thou blowest the fire where temperance is thawed;
Thou smotherest honesty, thou murderest troth,
Thou foul abettor, thou notorious bawd
In thy shady cell, where men may spy him
Sits sin, to seize the souls that wander by him.

THE PRESIDENT'S DAUGHTER

Suddenly like a blast from hell appeared a volume that this bill, if enacted into law, would interdict. I will treat the matter as delicately as I can. Many of us had close fraternal relations with the dead statesman assaulted, and respected him, liked him, believed in him. We feel a grievance at this attack. Politics does not matter in this affair. After our children lay us to rest in the churchyard we want our frailties to remain in our narrow abode undisturbed. An English author tells of a band of toothless warriors who fought with the stench of their gums. This is the kind of warfare we are considering.

I make no war on women. I do not believe a woman wrote the book. I believe that the volume was written by some "fellow of the baser sort" for the money he saw in the enterprise. People rush to the book stalls and in some places pay $7 the copy for it. It has page after page of brazen description, sickening details, monstrous charges. The story is sordid, selfish, woven into a warp of shame and a woof of infamy, the grossest attack ever launched against the living or the dead. It is a sorry bird of prey that strikes its beak into the heart of the sheeted dead. This book went into the homes of dear ones, where there were tender memories, filial love, undying respect, and left those homes filled with blighting sorrow, humiliation, chilling darkness, anguish, heart scars, and soul scars. Those who suffered most were guilty of no wrong certainly, if indeed there was wrong anywhere. What motive? Why, the jingling of the guinea helps to explain it. I make a respectful salute to all our dead Presidents. [Applause.]

BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 9022. An act to authorize the town of Alderson, W. Va., to maintain a public highway upon the premises occupied by the Federal Industrial Institution for Women at Alderson, W. Va.

CRITICISM OF SPEECH OF ADMIRAL PLUNKETT

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FROTHINGHAM). The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I send to the desk a clipping that I desire to have read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

COOLIDGE DENIES RUMOR UNITED STATES PREPARING FOR WAR—STATEMENT ATTRIBUTED TO REAR ADMIRAL PLUNKETT HELD PUBLICITY MOVE—REBUKE IS WITHHELD

In the opinion of President Coolidge, no one need take seriously the sanguinary prediction of American Army and Navy officials that the United States is about to go to war with its commercial rivals.

This announcement of the President's view, made at the White House yesterday, came in reply to a statement attributed to Rear Admiral Charles T. Plunkett, commandant of the Brooklyn Navy Yard, in which he warned that an outbreak of hostilities was not far distant.

Such a stir was created in European newspapers that the White House felt impelled to explain that declarations of this nature are the usual way in which officers of the national defense attempt to work up domestic sentiment at a time when Army and Navy appropriation bills are about to be considered in Congress. Although willing to concede it is the duty of defense officers to work for the best interests of the elements they serve, Mr. Coolidge is displeased with the turn their warlike statements sometimes take, but so far as he can see there is nothing to be done.

* * * * * * *

If he should publicly point out the inadvisability of their statements, he feels that he would only be accused of muzzling free speech. He believes he can simply recommend to the Army and Navy officers that they consider the welfare of their country in a larger sense. This latest White House gesture toward allaying suspicion of American aggressiveness comes as a prologue to possible further airing of the position of the United States defenses when Congress takes up shortly the administration's proposal for a $740,000,000 rounding out of the Navy.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it is a pitiful situation when the President of the United States has felt warranted in denying a rumor or a statement made by Admiral Charles P. Plunkett, commandant of the Brooklyn Navy Yard, which was to the effect that this country is preparing for war with its commercial rivals.

According to the press reports, which relate to the speech made by Admiral Plunkett at the National Republican Club in New York on January 24, he made special reference to the need of a merchant marine in order that our trade competitors might not obtain certain kinds of business. He also made the positive statement that whenever any nation reaches a place where it is as great on the sea as Great Britain the inevitable result will be war.

At the present time hearings are being held by the Naval Affairs Committee, and Admiral Hughes has given as one of the chief reasons for increasing the Navy the necessity for protecting our commerce. In other words, the officials of the Navy are trying to show to Congress that our commerce is so important that it must be protected at all costs.

In marked contrast to this policy, the Nation is confronted with an outburst from a naval officer, which, according to the press, has created one of the greatest stirs ever witnessed in European countries. Such idiotic, asinine outbursts put this Nation in bad repute with other nations of the world, and instead of increasing our commerce with friendly nations, this admiral's prophecy has the effect of curtailing and destroying satisfactory trade relations.

I would like to know from some source if naval admirals feel that they are directing the foreign policy of this country. I would like to know why we have a Secretary of the Navy that apparently can not control such officers as Admiral Plunkett. I have said on many occasions that no individual who is a graduate of either of our military schools should be appointed as a civilian secretary of our department of defense for the reason their early training and environment was such as to make it impossible for them to ever maintain a proper supervision over those who have the same qualifications.

Admiral Plunkett is the commandant of the Brooklyn Navy Yard. Admiral Magruder was the commandant of the Philadelphia Navy Yard. Admiral Magruder made constructive recommendations through the columns of the Saturday Evening Post and the Naval Committee calling attention, first, that we had too many destroyers out of commission; second, that some of our obsolete ships should be decommissioned and men and officers assigned to other positions advantageous to the Navy; and third, that we had too many officers on duty in Washington; and fourth, the enormous loss occasioned by having too many navy yards in operation. I make the statement that the admiral was correct in his charges, and when he concluded his testimony before the Naval Affairs Committee he received the thanks of that committee; yet the Secretary of the Navy, with one fell swoop, whacked his head off officially because he really wanted to do something to make the Navy more efficient; and in striking contrast to what happened to Admiral Magruder the Nation is confronted by a statement from Admiral Plunkett which has hurt her more with England, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and other nations with respect to the maintenance of friendly trade relations than any other single act by an individual for the past 50 years.

Admiral Plunkett will probably not be disturbed, as the newspaper stories say, "Rebuke is withheld." Everyone knows that the Navy has sunk to a mighty low ebb in the estimation of a majority of the people. It is such inefficiency at the head of this great bureau that has brought about the result whereby an officer feels that he has the right to make a declaration with respect to our foreign policy, having either no fear or respect of the Secretary of the Navy or the President of the United States.

Mr. GILBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GILBERT. This is not an isolated instance. Admirals are laying down the foreign policy of our Government in many instances. Rear Admiral Kittelle, stationed in the Philippines, has done more to stir up dissatisfaction in the Philippine Islands and cause ill feeling toward the people of the United States than all other circumstances put together.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I thank the gentleman for the statement.

Mr. GILBERT. He announced last summer that the United States would grant independence to the people of the Philippine Islands whenever all Filipinos could read, speak, and write the English language—and he announced that as the policy of this country toward the Filipinos. These military chieftains are constantly prescribing our foreign policy, and in always militant tones, and should be called down.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I think the gentleman will agree that as long as we allow admirals stationed in different parts of the world to announce the policy with respect to this Government, that instead of building up friendly relations with the countries of the world we are striking down the good feelings, which leaves us in bad repute.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I spoke at the meeting at the National Republican Club, and I may have provoked the statement made by Admiral Plunkett after my speech. I stated that war between England and the United States was not only impossible but was unthinkable. I stated that if the greed of commerce should get us into such a position, and diplomacy should blunder, that then the people of the United States and the people of Great Britain would simply refuse to go to war. Immediately after my speech I had to leave in order to catch a train to return to Washington. After I left a reporter from the New York Herald-Tribune, Mr. Charles White, who is not only a reporter but a great journalist, and who has been known in New York City for the last 30 years as a man of the highest reputation and standing, asked the admiral some questions, and as between Charlie White's word and the admiral's word, I would take the word of Charles White, because his reputation would bear it out.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his interruption, and I say to the House that the only object I have in bringing this to its attention is to show to the Nation that these officers are not being properly directed or controlled by the powers that be at the present time. In other words, if you or I were the Secretary of the Navy we would not stand for any such conduct on the part of an admiral. However, just as long as we appoint to this position men who have been educated in our military schools at the expense of the Government, just that long can you expect situations to exist like those that confront us at the present time with respect to the Navy. How about the Secretary of the Navy at the present time? I say the same situation would exist if he were a Democrat. At present the Director of Operations is one of his classmates. The Commander in Chief of the Navy is another one of his classmates, and I am told that the five who rank the highest with him in that school are the ones who now occupy the responsible positions in the Navy. It is for that reason that one can not tell men who have the same military qualifications and who have been brought up with you in the same class, that they must be quiet and that they must not make these unfortunate outbursts. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. BLACK of New York. In answer to the speech just made by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC].

Mr. BLANTON. In defense of the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. BLACK of New York. The gentleman will learn as I proceed.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is the gentleman going to give us the Tammany views or Governor Smith's views of this controversy?

Mr. BLACK of New York. It would take a man as strong as the Governor of New York to have the gentleman from Wisconsin understand anything.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I know Admiral Plunkett very well, and I for one resent some of the suggestions that have been made about the admiral, not particularly those which have been just made, but those coming from the White House. There is no finer American in this country than the commandant of the New York Navy Yard. [Applause.]

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of New York. Not now.

Admiral Plunkett is about to retire after a very distinguished service to his country. Admiral Plunkett can in no way, except due to his love of the Navy and of the country, be interested in the appropriation bill for the Navy that is about to come to the House. The suggestion that has been made from high official quarters that his speech was prompted by a selfish desire to see increased appropriations is not worthy of the White House.

So far as this talk of war is concerned, war does not come from a speech of any admiral. Great fleets are not built to fight a speech made by any admiral. Great fleets are built with a purpose. If you want to have the genesis of anything like war talk between the great powers of the world to-day, go back to an article written about two years ago by the leading Republican candidate for the Presidency, Secretary Hoover, in connection with foreign monopoly in some of the essentials of life. When the tire companies were about to increase the price of tires and needed to have an advertisement to that effect, the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Hoover, wrote an article denouncing Great Britain's policy in most violent terms in connection with the Stevenson plan of rubber restriction. The gentleman speaks of Admiral Plunkett interfering with foreign policy. Time and time again your Secretary of Commerce has assumed control over the foreign affairs of this country. The gentleman asks, "Where are we going to get our foreign policy from?" That is what the country is asking to-day. It is absolutely hopeless at the present time to expect a foreign policy from the State Department. The State Department could have stopped this situation, could have stopped this increasing of armament throughout the world some time ago. I said on the floor of this House that it was plainly the duty of the State Department when Great Britain started to increase its fleet and Japan started to increase her fleet, after the disarmament conference, to protest to Great Britain and to protest to Japan against the increasing of their fleets after that conference. The 5–5–3 ratio of the disarmament conference was predicated in spirit and it should have been put down in so many terms by Mr. Hughes and our delegates, on maintaining the then existing status of auxiliary craft, or the whole 5–5–3 ratio as to capital ships was absolutely unbalanced and thrown out of gear.

It is the State Department which has fears and doubts, and not Admiral Plunkett, who loves his country, that is responsible for our present relations with Great Britain. It was the State Department's absolute cowardice and fear to live up to its first duty after the armament conference in not protesting against the increase of the British fleet and the increase of the Japanese fleet, and not our admiral, that has caused tension. [Applause.]

AID FOR AGRICULTURE

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE] is recognized.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I want to read the following resolution adopted on national legislation at the ninth annual meeting of the Minnesota Farm Bureau Federation, held in St. Paul, Minn., January 17 to 19, 1928:

The country's attention is called to the policy of the people of the State of Minnesota as laid down by concurrent resolutions to Congress of two consecutive sessions of the State's legislature wherein there was set out the fundamental provisions necessary to restore equality to agriculture, and the creation by legislative and executive action of an agricultural equality commission to that end.

I. We renew our stand in support of this state-wide policy and insist on the early enactment by the present Congress, and Executive approval of legislation embodying these principles, which underlie the whole structure of the McNary-Haugen bill. These principles, which we hold indispensable to any agricultural legislation worthy of the name, are:

(a) Federal farm board with broad powers to meet all conditions affecting agriculture;

(b) Segregation of the exportable surplus of all farm commodities, so as to give the American farmer an American market for all farm products consumed domestically; and

(c) The payment of a commodity equalization fee on all agricultural products going into foreign commerce, thereby preventing governmental subsidy or price-fixing legislation.

We deplore efforts of opposition to these principles, since after four bitter years of tireless efforts of farm organizations no substitute worthy of consideration has been presented.

We demand of the present Congress to stand firm without compromise or waiver to this method of dealing with the critical agricultural situation, and pledge our united and unanimous support to the end that this legislation, long demanded and of immediate necessity, may be speedily provided.

We congratulate our members and farmers generally for their loyalty in this matter, and extend our appreciation to all organizations pledged to and actively assisting in the solution of this the greatest of all modern problems.

II. We favor increased tariff on agricultural products imported that are selling in competition with our farm products, such as corn, flax, eggs, dairy products, hides, and any other farm products that are suffering from such competition.

III. Further we favor the readjustment of tariff schedules on nonagricultural commodities, so as to more nearly equalize the prices between agricultural and nonagricultural commodities.

I include also a portion of the resolutions adopted at the annual meeting of the Minnesota Live Stock Breeders' Association held January 20. The resolution is similar to the first of those adopted at the farm bureau convention. I read:

Word has come from Washington that a few Congressmen serving on the Agriculture Committee are considering the advisability of striking out the equalization fee from the Haugen bill. We wish to inform these gentlemen that we prefer no legislation to a mere gesture. The Haugen bill without the equalization fee would be of no value to agriculture and would destroy all hope among the farm people who are looking to Congress to enact legislation that will make the tariff duties effective on agricultural commodities.

I commend this to the attention of all the Members of the House who are interested in the cause and cure of the present plight of agriculture. I recommend it in particular to the careful perusal and consideration of the Republican Members of my home State of Minnesota, and more especially those good Republicans who are working overtime these days trying to put over the Coolidge-Mellon program of emasculating the McNary-Haugen bill by eliminating the equalization fee. Here is a voice from the grass roots of Minnesota. Please give heed and take notice. [Applause.]

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 190) to provide for more expeditious settlement of money claims against the United States, and for other purposes, be rereferred from the Committee on the Judiciary to the Committee on Expenditures.

I might say that I have consulted the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary and also the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON], the author of the bill, and both agree that the bill properly belongs to the Committee on Expenditures.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, has the gentleman consulted with the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes; with the chairman and with the author of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PROVIDING FUNDS FOR SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. MacGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York presents a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 101

Resolved, That the subcommittee of the Committee on the District of Columbia, now engaged, pursuant to a committee resolution, in an investigation of the government of the District of Columbia, be allowed expenses of the same, not to exceed $2,000, which shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the House Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLANTON. Wherein is this privileged?

Mr. MacGREGOR. It is for a payment from the contingent fund.

Mr. BLANTON. By what authority is it to be paid from the contingent fund?

Mr. MacGREGOR. It will be if the House so directs. The committee has approved it. We did it last year.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall not object to its consideration, but I doubt whether it is privileged.

Mr. MacGREGOR. I do not think there is any doubt about it. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, in some small degree I wish to apologize to the House for taking the time of the House on a matter of relative unimportance, and yet when we realize that the District is our home and that we must pay greater attention to affairs at home you will pardon me.

The committee referred to in the resolution as the committee investigating the government of the District of Columbia is better known as the Gibson committee. Perhaps it would be in better taste, coming from some one who is not a member of the committee, to sing its praises; and yet the chairman of this committee is a man of such modesty that he has never told this House really of the accomplishments of his committee, and, perhaps, as no one but its members know of it, it would be better that the statement should come from me, a member of the minority. This committee functioned throughout the Sixty-ninth Congress, and the results of its investigations have been great.

Two of the civilian commissioners who were then in office have resigned. It was shown by this committee that one of those commissioners was acting as guardian and committee for enough insane wards to keep 10 men busy if he gave the business proper attention. Another one was disclosed to be interested in contracts of large amounts with the District; and, as I have just stated, both of these commissioners have since resigned.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] the other day called attention to a thing that the House should consider seriously, and reform the conditions at St. Elizabeths Hospital. That is one situation that has not been remedied, and it should be. Both the gentleman from Texas and myself called attention to the situation at the last Congress, and called upon the Secretary of the Interior to discharge the superintendent whom the evidence showed conclusively was not suited for that place. I refer to Doctor White. I do not know why action has not been taken, but the facts remain that there are at that institution many more employees than are necessary. To be accurate, they had 1 employee to every 4 patients, whereas in similar institutions in the country as a whole the average is 1 to 8 or 1 to 10. Their bookkeeping is faulty and very misleading. It was shown that one man who had escaped from that institution was reported as having been improved and discharged. The amounts expended in fuel and other supplies were out of all proportion. The attention of the Congress and of the Department of the Interior has been called to that fact, but no step has been taken by those in charge to remedy that situation.

But let me get to a suggestion that is now perhaps more pertinent. You saw in the papers the other day that one of the companies here, the Terminal Co., had on that day paid into the tax collector $239,863 in back taxes extending over a period of 18 years. It is a fact, or it was a fact a few months ago, that four corporations owed the District of Columbia back taxes approximating $1,000,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILBERT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say to my colleague that concerning all of those back taxes we called to the attention of the corporation counsel, the new corporation counsel, whom my friend from Kentucky helped to create and caused to be appointed, has collected from practically all of those corporations the money they owed in back taxes for so many years.

Mr. GILBERT. It has never been my purpose simply to criticize and never to praise. I was coming to that. The gentleman from Texas is partially correct, and under the terrific lashings of that committee the corporation counsel practically admitted his inability to handle the situation, and resigned. The present corporation counsel, Mr. William W. Bride, I want to say, is doing splendid work. He has collected not all, but he is in negotiation as to all of those taxes, with the hope of an early adjustment, amounting to millions of dollars, and, as I say, some of them having been owing for 18 years.

The condition in the police courts as to jury trials is still distressing. They were 16 months behind at the time of that investigation. The recorder of deeds office is far behind. I see present the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. HOUSTON], the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BOWMAN], the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON], and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. They and myself were on that committee. I want to compliment the other members of it for doing a real constructive service without any effort to have their praises sounded. I want to say to you, though, that there never was a more conscientious official who has done better work for the District and who is entitled to the gratitude of the Congress and the taxpayers of the District than the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON]. [Applause.] That committee, largely under his control, has already placed reforms in operation which are now saving the District an estimated $161,258.60 per annum. They have other recommendations which they want to carry on and other investigations to make, not so much for the purpose of criticizing as to construct.

The resolution offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACGREGOR] is simply to allow this committee $2,000 with which to help carry on this work. Most of us on the committee are attorneys and we have never had any attorneys to assist us, but the gentleman from Vermont, as chairman, needs a clerk. We are only asking $2,000. I am sure there is not a Member of this House who is going to complain or would complain if we asked twice as much. But the gentleman from Vermont, acting as chairman, needs a clerk, and I felt this was the proper time to advise the House as to the proceedings of the committee affecting the affairs of its own home city.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILBERT. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman stated that a report had been made to the corporation counsel of the District as to certain delinquent taxes, but has any report been made to the United States district attorney or has any investigation been commenced with reference to the criminal violations of the law which the committee has disclosed?

Mr. GILBERT. I know of no criminal prosecutions pending.

Mr. SCHAFER. But did not the testimony before the committee develop facts which would warrant action being taken for criminal violations?

Mr. GILBERT. Well, we made a very exhaustive report, and, in my opinion, in some instances it did. But that is all I care to say about it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILBERT. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I join with the gentleman in expressing his admiration for the good work done by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON], but I, for one, want to say I have obtained a great deal of information from the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], and I admire the energy of the gentleman from Texas and commend the efforts he has put forth in connection with the work of that committee.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, what I said about the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] was not meant in any wise to single him out as the only one to merit praise. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is a man of untiring energy and great ability. He and Mr. GIBSON make a fine working pair. Mr. BLANTON will find out more than Mr. GIBSON and Mr. GIBSON will make better use of it after it is found out. [Laughter.] Mr. BLANTON is one of the finest investigators I have ever known, and the committee and the Congress owe him great thanks. [Applause.]

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, there is but one proposition before this House, and that is to allow the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] $2,000 for an extra clerk. That is the sole purpose. I feel I have a right to speak against that proposition because I am a member of the Gibson subcommittee. The Gibson subcommittee has done no more than its duty, the duty it owes the people and the duty it owes the Congress. They have merely done their duty, and every committee in this Congress can accomplish just as much in their work that is laid out for them by the Congress as the Gibson committee if they will only work on their propositions. Everything the Gibson committee has accomplished to this date it has accomplished without an extra clerk, and it does not need an extra clerk.

I am with the gentleman from Vermont just as far as he wants to go if he will do it without extra expense to the taxpayers. I have done my share of the work on this Gibson committee and I never asked for an extra clerk. The Congress gives me two clerks; it gives Mr. GIBSON two clerks; it gives Judge GILBERT two clerks; and it gives the other members of the Gibson committee two clerks, the same as it does for every other Congressman. It gives our friend GIBSON a special office in the Capitol close by.

Mr. GIBSON. Will the gentleman permit me to correct him?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. GIBSON. I do not have that office by reason of the fact that I am the chairman of this subcommittee.

Mr. BLANTON. I know; but you have it just the same.

Mr. GIBSON. There is no connection between the two.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, but you have it.

Mr. GIBSON. But I get it by reason of being chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

Mr. BLANTON. You got it because you were Mr. GIBSON, of Vermont.

Mr. GIBSON. That is another matter.

Mr. BLANTON. You have it just the same, and you have all of the perquisites and emoluments that go with an office in the Capitol close to the House. If we are going to give Mr. GIBSON another clerk just because his committee has accomplished something, then every time a committee accomplishes anything from now on they will want an extra clerk. That is the logic of it.

Commissioner Fenning was forced to resign without an extra clerk, and Commissioner Rudolph had things getting so hot around him that he resigned, but without the committee having an extra clerk. I want to say it is unnecessary. I want to say that because a committee accomplishes a little something there is no necessity for it going hog-wild.

Now, there are some things about our Gibson committee of which I do not approve. I do not approve of it going outside of the law in trying to enforce the law. I never have believed in that. There is but one way to do and that is to go according to law. Now, the chairman of our committee, distinguished as he is, able as he is, efficient as he is, and for whom I have the highest commendation on everything except this matter I am going to criticize him about, had your Efficiency Bureau, without legal authority, spend $105,000 and use practically all of its time from March until December last investigating District bureaus, when it is a Federal institution supposed to be investigating Federal business, and nothing else, and had no legal authority to waste its time on District matters.

It wasted $105,000 of the tax money of this country investigating District bureaus. In what way are the people of the United States interested in District bureaus, if you please? Why should they pay the expense of investigating District bureaus, if you please? The District people should pay it themselves.

I do not approve of this. Our friend GIBSON went beyond the pale of the law when he caused that to be done, because there was not any law for it; and the Bureau of Efficiency went beyond the pale of the law when it did these things, because there was no law for it.

This is just a paltry $2,000, but I object to the precedent it establishes. I want to say to you that every member of the Gibson committee will do just as good work without this $2,000 as he will with it. I am carrying my part of the load. I want to say that if I can do my part of it as one member of the subcommittee, our friend Mr. GIBSON ought to be able to do his part of it. What is there about this work that requires another clerk? I can handle my part of it and I think I have brought as much information to the committee as any member of it. I have brought the information to them and I will continue to do it.

I wish the House would not allow this, although there is no way to stop it. It is a bad precedent. We are going to have the time arrive pretty soon when every time a committee does something they will ask for limousines like these naval officers did under the bill which was introduced in the basket through the clerk of the committee, with the name of our friend from Oklahoma, Mr. MCCLINTIC, attached to it.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Does the gentleman think they would ever get it from the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. BLANTON. If they do not get it from the Committee on Accounts, they will get it from some other committee. There is always a way of getting these things.

I want to commend my friend while he is on the floor for forgetting about his bad so-called reorganization bill that he brought in the other day.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Perhaps I have not forgotten it.

Mr. BLANTON. I hope the gentleman will forget it. If the gentleman brings in many more bills like that, the House is going to lose confidence in the gentleman's committee, and it has had the greatest confidence in the committee up to this time. That kind of measure makes us watch the gentleman's bills a little more closely.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON].

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I regret I was not present when this discussion began. My friend the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] refers to precedent and claims this resolution establishes a precedent. The House at the last session granted the committee $1,500 for its work. This was for the purpose of employing a clerk. We did succeed in having detailed to the committee a clerk from a bureau and saved the expense of that work, and we turned back to the Treasury, out of the $1,500, $1,400, and only used $100 for the investigation.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not that show we do not need this?

Mr. GIBSON. But we are unable to secure the same help at the present session.

The work of the committee has so increased, we have such a number of files, we have so many inquiries, so many seeking interviews as to District matters, sometimes 20 or 30 telephone calls during the course of a morning, it is absolutely impossible for the chairman of the subcommittee to attend to all of the details incident to the survey.

The gentleman says we have wasted $100,000. Every cent to which he has reference and which is shown in the testimony of Doctor Brown printed in the RECORD comes about in this way: The Efficiency Bureau allocates against the department that it is investigating salaries and all the expenses of the bureau incident to the work during the period it is making the investigation. A very small amount of money is actually chargeable to the subcommittee by reason of its work. The Bureau of Efficiency follows a system of allocating the time when making the investigations to the committee for which it is making such investigation. There was no added expense. If the Bureau of Efficiency was not investigating matters in connection with the District government, it would be working elsewhere and making allocation of expense elsewhere.

Now, as to authority, the investigation during the last summer was undertaken upon the express request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] who is the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIBSON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. And the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has no more authority to violate the law than any other of the 434 Congressmen. He has the same duty that every other Congressman has to obey the law.

Mr. GIBSON. I deny that there has been any violation of the law in any way, shape, or manner, and I assert that the chairman of the great Committee on Appropriations, that has charge of allocating three or four billion dollars of the money of the people of this country has a right to obtain information as to where it ought to go by every honorable means.

Further, the investigation by the Bureau of Efficiency this last summer was undertaken also at the request of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. The Bureau of Efficiency during the last five years has made at least a dozen investigations of the District, and for the information of the gentleman from Texas I will be pleased to put them in the RECORD. The bureau has made a dozen investigations at the request of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, as it has the right to do.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman again yield?

Mr. GIBSON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask our friend from Vermont what authority has the District Commissioners over any Federal bureau of this Government? Who gave them authority to ask a Federal bureau to obey their behest? There is no such authority.

Mr. GIBSON. A Federal bureau may come in to help any other agency of the Federal Government or of the District government where it can render any assistance and save the money of the people of the country.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 90, noes 3.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote and make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 323, nays 14, not voting, 96, as follows:

PERMISSION FOR THE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS TO SIT DURING SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Military Affairs, including the subcommittee, may be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SNELL). The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Military Affairs and the subcommittee may be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman mean during all the sessions of this Congress?

Mr. MORIN. The Committee on Military Affairs is going to give hearings on the Muscle Shoals beginning next Monday. That takes up a great deal of time, and we want to sit during the period during the disposition of that question.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understand the gentleman is making the request with the formal approval of the committee?

Mr. MORIN. I am directed by the committee to make the request.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will it not be agreeable to the gentleman to limit it to 30 days, and if at the end of that time the committee requires more time he can ask for extension.

Mr. MORIN. We may not require that time, and 30 days will be agreeable to me.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Further reserving the right to object, is the committee going to hold hearings on one measure alone, or will the rest of us who are interested in that be given hearings on our bills?

Mr. MORIN. Here are gentlemen interested in one bill or one phase of a bill. If the gentleman from New York has a bill for the disposition of Muscle Shoals and which is to be heard——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I should like to have a day in court on my bill. I have no misgivings as to what is going to happen to my bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORIN. As far as I am concerned, I would be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. These hearings are to be in the city of Washington?

Mr. MORIN. Yes; in the committee room.

Mr. BLANTON. And there will be no hearings at Muscle Shoals or elsewhere that will cost money?

Mr. MORIN. No.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How many bills are there before the committee on Muscle Shoals?

Mr. MORIN. I am not positive, but I think there are four or five—there may be more.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Up to this time the gentleman thinks the number five. Is there any reason why there should not be a proper hearing on each one of those bills?

Mr. MORIN. The committee may not wish to give hearings on some of the bills, as they do not come within the scope that the committee has outlined.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I asked the question because of the tremendous importance of the problem and the interest that the people of the Nation have in it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the Military Affairs Committee, including the subcommittee, may sit during the sessions of the House for 30 days. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the claim of Syvert A. Anderson, Sixty-ninth Congress, from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to withdraw papers from the files in the case of Syvert A. Anderson. Is there objection?

Mr. TILSON. Reserving the right to object, we would like to know whether there has been any adverse report on it?

Mr. KVALE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORIN], the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, has advised me that this is the proper procedure.

Mr. MORIN. I have no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I do not know a thing about this matter, and so far as I myself am concerned I have no objection; but I think it is the invariable rule that where an adverse report has been made it is not permitted that the papers be withdrawn. If an adverse report has been made in this case, they should not be withdrawn.

Mr. KVALE. I regret to say that an adverse report has been made in this case; but my request is merely to have an affidavit returned.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I think this exception is also made, that in case it is desired to withdraw papers where an adverse report has been made, copies may be left, but that no paper may be withdrawn where an adverse report has been made unless a copy is left in the file.

Mr. BLANTON. The rule does not go that far. The precedents that I have examined are to the effect that where an adverse report has been made no papers are permitted to be withdrawn, and that ought to be the rule and custom.

Mr. TILSON. Yes; but I think exceptions have been made where it is desirable to get the original affidavit.

Mr. BLANTON. I object, unless the gentleman can show there has been no adverse report filed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

ADDRESS OF HON. CHARLES L. ABERNETHY

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein an address delivered last night over the radio by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ABERNETHY].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I offer the following speech made by Congressman CHARLES L. ABERNETHY to the farmers on January 25, 1928, over radio station WTFF, from Washington, D. C.:

AGRICULTURE

The question of substantial farm relief at this session of Congress is largely dependent upon the forces of the South and the West harmonizing and getting together, thereby insuring sufficient votes to override the veto of the President, if necessary, and to place upon the statute books laws which will grant to the farmers equality with industry and with those specially favored by law, insuring to the farmer a reasonable return for his labors and efforts.

For one who has consistently supported the McNary-Haugen bill, I desire to appeal to those who in each Congress put this legislation to the forefront to call into conference not only the western Members of Congress, but also those Members who come from that great agricultural section, the South. Let us come together this session of Congress and so frame this legislation as to enable the southern Members of Congress and the western Members of Congress to join forces and organize and to pass substantial farm-relief legislation through Congress, and to have enough votes to override the veto of the President in the event of his disapproval. The situation of the farmer is too critical for us to play politics with measures designed for his relief. What is needed is legislation, and this we can not secure at this session of Congress unless we iron out the differences and come together on the substantial principles of the McNary-Haugen proposal, regardless of how it may affect the fortunes of certain statesmen ambitious to become President.

Those who represent the great farm organizations of the country must realize that the plight of the farmer at this time makes it imperative that those of us who are consistently trying to give relief to him need more votes in Congress than we had at the last session of Congress; and to secure these votes there must be unity among farm leaders, and the real friends of the farmer in and out of Congress, and that there must be free, open, and full cooperation and organization to secure genuine farm relief this year. So let us counsel together for the common good.

There are loud proclamations from certain quarters that the country is enjoying an era of prosperity, but no one can seriously contend that the farmer is sharing in this prosperity, if it really exists. Agriculture is beset on every hand. The prices to be paid by the farmer for what he is required to purchase are fixed by others than by himself, and the prices which he receives for his labors and the things he produces is also beyond his control. And in this dilemma he finds himself year after year sinking deeper into the mire and the financial slough of despond. He has been told, and rightfully so, that laws now in force in the land are protecting and benefiting industry and others, with no resulting benefit to himself, and naturally he appeals to the Congress and to the powers that be in the Government to grant to him the same rights and privileges, or to abolish the special privileges granted to others. It can not be denied that he is right in his demands. How is this to be brought about? The forces who are the recipients of privileges are strong and powerful, united, and well organized, and the vantage ground gained by them, they will seek to maintain and defend, and the battle is one which can only be won for the farmer by unity in the camp of his friends; hence the great necessity of harmonizing our forces for the conflict.

There are many strong men in the country who have set forth this plan and that plan, and there are many bills pending in Congress which have for their purpose the relief of the farmer, but unless we can get away from pride of authorship and can center our forces on one concrete plan it is well known, with the present conditions as they exist, that the outlook for farm relief is not bright. Favorable signs are appearing during the hearings before the House Agricultural Committee that lead us to expect from that great committee this session one legislative plan which will have the backing of the committee, instead of having three bills reported from the committee as was the case at the last session of Congress.

One of the crying needs at this time is for the various States and also the National Government to bring about the reduction in the farmer's taxes. The total amount of taxes paid on farm property increased from about $344,000,000 in 1914 to about $870,000,000 in 1925, and in the years 1926 and 1927 there has been practically no relief given the farmer in his taxes. Land taxation is all out of proportion as compared with other forms of taxation. Prices received for farm products rose from an index of 100 in 1914 to 209 in 1919, and dropped to 136 in 1926 and to about 130 in 1927. The burden of taxation practically wiped out farm earnings during the years of low returns from farm products.

Need for readjustment of freight rates on agricultural products is imperative. The agricultural situation has been and is now being studied by various groups and from various angles.

Members of Congress have been supplied with interesting and voluminous data. The National Industrial Conference Board and the Chamber of Commerce of the United States have just furnished us with a 273-page book prepared by the Business Men's Commission on Agriculture, and more recently there has been sent to our desks a Report on the Agricultural Situation by the Special Committee of the Association of Land Grant Colleges and Universities, and various other organizations, groups, and individuals have sought to give us light on this perplexing problem.

These various dissertations are helpful in the study of agricultural conditions, but our divided ranks is the most serious problem that confronts us in Congress to-day; and it is my candid opinion, as I said in the outset, what we need most at this critical time is more unity and not so many plans—more votes to effectuate legislative farm relief. Can we secure this harmony? I believe we can. When we do harmonize, there are enough real friends of the farmer in Congress to frame and pass appropriate legislation which will benefit the agricultural masses and give them equal rights and opportunities with others under the laws.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under unanimous-consent order the Clerk will call the Consent Calendar.

OKANOGAN PROJECT, WASHINGTON

The first business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7203) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to transfer the Okanogan project, in the State of Washington, to the Okanogan irrigation district upon payment of charges stated.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SINNOTT. As I understand it, it takes three objectors.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I do not think it requires three in this particular instance, because the bill retains its place on the calendar by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It retains its place on the calendar by unanimous consent, but the Chair understands that it takes three objections.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Under the rule there must be a new filing for the Consent Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair does not understand it that way, but will leave that in abeyance to be decided later.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, there are three objectors, anyway.

Mr. BLANTON. I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] is right about that, and I think the matter ought to be decided now.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Let me suggest that after it has been placed back on the calendar, after one objection, it has to have three objections.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair understands that under unanimous consent it could only retain its place on the calendar and that the next time called it could be objected to.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It is moot in this case.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Only when a bill retains its place without prejudice is one objection required the second time it is called.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was not as the Chair understood it. The Clerk will call the next bill.

UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9202) to authorize construction at the United States Military Academy, West Point, N. Y.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $185,000 for the purpose of razing the old cadet mess hall at the United States Military Academy, West Point, N. Y., and of preparing the plans and specifications and of excavating the ground and otherwise preparing the site for the construction of a new cadet barracks at the United States Military Academy (the total cost of which is not to exceed $825,000): Provided, That the Superintendent of the United States Military Academy, West Point, N. Y., with the approval of the Secretary of War, is authorized to employ architects to draw the necessary plans and specifications from funds herein authorized when appropriated.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, the form of the bill before us, it seems to me, can be materially improved, and I offer the following amendment as a substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CRAMTON offers the following substitute for H. R. 9202: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That there is hereby authorized the razing of the old cadet mess hall at the United States Military Academy, West Point, N. Y., and the construction of a new cadet barracks at a total cost not to exceed $825,000: Provided, That the superintendent of the United States Military Academy, West Point, N. Y., with the approval of the Secretary of War, is authorized to employ architects to draw the necessary plans and specifications from funds herein authorized when appropriated."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the situation, it is contemplated to tear down the old mess hall and to construct a new building, and it was the purpose to have the limit of cost as stated, $825,000, of which not more than $185,000 it is expected shall be appropriated for the fiscal year 1929, later appropriations within the limit of cost to be made. The bill before us it seems to me would leave some confusion as to the necessity for further legislation. The draft which I have presented closes the matter so far as the authority is concerned. The appropriations will have to take their customary course through the Budget and the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is aware of the fact that our Government now has a large corps of expert architects in regular employ. Why can they not design this building? Why is it necessary every time we build a new building in some department to provide that there be employed outside architects, when we have a whole bunch of them already?

Mr. CRAMTON. That question is not directly involved in what I have attempted.

Mr. BLANTON. Your amendment provides that they are authorized to employ architects. The proviso should be retained.

Mr. CRAMTON. In order not to become entangled with that, Mr. Speaker, I will offer my amendment as a substitute down to the proviso, and let the proviso take care of itself. I offer mine only as a substitute down to the proviso.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The substitute was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

PACIFIC BRANCH, SOLDIERS' HOME, CALIFORNIA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6990) to authorize appropriations for construction at the Pacific Branch, Soldiers' Home, Los Angeles County, Calif., and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated not to exceed $2,100,000 to be expended for the construction and installment at the Pacific Branch, Soldiers' Home, Los Angeles County, Calif., of 12 barrack buildings and such utilities and appurtenances thereto as in the judgment of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers may be necessary.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment. The bill as written provides for "12 barrack buildings and such utilities and appurtenances thereto as in the judgment of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers may be necessary." I think if we authorize the buildings and appurtenances and leave it to the Congress to decide what is necessary, on their recommendation, that will be sufficient.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CRAMTON: Page 1, line 7, strike out the word "such" at the beginning of the line, and on line 7, after the word "thereto," strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. CRAIL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to express to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], and those other Members of the House who objected to the passage of this bill on January 16 and who have to-day withdrawn or withheld objection, my sincere personal appreciation for permitting the bill to pass the House at this time.

As the Representative of the district in which the soldiers' home at Sawtelle, Los Angeles County, Calif., is located, I wish also to extend grateful appreciation to all of the Members of this House for their loyalty and patriotism in passing this bill so expeditiously and granting this much-needed relief to the disabled veterans of our Nation's wars.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAIL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I wanted to say that there was not any objection to this bill being considered in an orderly way at any time. The objection was only to taking it up in a hurry before gentlemen had had time to look into it. By delaying its passage a few days, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] has offered a very good amendment to it, which helps out considerably.

Mr. CRAIL. I want to say that 5,000,000 veterans and their families and friends will appreciate the action of the Congress to-day on this much-needed legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAIL. The amendment which has been adopted is entirely satisfactory and perhaps strengthens the bill. I am sure that I can say that the veterans of this Congress, of which there are 88, and the veterans throughout the Nation, of which there are now approximately 5,000,000, their families and friends, will be grateful to the Members of this House for their generous and considerate action to-day in authorizing and directing the replacement of the fire-trap barracks at the soldiers' home at Sawtelle, Calif., with modern, fireproof, sanitary barracks, which will make safe and comfortable the declining years of the disabled veterans who are dependent upon the gratitude of this great Nation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CONSTRUCTION OF MILITARY POSTS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7478) to authorize appropriations for construction at military posts, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I understand the entire amount has heretofore been appropriated?

Mr. WRIGHT. It has been authorized.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There has been some saving in the construction, and the additional amount now authorized is simply a transfer, and does not increase the original amount authorized?

Mr. WRIGHT. That is correct.

Mr. BLANTON. It is a mere matter of bookkeeping?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act to authorize appropriations for construction at military posts, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1927, is hereby amended so as to strike out the authorization therein for $500,000 for barracks at Fort Benning, Ga., and to substitute therefor the following:

"For Fort Benning, Ga., barracks, $300,000; to complete the hospital, $200,000."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

OKANOGON IRRIGATION PROJECT, WASHINGTON

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 1661) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to transfer the Okanogon project, in the State of Washington, to the Okanogon irrigation district upon payment of charges stated.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HILL of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INDIANS OF THE WALKER RIVER RESERVATION

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8281) to provide for the withdrawal of certain described lands in the State of Nevada for the use and benefit of the Indians of the Walker River Reservation.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

The SPEAKER. This bill requires three objections.

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

The SPEAKER. Are there any other objections? The Chair hears but one objection. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-described lands situate in the State of Nevada be, and they hereby are, withdrawn from entry, sale, or other disposition and set aside for the use and benefit of the Indians of the Walker River Reservation: Provided, That this withdrawal shall not affect any existing legal right of any person to any of the withdrawn lands: All of township 14 north, range 30 east; west half of township 14 north, range 31 east; west half of township 13 north, range 31 east; west half of township 12 north, range 31 east; and east half of township 12 north, range 30 east, of Mount Diablo meridian.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CERTAIN LANDS BORDERING ON SUMMIT LAKE, NEV.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8282) to provide for the permanent withdrawal of certain lands bordering on and adjacent to Summit Lake, Nev., for the Paiute, Shoshone, and other Indians.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-described lands in Nevada be, and they are hereby, withdrawn from entry, sale, or other disposition, and set aside for the Paiute and Shoshone Indians, and such other Indians as the Secretary of the Interior may see fit to settle thereon: Provided, That the withdrawal hereby authorized shall be subject to any prior valid rights of any persons to the lands described: Fractional sections 13, 24, and 25, township 42 north, range 25 east; section 1, township 41 north, range 25 east, and fractional sections 5 and 6, township 41 north, range 26 east of the Mount Diablo meridian in Nevada.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

KOOSHAREM BAND OF INDIANS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8292) to reserve 120 acres on the public domain for the use and benefit of the Koosharem Band of Indians residing in the vicinity of Koosharem, Utah.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That 120 acres of land described as the west half southwest quarter and southwest quarter northeast quarter section 9, township 27 south, range 1 west, Salt Lake meridian, Utah, be, and the same is, hereby reserved for the sole use and occupancy of the Koosharem Band of Indians in Utah: Provided, That the rights and claims of any bona fide settler initiated under the public land laws prior to November 5, 1927, the date of withdrawal of the lands, from all form of entry, shall not be affected by this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DISBURSEMENT OF FEDERAL FUNDS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5772) to regulate, control, and safeguard the disbursement of Federal funds expended for the creation, construction, extension, repair, or ornamentation of any public building, highway, levee, dam, excavation, dredging, drainage, or other construction project, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I object.

INTERNATIONAL DAIRY CONGRESS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was House Joint Resolution 156, authorizing the President to accept the invitation of the British Government to appoint delegates to the Eighth International Dairy Congress, to be held in Great Britain during June–July, 1928, and providing for an appropriation of $10,000 for the payment of the expenses of the delegates.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I think the appropriation is too large, and I object.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman will withhold his objection, this is an invitation extended to the United States Government. The President has accepted it and has sent a request to Congress for this appropriation. If the gentleman believes the appropriation is too large, we can reduce it from $10,000 to $9,999.

Mr. BLANTON. We can send a real dairy expert or two as delegates over there without sending a bunch of pleasure seekers from some department down here in Washington, and it does not cost $10,000 to send two delegates to Great Britain.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We want to send a delegation, not a delegate.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, we have so many of these conventions meeting all over the world every year at great expense, and little of value is accomplished.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This is a good one, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; they are needed, of course; but we go wild on this subject sometimes. Of course, this is a small amount in itself, but in the aggregate every year it runs into hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. BROWNE. Will the gentleman withhold his objection for a second?

Mr. BLANTON. I withhold it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BROWNE. In 1923 the United States invited all the nations of the world to come here to Washington for a world's dairy conference. Thirty different countries were represented here. It did a great deal of good not only to the dairy interests but to the people who are dependent upon dairy products for a large portion of their food, because dairy products furnish one-fifth of the total food supplies of this country. The representatives of 30 different countries came here, and we are now invited to return the visit and go over to London, take our scientific men there, and have them confer with the scientific men of other countries. There are 10 delegates provided for in this resolution, to be selected from all over the country, and Texas will probably have one.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. In October, a few years ago, there was a meeting in this Chamber of the Interparliamentary Union, of which every Member of this House is automatically a member, and yet, I think, there were but 12 or 15 Members of the House present during that meeting, although about 40 countries were represented here.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But that is an unofficial organization.

Mr. BLANTON. It is just as official as a dairy congress would be.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Would the gentleman from Texas want the delegates from the United States to go to this convention and get their food in a cafeteria or a beanery when the representatives of other nations can carry on with dignity?

Mr. BLANTON. No. There are ministers of the gospel who go there every year at an expense of about $500 or $600 each, and they do not spend $10,000, either.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What do they know about milk?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, well, they might not in New York in the Bowery, but they do in other places.

Mr. BROWNE. In the past we have gotten most of our purebred cattle from Europe. It is not the purpose to send men from the departments here but to send leaders in the dairy industry as delegates.

Mr. BLANTON. As the gentleman has so much interest in it, I will withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I wanted to reserve the right to object, but they talked too fast for me. Am I too late?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman if he desires to object.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I did not want to object, but I wanted to ask a question. I do not want to object because, Mr. Speaker, I do not want this bill to fail. Both the Democratic and Republican Parties have promised something for agriculture, and I do hope this bill will pass, even though it be only an agricultural gesture, because I apprehend this is the only "relief" of agriculture that will have a chance for its white alley during the present session.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to accept the invitation of the British Government to participate in the Eighth International Dairy Congress, to be held in Great Britain during June–July, 1928, as set forth in the message of the President of January 5, 1928, printed as Senate Document No. 36, Seventieth Congress, first session, and to appoint delegates to said dairy congress.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $10,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the payment of the expenses of the delegates in attending such congress, including the compensation of employees, transportation, subsistence, or per diem in lieu of subsistence—notwithstanding the provisions of any other act—and such other expenses as the President shall deem proper.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 2, after line 9, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 3. That the delegates shall make a report to Congress of the results and conclusions of the said dairy congress."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, with reference to the committee amendment, as I understand this report made to Congress is not printed as a matter of course. It is not printed except such printing as is directed by the Speaker. With that understanding I would not have any objection to the amendment. If it is to be printed as a matter of course, no matter what its size or value, I would feel opposed to it, but I understand they are not printed except under direction of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. That is true.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FEDERAL BUILDING SITE AT PHOENIX, ARIZ.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6466) granting a part of the Federal building site at Phoenix, Ariz., to the city of Phoenix for street purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill does not contain the usual proviso contained in such bills, and I will offer verbally such an amendment; otherwise it is unobjectionable. I shall offer an amendment providing that said land shall revert back to the United States whenever it shall cease to be used for street purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman does not object, but proposes to offer an amendment.

Mr. HOOPER. Yes; I shall offer that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to convey by suitable deed to the city of Phoenix, Ariz., for street purposes, the following-described strip of land: The north 7 feet of the east 160 feet of block 93, original town site of Phoenix; a subdivision in the city of Phoenix, Maricopa County, Ariz., according to plat of said subdivision of record in the office of the county recorder of Maricopa County, book 2 of maps, page 51 thereof.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOOPER: At the end of the bill insert "Provided, That said land shall revert back to the United States whenever it shall cease to be used for street purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN MONTANA AND PRIVATE OWNERS OF LANDS FOR GRAZING, ETC.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 445) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to enter into a cooperative agreement or agreements with the State of Montana and private owners of lands within the State of Montana for grazing and range development, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT] if he does not believe it would be better to pass a general grazing law? There is a bill that was pending in both the Senate and the House during the last session and there is one pending in the present Congress, but I understand the State of Wyoming objects, and therefore is holding up consideration of a general grazing bill. If we pass these bills piecemeal, for one State at a time, does the gentleman believe this will help the general situation or will it leave it up in the air as it is now?

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I can not speak for the State of Wyoming. My judgment is that this bill in itself is so meritorious it should not wait for the enactment of general legislation. It was considered in the last Congress, was passed by the House, but failed of passage due to the filibuster in the Senate.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I understand a good deal of this land is railroad grant land. There is nothing in this bill which will prejudice consideration of the general railroad grants now being considered by a special committee of the Congress?

Mr. LEAVITT. Oh, no. The situation is that between two creeks—Mizpah Creek and Pumpkin Creek—there is something over 100,000 acres of land, mostly bad lands, and about one-fourth of it is Government land intermingled with railroad and private land holdings. There is 27,000 acres of this land in Government ownership. The railroad and the other private owners can lease their lands to stockmen living around this area, but are prevented from doing so to any advantage to themselves or the stockmen because of the existence of this 27,000 acres of Government land. This bill is to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to do the same thing with the Government land intermingled with these other lands that the owners of the private lands can now do, to the great benefit of the local stockmen and the permanent development of the stock business there.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, the gentleman knows that if we had all the available land for grazing thrown open for that purpose it would be of benefit not only to the cattle raisers but to the consumers as well.

Mr. LEAVITT. My best answer to that is that during the last year, since the House passed this bill a year ago, both the Montana Livestock Association and the Montana Wool Growers' Association have passed resolutions favorable to the enactment of this particular bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Does this bill follow along the same lines and contain the same provisions, except as to the area affected, that are covered in the bill S. 2584?

Mr. LEAVITT. It does in this way: It gives broad power to the Secretary of the Interior to make his own rules in working this out, with the idea that this is, perhaps, a laboratory in which the problem of how this general question may be met can be worked out.

Mr. CRAMTON. Is there any essential difference between the method provided here and in the general bill?

Mr. LEAVITT. No; only this is the much simpler bill, as it does not hedge it around with rules and regulations.

Mr. CRAMTON. There seems to be some merit in the gentleman's bill in that it may afford a test; but the strange thing is that the department proposing general legislation and unable to get it does not welcome this experiment.

Mr. LEAVITT. I think it does.

Mr. CRAMTON. They say in the letter that they do not see any special objection, but they are not for it.

Mr. LEAVITT. I do not understand it that way. They would rather have a general bill, but they have no objection to this.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I conferred with the Assistant Secretary on this bill, and he expressed a desire to have a general bill passed, and this is one step in that direction.

Mr. CRAMTON. There is always that very dubious attitude on the part of the department. It does not say that there is no objection to it, but they say that we are aware of no objection. There is not the positiveness that I would like to see in the letter from the department.

Mr. WINTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WINTER. The gentleman has stated that Wyoming has been holding up the consideration of the general leasing bill. I am in a position to state that no one at this end of the Capitol has been holding up consideration of any bill of that character. I want it plainly understood that I am against the principle the gentleman is suggesting and will do all in my power to defeat such a bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then the gentleman from New York was not very far wrong, except in the choice of language.

Mr. WINTER. I have made my record in the committee on the bill now before us and do not care to go further. I am not objecting to it here.

Mr. COLTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. COLTON. I will say that I am in favor of a general leasing bill, reserving always the right to make entries on the public domain. I think it is too bad that we have gone this far without a policy; but I believe the gentleman's bill as reported from the committee is a good bill for this reason: If the experiment is successful it will be one more point in favor of general leasing legislation that we are in so much need of. We are not regulating grazing on our public domain, and I understand it is worth $26,000,000,000, and yet we are without any supervision or regulation or control, and anything which will prove the necessity for control ought to be tried. I look upon this experiment as a step in the right direction.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Well, Mr. Speaker, in the hope that the people of New York City may get nice, juicy steaks at a price that they can afford, I withdraw the objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Further reserving the right to object, I want to say that this bill is withdrawing from public entry and homesteading 27,000 acres of the public lands in the State of Montana. I am getting requests daily from members of the American Legion all over the United States who are unable to work industrially and who want to take up homesteads on Government land, and they are seeking it anywhere they can find it. If this 27,000 acres of land is withdrawn from public entry, which the bill will do, it is withdrawn in behalf of the stockmen of Montana and taking it from the soldiers of the country, who have a right to homestead it under present law.

Mr. LEAVITT. The situation is that there have already been homesteaders on much of this land under the enlarged homestead and the grazing homestead acts, and practically every one has abandoned them as unfit for even such purposes.

Mr. BLANTON. But I imagine among all the bad lands there may be some good lands.

Mr. LEAVITT. Those are all covered by homestead entries.

Mr. BLANTON. And sometimes land that is apparently bad will become good land when viewed from a different angle.

Mr. LEAVITT. They have not proved so here. The rest of the land is rock, hillside, and of no agricultural value whatever. I have ridden over it.

Mr. BLANTON. There are times when the rejected stone becomes the main arch of the temple. We are getting letters from all over the country from the boys who upheld the burden of the World War, saying that they want to make application for homesteads.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am generally familiar with this country, and I have had some observation of the misery that is brought to young men who have rendered World War service by their attempts to develop such land. There is nothing better the gentleman from Texas could do than to keep them from having anything to do with such land.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I cite the gentleman to some of the lands that are in the district of my colleague, Mr. HUDSPETH. Years go, when you could buy them for $1 an acre, people were deemed fools who bought that land, and now, those lands in certain vicinities are worth $100 an acre and more for oil leases. Take the land out in Reeves County, in that big oil field, and in Upton County, near Rankin, the lands are most valuable.

Mr. LEAVITT. But this is left subject to oil and other mineral entry under this bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. On the other hand, let me remind the gentleman that in the State of Wyoming there is also oil, and I suppose the possibility of some future development, but there have been lands that had water on them, which were irrigated, where service men took them up, and this Congress later passed an act appropriating money to refund to those men the fees that they had paid and the money that they had expended, when they abandoned the lands, but we could not refund to them the time that they had spent there nor compensate them for the misery that they had undergone.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman from Michigan been grazing out there in Montana on some of these lands during the past summer?

Mr. CRAMTON. I would not want to be condemned to do it for very long.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am through. I feel constrained to object, and I do object. We must save this land for our ex-service men.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

BIEBER BUILDING

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 1968) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to pay for the use and occupancy by the Department of Agriculture of the Bieber Building, 1358 B Street SW., Washington, D. C., and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think the House ought to know what happened in this case. The United States Government, through the Department of Agriculture, entered into a lease with the owners of this property for a period 10 years, with a renewal clause for 10 years at the same rental. This was some 10 years ago. As you all know, a lease for a certain length of time may be recorded, and it is binding upon any subsequent owner. Somebody in the Department of Agriculture at the time the lease was made must have taken one sheet of the lease from the document when it was recorded, with the result that while the lease consisted of five pages, only four pages were recorded, and the fifth page, which contained the renewal clause, was not recorded. Therefore, when the building was transferred to the new owners they took without notice.

When the Government sought to exercise its option on the renewal of the old lease, the new owner said he wanted more rent. The Government rested upon its old lease and upon the fact that the new owner had notice by reason of the recording of the lease. Then it was discovered that 10 years ago, at the time the lease was made, somebody pulled this trick, with the result that now, instead of paying $35,000 a year, the Government is committed to a payment of $55,000 a year.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. How does the gentleman from New York know that it was somebody in the Department of Agriculture that withdrew the page? Might it not have been done in the recorder of deeds' office?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will put it this way: If that happened, whoever had charge of recording the lease was very lax, because whenever I record a lease for one of my clients, I see to it that it is properly recorded.

Mr. BLANTON. The fault is in the gentleman's party in putting the wrong man in there as recorder of deeds.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Unfortunately, the "gentleman's party," to which the gentleman from Texas refers, was not in control 10 years ago. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Well, this wrong man is there now, and the Republican Party is responsible for it. He is the most unpopular recorder of deeds, with his employees, that they have ever had.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I can only leave that to the good graces of the gentleman from Texas, and hope before the gentleman leaves this body to go to the body at the other end of the Capitol we may be able to get rid of this man. Mr. Speaker, this matter having been decided by the courts, there is nothing left for the Government to do except to pay the rent. I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to pay to Harry Wardman, Thomas P. Bones, and James D. Hobbs, at the rate of $55,000 per annum for the use and occupancy by the Department of Agriculture of the Bieber Building, 1358 B Street SW., Washington, D. C., during the fiscal years 1926, 1927, and 1928, and the unexpended balances in the appropriations for rent for said department in the District of Columbia for the fiscal years 1926 and 1927, and the amount included in the appropriation for rent for said department for the fiscal year 1928 for said building, in all $119,323.12 shall be available pro tanto for said purpose, and there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the further sum of $45,676.88 to enable said Secretary to pay for the use and occupancy of said building for said fiscal years at the annual rate aforesaid, and if at any time hereafter during the occupancy of said building by said department the Secretary of Agriculture shall deem it for the best interests of the Government to lease said building for a term not exceeding 10 years he is hereby authorized, with the approval of the Public Buildings Commission, to do so.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, the form in which the bill is offered makes it subject to a point of order, but instead of making the point of order I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON: Beginning on page 1, in line 8, after the figures "1928," strike out the remainder of line 8, all of lines 9, 10, and on page 2, all of lines 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8, and strike out the word "is," spelled with a small "i," and insert the word "Is" capitalized.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ISOLATED TRACTS OF PUBLIC LAND

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6684) to amend section 2455 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended, relating to isolated tracts of public land.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. WINTER] a question. Why should we not put an amendment into this bill to provide for the proper advertisement of this land that is to be sold at public auction?

Mr. WINTER. That is provided for in the rules and regulations of the Interior Department. This law has been on the books for a long time. The only amendment has been to change from 160 acres to 320 acres.

Mr. BLANTON. What is the rule for advertising?

Mr. WINTER. It requires several weeks' notice to be given.

Mr. BLANTON. Merely in the county where the land is situated, or where?

Mr. WINTER. As a rule, in the paper published nearest to the place.

Mr. BLANTON. In the county?

Mr. WINTER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. In the county where the land is situated?

Mr. WINTER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Are there not some counties where there are comparatively few people?

Mr. WINTER. Yes, comparatively few; that is correct.

Mr. BLANTON. Only a few cattlemen?

Mr. WINTER. We have small settlers in every county.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall not object.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice this is to amend the Revised Statutes of the United States, "section 2455 of the Revised Statutes." The Revised Statutes is a codification of the laws of the United States made in 1878. Only a few years ago we undertook to recodify the laws of the United States. We have now what is known as the "Code of Laws of the United States of America." Twenty thousand copies were authorized to be printed. They have been printed, and half of them have been bound, and this code of laws is in every executive department; in possession of every Member of Congress; it is in all the Federal courts of the United States and is in the hands of the chiefs of every important bureau under the Government of the United States. I understand that about 7,500 have been sold at the price fixed, $4.25; that is, the lawyers over the country have them.

Now, we continue to bring in bills here to amend statutes. There are the Revised Statutes and the Statutes at Large, and we refer to an act passed on such and such a date. I do not think a bill has come before the House to amend a section or title of this new code of laws, and no reference has been made in any proposed amendment to this new code of laws.

Now, this code of laws, which we spent a great deal of money to put out, and in which many people have invested for their own private use, becomes less valuable when subsequent Statutes at Large come out, or the session laws, because there is nothing in the session laws or the Statutes at Large when they come out to indicate what section or sections of the code of laws is amended, and it is impossible to locate the section in the code of laws that is amended by anything in the amendatory act. I would like to know why, inasmuch as we have this new code of laws, no reference is made in bills to amend existing law as to where that section can be found in this code of laws.

Mr. WINTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. WINTER. Yes. I think the gentleman is making a very good point and I am in favor of it, and, so far as I am concerned, I will try to conform to it in the future.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The way to make a start is to make the start. If you know you are all right about a thing, you ought to conform your conduct to that knowledge right now and not put it off to a future date.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Certainly.

Mr. CRAMTON. I think the gentleman's suggestion is a splendid one. There is nothing anyone can do that would be better than one Member to give attention to that and offer amendments where needed from time to time. Several of us do make a study of other points. I think the gentleman from Iowa could very fittingly offer such amendments when we come to them, and by so doing he would render a great public service.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The purpose of my remarks is not to create a new duty for myself, but I do want the existing situation clarified and get this House to take some definite attitude with respect to this new code of laws. Now, it is true that this new code is only prima facie evidence of what the law is, but unless it can be proven that a provision in the new code of law does not conform to the recognized sources of the law, such as the Revised Statues or the Statutes at Large, then such provision in the new code is as much the law as if it appeared in the Revised Statutes.

Mr. BLANTON. If we amend this we should make reference to the section that we are amending.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The gentleman means we should make reference to the code of laws?

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman could do this, would the farmers of Iowa be thoroughly satisfied, so far as this session of Congress is concerned? [Laughter.]

Mr. RAMSEYER. Of course, that is aside from the issue here, and I do not think it worth while to take up the time of the House to answer the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is doing such a splendid work here for the farmers that I am inclined to resent the suggestion implied in the statement of the gentleman from Michigan that he has extra time on his hands in which he can do additional work.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The gentleman has time to do anything that is necessary to be done. If this is one of the things that is necessary to be done, I shall do it, and I will take care of it.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. If either the author of the bill or the gentleman from Iowa has not prepared an amendment which would make the bill now before the House conform to his suggestion, I think it would be wise to have this bill passed over until such an amendment can be prepared.

Mr. RAMSEYER. There is, of course, some question as to just what recognition ought to be given to the new code of laws. If no one has looked into the question as to just what recognition should be given, I think it ought to be referred to a committee selected to give it study and determine whether or not it would be safe, in bringing in bills to amend statutes, to refer only to the new code of laws and not to the other sources that existed before the new code of laws. I see that the chairman of the committee that reported to this House the new code of laws of the United States is here, and probably he has something of value to present. I yield to him.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, the question which is before the House is one of great importance, as I think most of us realize. More than 30 years of futile efforts were spent in an attempt to put the laws of the United States into a form in which they could be found by judges, by members of the bar, and those who deal with the law of the country. The code as we now have it is the result of the best work of these years, and represents the experience of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. To that work Judge Little, of Kansas, gave his life. That committee in preparing this code had the cooperation of the two greatest law-publishing concerns of the United States. Their private works have so great a vogue and standing in the country that they are used as reliable sources of information as to what the law was and is. Their works had so great a standing that the Compiled Statutes of the West Publishing Co. were amended on the floor of this House as the official act of this Government, and the error was only discovered by the Clerk of the House just before the bill was enrolled.

If we are to keep the ground we have gained with the code, all bills which amend the general and permanent laws ought to make reference to the pertinent sections of the code by title and section numbers.

I should say that the words by which the Revised Statutes of the seventies were adopted are a combination of words that repealed the former enactments and words that enacted the Revised Statutes in lieu thereof. The enacting clauses of the Revised Statutes were complicated by the great number of special provisions which amounted, in fact, to a reenactment of the laws which they were repealing, because of the fear that in adopting a bill of the magnitude of the Revised Statutes errors would creep in. There were hundreds of errors in the Revised Statutes which were corrected by amendatory bills of the next few years, 1874–1878. When the code bill, conforming to the enacting language of the Revised Statutes, was presented in the Senate some Senators, on account of its great magnitude, were more fearful than ever that there might be errors in the code, and they felt that even the language adopted in 1873 to preserve the integrity of the law as it was, and to make the original always the touchstone and the standard by which the legislative intent was to be measured and judged, was not sufficient, and so they introduced an amendment to the enacting clause to the effect that the statement of the laws of the United States in the code should be prima facie evidence of the law of the country, but always, of course, subject to an investigation of original sources.

Now, those of us who have had some training in the law realize that that is all the force that any enactment of this Congress is or ever will have. Courts pass upon the law not by the words alone which Congress or a legislative body uses to express the intent. The law itself is intangible. The legislative intent is judged by the language which is used, but that is not the sole means by which courts get at what the legislature intends. Consequently, for all practical purposes there is no distinction between the enacting language of the Revised Statutes and the enacting language of the code. It is the law unless by reference to the Revised Statutes or the Statutes at Large—knowing that the code is intended only to be a reenactment of existing laws in scientific forms—it should be found that there is error. Then, of course, the courts, no matter what the enacting language of the code might be, would refer to the original source and construe that law with reference to it.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. I would suggest to the gentleman as a practical matter that an amendment may be offered, and while the rest of us have been talking the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] has been working and has just submitted to me an amendment which I think will serve the purpose by citing not only the Revised Statutes but also the code to which the gentleman from Ohio has been referring. If we allow this bill to pass the objection stage and reach the amending stage, the gentleman from New York has an amendment which will serve the purpose we all have in mind and start the practice, I hope, of making reference to the new code and possibly a double reference for some time to come, both to the code and to the original source.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. If the House will indulge me a moment——

Mr. RAMSEYER. I yield further.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Since this matter has been brought up it is probably proper that at this time I should develop the matter just a moment further. It is the idea and purpose of the Committee on the Revision of Laws to present to the House and to Congress a system of cumulative codification so that after each session of Congress there will be, in addition to the ordinary Statutes at Large, a supplement prepared in the form of the code and keyed up to the code, containing all the permanent and general law of the session; and that after each succeeding session of Congress this supplement will be taken to pieces and revised to pick up the previous supplement and its contents and add to it that of the work of the succeeding session, so that we may never fall into the chaotic condition which existed since 1878, but have only the code and a single supplement to refer to to get accurate information as to the statute law of the United States.

Mr. RAMSEYER. If the gentleman will permit a question, is his Committee on Revision of the Laws considering legislation repealing previous enactments like the Revised Statutes so as to make the code the law and not only prima facie evidence of the law?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. The committee has considered this very informally. The time has not come to submit this matter to either the House or the Senate by members of the Committee on Revision of the Laws giving absolute assurance, if that ever will be possible, that in the whole body of restatement of this law there is absolutely no error. It is impossible as the Senate is at present, and possibly as it always will be, constituted, to give such assurance as would seem to warrant their entering a complete and radical repeal of all the former enactments of the United States, although practically I say to my friend from Iowa and to this House, if the Senate and House did so agree and that were done, we would not strengthen the code practically an iota, because, as I have said before, the statement of the law, the intangible law, is merely evidence of the legislative intent, and courts deal almost exclusively with legislative intent.

It is the hope, however, to present to Congress at some future time for enactment a bill which will give the code with the corrections which are being gathered in from the Federal bench and the bar and the different law-book publishing concerns of the country and all the bureaus and departments of our Government which are using the Federal law more specific force. It is the idea to have diligently searched out every error and correction made in the supplements, awaiting a new and more perfect edition of the code embodying the substance of the last supplement and all the corrections. I hope that no error may escape observation.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I hate to interrupt this discussion, but I demand the regular order. This extraneous debate can be taken up at some other time.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. I think the gentleman is perhaps right.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, I am still reserving the right to object. I have nothing further that I want to say and I only intended to hold the reservation to object until we could hear the proposed amendment. I do not want to withdraw the reservation until I know what the amendment is to be.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. The regular order has been called for.

Mr. BLANTON. If we can soon go on with the calendar, I will withhold the request for the regular order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The amendment is to strike out all of lines 3, 4, and 5, on page 1, and insert the following:

That section 1171 of Title 43 of the United States Code (Sec. 2455, Rev. Stats. U. S.) as amended be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows——

Mr. RAMSEYER. Then it would read "Section 2445," and so forth?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is in parenthesis.

Mr. RAMSEYER. No; I am referring to line 6, page 1. You make no change there, and when the proposed amendment appears you will not have the present language from lines 3 to 5.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, no; you will then have section 1171 of Title 43.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this important correction ought to be done in committee. I object to the bill.

EASEMENT OVER CERTAIN GOVERNMENT PROPERTY AT CICERO, ILL.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7472) to grant to the town of Cicero, Cook County, Ill., an easement over certain Government property.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to grant to the town of Cicero, Cook County, Ill., an easement over the south 7 feet of that parcel of land owned by the Government of the United States situated between Fifty-second and Fifty-third Avenues and Twenty-fifth Street and Twenty-fourth Place for the purpose of widening an alley in such township such easement shall continue so long as the land shall be used exclusively for alley purposes.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 9, after the word "township" strike out the remainder of the bill and insert: "to a width of 14 feet; said 14-foot alley to be repaired and maintained as are other public streets and alleys in the said town. Such easement shall continue only so long as the land shall be used and maintained exclusively for alley purposes."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESA VERDE NATIONAL PARK, COLO.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8744) to accept the cession by the State of Colorado of exclusive jurisdiction over the lands embraced within the Mesa Verde National Park, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, if anyone wants the bill read in full I have no objection, but I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered as read. It is several pages in length. I simply call attention to the statement that appears in the report of the committee that the draft of the bill submitted herewith has been drawn along the lines of previous legislation accepting the cession of jurisdiction by the States in other national parks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, the bill we have just passed results from the action of the State of Colorado in ceding to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the Mesa Verde National Park. The State of Colorado has two national parks—the Mesa Verde National Park and the Rocky Mountain National Park. I do not know that the State ever promised to cede jurisdiction over the Mesa Verde, but it is a very fine thing that they have done so, and it will help in the administration of the park area.

But the State of Colorado did expressly promise to cede jurisdiction over Rocky Mountain National Park when they asked the creation of the Rocky Mountain National Park, and I will put in the RECORD the complete resolution:

SENATE CHAMBER,
STATE OF COLORADO,
Denver, April 12, 1913.

To the Hon. WOODROW WILSON,
President of the United States, Washington, D. C.

EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to transmit to you Senate Joint Resolution No. 22, unanimously adopted by the Nineteenth General Assembly of the State of Colorado.

Respectfully,
MARK A. SKINNER,
Secretary of Senate.

The White House. Received April 17, 1913.
Department of the Interior. Received April 19, 1913.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 22

By Senator Cross

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the General Assembly of the State of Colorado, would respectfully represent that under and by direction of the Secretary of the Interior, the Hon. R. R. Marshall, chief geographer of the department, recently visited Colorado to determine by personal observance whether there should be established in Colorado a national park.

That the said Marshall, following the said order, visited Colorado, and after a careful and painstaking examination of the country proposed to be included in said national park, recommended the creation of the same.

That the people of Colorado desire that said park shall be established. It includes the highest mountain peaks in the State; the area is little adapted to either agriculture or grazing; its scenery for sublimity and grandeur is not excelled on the continent. Its location is easy of access to America's millions who seek health and recreation in the summer months, it being situated in the front and main range of the Rocky Mountains.

We therefore urge that you pass an act creating the said Rocky Mountain National Park, adopting the metes and bounds as set forth in the report of said Chief Geographer Marshall to the Secretary of the Interior, and embodying provisions as contained in a bill for an act creating the said park, prepared and introduced in the National House of Representatives for that purpose, and hereby declare the willingness of the State of Colorado, upon the passage of a congressional act establishing said park, to cede jurisdiction in the manner customary in such cases.

And this your memorialists will ever pray.

That the secretary of the senate is hereby instructed to transmit to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the President of the United States, and to our Senators and Representatives in Congress a copy of this resolution.

STEPHEN R. FITZGERALD,
President of the Senate.
O. C. SKINNER,
Speaker of the House.

Attest:

MARK A. SKINNER
Secretary of the Senate.

You will note "that the people of Colorado desire said park shall be established," and "declare the willingness of the State of Colorado, upon the passage of a congressional act, establishing said park, to cede jurisdiction in the manner customary in such cases." There is the pledge.

Two or three years ago when in Colorado I learned that a suit was pending—and by the way the jurisdiction has never been ceded—to which the name of the State of Colorado had been loaned and the object of which was to establish the fact that the Government did not have exclusive control over the roads in that park, and particularly the Fall River Road.

The Fall River Road is the key to the administration of that great park. It is a road that should be improved for the fuller safety of the public at a cost of something like a half million dollars. The Congress was committed to that improvement.

When I learned of this litigation it seemed to me that before we spent a half million dollars on that road we should know whose road it was. If that suit should develop the fact to be as alleged the Park Service would be powerless to arrest a drunken driver over that perilous mountain road or to properly protect visitors in the park.

We took the matter up in our committee two years ago, and recommended a limitation in the appropriation bill that there should not be any expenditure on road construction until jurisdiction was ceded.

We received assurances from the Governor of Colorado that at the next session of the legislature he would endeavor to secure the cession. Last January an attempt was made in the legislature, and with relation to the Mesa Verde it was successful, but as to the Rocky Mountain Park it was a failure.

So the State refused in January of 1927, or during that session, to carry out the pledge which the Legislature of Colorado made in April, 1913.

Mr. WHITE of Colorado. Will the gentleman not correct his statement that the State refused to do this?

Mr. CRAMTON. I should not say the State, because I am very frank to say that I do not believe the legislature properly represented the sentiment of the State, but the legislature did refuse by its vote, expressly, to pass the bill that was offered to it. I shall explain, and I think when I am through the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. WHITE] will entirely understand the situation with reference to it. The bill was presented. It was alleged that it was being opposed on principle, that the Federal Government was encroaching too much on State authority.

Mr. WHITE of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I ask the gentleman to permit me to proceed until I complete my statement, and then I shall be very glad to yield. It was urged that the Federal Government was encroaching on State rights, and so on, but that there was no principle of that kind involved is demonstrated by the fact that they passed the act as to the other park in that State.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Colorado. The gentleman has stated that the bill questioned the right of the Federal Government. To what bill does the gentleman refer?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to engage in any argument about little matters.

Mr. WHITE of Colorado. I want to understand what the gentleman's position is.

Mr. CRAMTON. I can not yield further. I am trying to answer the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan declines to yield.

Mr. CRAMTON. The bill did not question it, and I have not so stated, but the people in Colorado in newspaper articles have stated that the Federal Government was seeking unduly to encroach. The legislature refused or failed, however the gentleman desires to have it stated, and since 1913 has not carried out the pledge of the State of Colorado, and the State of Colorado has not kept its pledge with the Federal Government, which was the foundation for the creation of this park.

Former Senator Thomas, of Colorado, who was then representing the State of Colorado in the United States Senate, has written a letter, which he has given me permission to use, in which he tells of the situation when the park was created, commends our attitude now in the matter and says:

With the enactment of the bill creating the park, all discussion of the expediency of waiving State jurisdiction was closed and the State was bound by every principle of honor and good faith to comply with its agreement.

The letter in full reads:

931 INVESTMENT BUILDING,
Washington, D. C., January 14, 1928.

Hon. LOUIS C. CRAMTON,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I had intended during your entertainment at the University Club last August, if given the opportunity, to express my opinion of the failure of the Colorado General Assembly ever since the passage of the act creating the Rocky Mountain National Park to comply with its conditions by ceding State jurisdiction to the Federal Government, and to commend your attitude concerning appropriations for the maintenance of the park by reason of such failure.

At the behest of the people of my State, and contrary to my own views upon the subject, I took an active part in securing the passage of the act referred to, and during its discussion in the Senate I assented to the condition relating to jurisdiction because the Colorado delegation was instructed to do so by the then governor of the State, by resolution of the general assembly, and by numerous petitions proceeding generally from that section of the State adjacent to or in the neighborhood of the proposed park boundaries. If I had then entertained the slightest notion that the people of my State, through its legislative department, would repudiate this obligation I should have opposed rather than supported the passage of the bill.

In my opinion, with the enactment of the bill creating the park, all discussion of the expediency of waiving State jurisdiction was closed and the State was bound by every principle of honor and good faith to comply with its agreement. In this particular, there is no distinction between the citizen and the Commonwealth. If the former repudiates his solemn obligations he is not only condemned by decent public opinion but may be compelled to do that which he has undertaken. Unfortunately States can not be similarly coerced. In my judgment, however, the Congress should withhold all appropriations for the maintenance of the Rocky Mountain National Park or for its benefit in any way until the general assembly shall recognize the binding obligation of the agreement which its congressional delegation made by its authority and command.

You may rest assured on the other hand that so long as the Congress ignores or acquiesces in the attitude of our last general assembly and continues to include the Rocky Mountain National Park in its annual appropriations, future general assemblies will justly assume that the Congress has approved its refusal to cede State jurisdiction and decline to give further consideration to the subject.

You can make any use of this letter which may seem desirable, inasmuch as my own good faith and sense of justice are involved in the common situation.

Very respectfully yours,

C. S. THOMAS.

The failure of the State of Colorado to keep faith and give the Federal Government the promised authority over the park area leaves the Congress with only one course to follow, and that is to withhold appropriations for the development and improvement of a road which certain people in Colorado insist does not belong to us, and to withhold appropriations for the general development of that park until the good people of Colorado—and there are many of them that feel as does Senator Thomas, who are filled with regret and chagrin by the failure of the legislature to pass the desired legislation—until the good people of Colorado are able to bring about legislation that is necessary to keep faith with the Federal Government. Until then the development of that national park should be held at its minimum. We must take care of those who go there, must look after sanitation, and so forth, but we can not proceed with any program of development. Therefore those who are in the vicinity of the Rocky Mountain National Park, who see a bill going through Congress now which begins a program of expenditure of $5,000,000 a year for roads in national parks, may sit there in Colorado and watch the procession go by until the time comes when the Legislature of Colorado keeps faith by enacting the legislation that they promised the Federal Government in 1913—15 years ago—they would enact. Rocky Mountain Park must mark time while others go forward.

Mr. WHITE of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I desire to assure the gentleman [Mr. CRAMTON] who has just taken his seat and to assure this House and the people of the United States of America that Colorado keeps faith. Under the law of Colorado, whenever a private citizen desires to institute a proceeding which can only be prosecuted in the name of the State the citizen has the right to call upon the proper official to institute such suit, and if the official refuses so to do the private citizen has the right in the name of the State to introduce and prosecute such proceeding. I say to the gentleman and to the Members of the House that Colorado proceeds in an orderly fashion, according to the laws of the land, and while we in Colorado, in common with the citizenship of every State of this Union, have individuals of varying opinions contending for various things, the State of Colorado endeavors to be and is usually right; and we resent the insinuation of the honorable gentleman that she has ever in her sovereign capacity failed to keep her pledge or to act in good faith.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. CRAMTON. I say frankly to the gentleman that I am satisfied that the sentiment of Colorado desires the pledge they made to the Federal Government in 1913 shall be redeemed. I am satisfied the failure of the legislature did not properly represent the sentiment of the State, but until that sentiment makes itself felt in effective legislation the pledge stands there unredeemed.

Mr. WHITE of Colorado. The fact that some bill may not have passed the legislature at a given session is in no sense conclusive evidence that the governmental agency will not perform its duty. On the contrary, it would have been very unwise for the Legislature of Colorado, while a suit was pending in the courts of Colorado to test the question, to have proceeded as the gentleman from Michigan claims she should have done.

Mr. CRAMTON. My understanding is that in response to the request of the governor the suit was withdrawn and is no longer pending. It may be revived at a later time. Does not the gentleman think that 15 years is nearly long enough for us to wait?

Mr. WHITE of Colorado. I am not aware that Colorado has waited that length of time. This question was raised only recently.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

ABANDONED MILITARY RESERVATIONS IN ALASKA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9031) to provide further for the disposal of abandoned military reservations in the Territory of Alaska, including Signal Corps stations and rights of way.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands [Mr. SINNOTT] if he would not be willing to have this bill passed over without prejudice?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the bill may go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the bill may go over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

WALTER REED GENERAL HOSPITAL

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9676) to authorize appropriations for construction at the Walter Reed General Hospital, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, not to exceed the sum of $310,000 for construction at the Walter Reed General Hospital, as follows: Three-story ward building, $185,000; converting the fourth story of the administration building into an operating suite, $55,000; constructing necessary connecting corridors, roads, walks, grading, etc., $70,000.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION OF NEW MEXICO

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 38) giving and granting consent to an amendment to the constitution of the State of New Mexico, providing a method for executing leases and other contracts for the development and production of any and all minerals on lands granted or confirmed to said State by the act of Congress approved June 20, 1910, and to the enactment of such laws and regulations as may be necessary to carry said amendment into effect if it is adopted.

The title of the resolution was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. LAGUARDDIA. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, it is most unusual that the consent of Congress is required to amend a State constitution, the enabling act. The gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. MORROW] explained that to me yesterday. Now, is the land involved in this matter State land?

Mr. MORROW. All the land involved is State land.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. So that it is something belonging entirely to the people of New Mexico, and is of State concern?

Mr. MORROW. Yes; and it will have to be voted on by the people. If any explanation is required, I shall be glad to make it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. What is the provision in the enabling act with reference to the consent of Congress?

Mr. MORROW. The enabling act required that the State should adopt in its constitutional convention section 9 of the enabling act, which section is as follows:

Said convention—

The constitutional convention—

shall provide by an ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State —— 9; that the State and its people consent to all and singular the provisions of this act concerning the lands granted or confirmed to the State, the terms and conditions upon which said grants and confirmations are made, and the means and manner of enforcing such terms and conditions or in every respect and particularly as in this act provided. All of which ordinances described in this section shall by proper reference be made a part of any constitution that shall be formed hereunder in such terms as shall positively preclude the making of any future constitutional amendment of any change or abrogation of the said ordinance, in whole or in part, without the consent of Congress.

I will add that such requirement was embodied in the State constitution.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Now, then, briefly, how does the proposed amendment change the provision in the enabling act with reference to the public lands and minerals?

Mr. MORROW. I will explain. The State of New Mexico, through the enabling act, received a grant of over 11,000,000 acres; nearly 9,000,000 acres were granted for the public schools and 2,350,000 acres to the institutions of the State and for the payment of certain counties' indebtedness; in the granting of the land, however, the minerals were specifically reserved to the United States. It was required in the enabling act that the State should advertise the land for a period of 10 weeks and sell or lease the land to the highest and best bidder. Several years later oil and gas were discovered in the State, and that discovery has brought into existence a feature that was not considered in the enabling act at all. The matter of leasing for oil and gas was taken into the courts, and the district court decided that the mineral which was then found in the State and upon State land did not require advertising, because the mineral was not contemplated in the land granted to the State, but that the mineral was reserved to the Government. An appeal was taken to the Supreme Court and the Supreme Court adopted the opinion of the district court. Under that decision leases were granted on these State lands to various people for a period of five years, with renewal clauses. Last year Congress passed an act granting to the State all the minerals contained in the lands heretofore granted. The parties holding leases claim that the Government never intended, until that act of 1927, that the mineral should pass to the State.

The courts, in so far as they could in New Mexico, have tried to uphold the rules adopted by the Land Office under the laws enacted by the State legislature by which these lands were leased for oil and gas without advertisement.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is it only a question of informalities?

Mr. MORROW. Yes. The question is this: Texas has oil land adjoining us and we have developed some oil in New Mexico. The State University has, I think, received up to the present time several thousand dollars from oil royalties. Under present conditions many leases are in the hands of people who refuse to develop on the ground that their leases may be invalidated by the Federal courts from the fact that the State did not follow the provisions of the enabling act, and in order that this may be clarified we are asking that the consent of Congress be given to the State that it may enact legislation which will validate the leases now existing; such legislation in the future will carry forward State development.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the proposed amendment to the constitution of the State of New Mexico in any way enlarge or modify the present rights in the minerals enjoyed by the State of New Mexico?

Mr. MORROW. It will absolutely not interfere with the minerals at all.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It does not affect any substantial rights?

Mr. MORROW. Absolutely not.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It relates only to the question of methods of procedure in the disposition of lands and rights by leases or otherwise?

Mr. MORROW. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman will permit, the official who has charge of this could lease the lands direct without the requirement of advertising?

Mr. MORROW. Oh, no. The State will enact legislation and it will attempt to correct that which has heretofore been done by act of the legislature. The amendment will be submitted to the voters of the State, and I will say that if the provisions are not proper they will be turned down because the people generally vote down amendments unless they believe them to be right.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. My principal concern is to know whether any new rights are granted to the State of New Mexico as against the Federal Government.

Mr. MORROW. Absolutely not, except to correct that which now exists.

Senate Joint Resolution 38 embodies the constitutional amendment adopted by the Legislature of New Mexico in its last session, for the purpose of clarifying the situation in the State pertaining to oil and gas leases.

The request for this legislation came from the State authorities, and it is to be hoped that in the passage of the same New Mexico will be relieved from some provisions of its enabling act, which tended to prohibit development of the mineral resources, as to oil and gas, within the State.

There was embodied in the request a letter from the Governor of New Mexico to the effect that without this legislation development of oil and gas on State lands had been retarded during the past years, because of the question as to the validity of certain leases.

A further statement from the governor is to the effect that should this legislation be enacted by Congress it will tend to clear up confusion concerning titles to leases held within the State. The governor states that he is confident the legislation will protect State lands in every way.

Congress having met the request of the governor and other State officials, it is up to the officials of the State to see that the enactment of legislation is such that the interest of the State will be fully protected. While the enabling act, in section 10, was very drastic in its terms, it is to be hoped that in meeting the situation as to minerals contained within State lands, that many of the provisions contained in the act of June 20, 1910—as to advertising, competitive bidding, proper appraisement, and the highest rentals and royalties—will be retained in the new legislation.

It is further expected that full notice shall be given to the voters of the State concerning the voting upon the amendment proposed, and that the intended legislation be brought to the attention of the voters by the State authorities in ample time, so that the electorate will be fully advised. Thus in selecting the members of the legislature, citizens will be elected who have the interest of conserving the funds, to be derived from such mineral resources for the support of the common schools and its State institutions, in conformity with the purposes for which the several grants were made to the State of New Mexico.

It has been the purpose of those who fostered this legislation in behalf of the State, as Members of Congress from New Mexico, to protect and advance the best interests of the people of the whole State by the passage of this resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That consent is hereby given and granted to the State of New Mexico and the qualified electors thereof to vote upon the question of amending the constitution of said State and to amend the same by the adoption of the following amendment proposed by the legislature of said State at its eighth regular session by H. J. Res. 8, approved March 11, 1927, to be designated as Article XXIV, said amendment being as follows, to wit:

"ARTICLE XXIV

"CONTRACTS FOR THE DEVELOPMENT AND PROTECTION OF MINERALS ON STATE LANDS

"Leases and other contracts, reserving a royalty to the State for the development and production of any and all minerals on lands granted or confirmed to the State of New Mexico by the act of Congress of June 20, 1910, entitled 'An act to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States,' may be made under such provisions relating to the necessity or requirement for or the mode and manner of appraisement, advertisement, and competitive bidding, and containing such terms and provisions, as may be provided by act of the legislature; the rentals, royalties, and other proceeds therefrom to be applied and conserved in accordance with the provisions of said act of Congress for the support or in aid of the common schools, or for the attainment of the respective purposes for which the several grants were made."

Consent also is given and granted to said State to enact such laws and establish such rules and regulations as it may deem necessary to carry such constitutional provision into full force and effect should the same be duly and legally adopted.

The resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

OIL AND GAS LEASES ON LANDS IN NAVAL PETROLEUM RESERVES

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 1959) to transfer to the Secretary of the Navy jurisdiction over oil and gas leases issued by the Secretary of the Interior on lands in naval petroleum reserves.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have this bill go over until next time so I may pray and meditate over it.

Mr. SINNOTT. Could not the gentleman let it go through to-day? It is a very simple matter and it only covers 3 leases out of 27 in petroleum reserve No. 2 in California, leases which were executed by Secretary Payne. When the original oil leasing act was passed it prohibited any leasing of lands in naval oil reserves except flowing wells.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Who owns these leases now?

Mr. SINNOTT. I do not know who are the owners.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to look into that.

Mr. SINNOTT. They are valid leases and they are in existence to-day. This legislation has been requested by both Secretaries, and the bill was reported to the Senate by Senator WALSH of Montana, and I have personally talked with Judge Finney about the matter.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I talked with him yesterday, but could not get anything very definite. Before we smear ourselves with oil here or do anything rash let the bill go over for the present.

Mr. SINNOTT. I do not think there is any danger of that because there are 24 of the leases already in existence.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. How long have these leases been under the Department of the Interior?

Mr. SINNOTT. Since the passage of the oil leasing act.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. So two weeks longer would not hurt very much?

Mr. SINNOTT. That act was passed in 1920.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman wants to pray and meditate for two weeks?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I certainly do.

Mr. SINNOTT. We will furnish the gentleman with a prayer rug.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FORT M'HENRY, MD.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 204) to authorize an additional appropriation for Fort McHenry, Md.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $81,678 is authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for further carrying out the provisions of the act entitled "An act to repeal and reenact chapter 100, 1914 (Public, No. 108), to provide for the restoration of Fort McHenry, in the State of Maryland, and its permanent preservation as a national park and perpetual national memorial shrine as the birthplace of the immortal Star-Spangled Banner, written by Francis Scott Key, for the appropriation of the necessary funds, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1925 (43 Stat. L. 1109).

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LINTHICUM: After the word "act," in line 5, on page 1, insert: "approved March 3, 1925, chapter 425 (Public, No. 543)."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PAY OF THE ARMY

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7753) to authorize the disbursement of and accounting for the appropriation, "Pay, etc., of the Army," as one fund, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON, Mr. LAGUARDIA, and Mr. MURPHY objected.

DISPOSITION OF REMAINS OF MILITARY PERSONNEL AND CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES OF THE ARMY

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 248) to authorize appropriations to be made for the disposition of remains of military personnel and civilian employees of the Army.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated from time to time such sums as may be necessary for expenses of interment, cremation (only upon request from relatives of the deceased), or of preparation and transportation to their homes or to such national cemeteries as may be designated by proper authority, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, of the remains of officers on the active list and retired officers who die while on active duty, cadets, United States Military Academy, acting assistant surgeons, members of the Army Nurse Corps, and enlisted men in active service and retired enlisted men who die while on active duty, and accepted applicants for enlistment; for interment or preparation and transportation to their homes of the remains of civilian employees of the Army in the employ of the War Department who die abroad, in Alaska, in the Canal Zone, or on Army transports, or who die while on duty in the field; for interment of military prisoners who die at military posts; for the interment and shipment to their homes of remains of enlisted men who are discharged in hospitals in the United States and continue as inmates of said hospitals to the date of their death; for interment of prisoners of war and interned alien enemies who die at prison camps in the United States; for recovery of bodies of the above-mentioned military personnel; for removal of remains from abandoned posts to permanent military posts or national cemeteries, including the remains of Federal soldiers, sailors, or marines interred in fields, abandoned graves, or abandoned private and city cemeteries; and for expenses of the segregation of bodies in permanent American cemeteries in Great Britain and France: Provided, That in any case where the expenses of burial or shipment of the remains of officers or enlisted men of the Army who die on the active list, or retired officers or enlisted men who die while on active duty, or of any of the military or civil personnel mentioned above, are borne by individuals, where such expenses would have been lawful claims against the Government, reimbursement to such individuals may be made of the amount allowed by the Government for such services, but no reimbursement shall be made of such expenses incurred prior to July 1, 1910.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. This concludes consideration of bills on the Consent Calendar.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LARSEN, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

SENATE ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 1798. An act concerning actions on account of death or personal injury within places under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States; and

S. 1801. An act in reference to writs of error.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED

Bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rules, referred to the appropriate committees, as follows:

S. 620 An act for the relief of Russell & Tucker and certain other citizens of the States of Texas, Oklahoma, and Kansas; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 1761. An act granting the consent of Congress to the city of Duluth, Minn., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Duluth Ship Canal; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SPEECH OF HON. ANDREW W. MELLON

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech made at Charlotte, N. C., by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Andrew W. Mellon, on Thursday, January 19, 1928.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, on last Thursday, January 19, 1928, at Charlotte, N. C., a dinner was given by the Charlotte Chamber of Commerce celebrating the establishment of the Charlotte branch of the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond. Among the guests who were present were the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Andrew W. Mellon; the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, Mr. Young; the Comptroller of the Currency, Colonel McIntosh; the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mr. Blair; and our colleague, Mr. STEVENSON, of South Carolina. Some five or six hundred bankers, as well as many business men of the Carolinas, were also present. The establishment of the Charlotte branch means much to that progressive section of this country known as the Piedmont section of the Carolinas.

Mr. Mellon spoke as follows:

THE FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM

I have long wanted to visit this part of the South, where so many of your traditions are the same as my own. Here in this Piedmont section of the Carolinas you have many close ties with my native State of Pennsylvania. Your part of the country was settled, as mine was, largely by Scotch-Irish, and also by Germans and Quakers. They came in great numbers during the eighteenth century, landing in Philadelphia and then spreading westward to settle the country around Pittsburgh. Many of these same men pushed on through the valleys of the Appalachian Mountains to Virginia, North and South Carolina, bringing with them such names as Graham, Alexander, and Polk, which were later to become so famous in your history.

They brought also their sturdy qualities of independence, love of civil and religious liberty, and a sense of thrift and order that enabled them to build up a civilization out of a wilderness. Wherever they went they set up their educational and religious institutions. Mecklenburg County soon became a center of Scotch-Irish civilization, so that it was not strange that the liberty-loving men of this and the surrounding counties should resist the oppressive and ill-advised measures of the British Government and in the Mecklenburg Declaration of 1775 should be the first to give formal utterance to American independence.

Nearly a century later, when the War between the States, which was so gloriously fought by both sides, had come to an end, and the South was faced not only by a loss of man power but by a disruption of her social and economic life as complete as anything caused in Europe by the last war, the descendants of these same pioneers set to work at once to rebuild their shattered fortunes. They showed the same indomitable courage as in the early days, and on the foundation of the old agricultural order they built up a new agricultural and industrial South, whose rapid increase in wealth has been one of the outstanding achievements in this country in recent years.

The South is fortunate in that the period of her industrial expansion coincided with advances in the field of electricity, which made possible the development of the vast sources of water power in this part of the country. The production of cheap electrical current has not only proved a great stimulus to industrial expansion but has also brought about a greater diversification of industry, so that to-day, in addition to being the center of the textile industry, the South is forging rapidly ahead in the production of knitted goods, silk, furniture, tobacco, and many other commodities.

In no other part of the country has this industrial advance been more marked than in the two Carolinas. These States in the past have been predominantly agricultural and have usually been associated in the public mind with the production of cotton and tobacco. But in recent years the value of the manufactures of these two States combined has exceeded even the value of their agricultural output; and, as a result, there has come about an increase in wealth, which has necessitated a rapid expansion of their banking resources.

It is in recognition of this fact that a branch of the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond has been established in Charlotte. Under the wise guidance of Governor Seay and his able board of directors, the Richmond bank has had a most gratifying growth, and has shown at all times a sympathetic understanding of the needs of this section. The establishment of a branch bank at Charlotte should still further increase the usefulness of the Federal reserve system by effecting a valuable saving of time in bank clearings and currency shipments. At the same time it should make for greater efficiency in operation, because the men in charge of the bank will be nearer to the territory which it serves, and can have, therefore, a more accurate knowledge of local conditions. Furthermore, where a branch bank is actually needed, as in this case, its establishment is in line with the principle of local self-government in banking, while at the same time bringing to you the vast resources of the Federal reserve system.

That system has made it possible, for the first time in our history, to mobilize the banking resources of the country and to place them at the service of any section that has need of them. For the first time business can go forward, freed from the fear that at any moment, from causes remote or unforeseen, a financial crisis might develop and threaten everyone with ruin.

The old system, under which we operated prior to the passage of the Federal reserve act, was notable for its scattered and immobile banking reserves and a credit inelasticity which rendered it totally inadequate for the country's need. It was unequal even to meeting the seasonal demands during the crop-moving period, and in times of financial stringency it operated to aggravate rather than to relieve panic symptoms.

National banks could issue currency only when secured by Government bonds; consequently they were unable to increase the currency in times when it was most needed. Banks outside of the great financial centers could expand their credit facilities only by borrowing from the larger metropolitan banks, with the result that all loans in the end converged on New York. Instead of a coordinated system of banks, with a common reservoir of credit, we had a large number of independent banking units, which in times of stress struggled against each other and never worked together as part of one great financial structure.

These defects were cured by the establishment of the Federal reserve system. The 12 regional banks, under the responsible coordinating influence of the Federal Reserve Board, can effect that prompt mobilization of reserves which is so essential in preventing panics. These banks are also able to provide the country with an elastic currency, which expands or contracts with seasonal and trade needs. It is possible to supply the farmers and the trade with adequate currency during the crop-moving period and to effect the necessary contraction when the seasonal requirements have been met. The reserves of each regional bank are available, through the discounting privilege, to all other Federal reserve banks. The funds of the central reservoir can be diverted to any bank in the system which has need of them, so that the financing of an increasing or decreasing volume of business can be accomplished with ease.

The Federal reserve system was put into operation just prior to the outbreak of the World War and was obliged to establish itself in public confidence during a period of unprecedented strain in the financial world. The channels of world trade had been suddenly and violently disorganized. The outbreak of war stopped the flow abroad of many exports and this country was flooded with a surplus of cotton and other commodities, which to a great extent proved unmarketable until the new trade currents had established themselves. Then cotton and food and manufactures which were needed for war purposes began to flow abroad in even greater quantities than before. Agriculture and industry expanded rapidly, necessitating an enormous increase in credits, which fortunately the banks of the Federal reserve system and the other banks of the country were able to supply.

When this country entered the war in 1917 the strain upon the banking structure became even greater. It was necessary to support our military establishment and at the same time to make advances to the nations associated with us in carrying on the war. Our national debt increased from $1,281,000,000 on April 5, 1917, to $25,484,000,000 on June 30, 1919. In the floating of the Liberty loans the Federal reserve banks acted as the fiscal agents of the Government and their assistance in this and many other ways proved invaluable.

When the war was over and the Nation was obliged to adjust itself to new conditions, it was the steadying influence of the Federal reserve system that brought the country safely through the necessary period of postwar readjustment with a minimum derangement and prevented the financial crisis from degenerating into a panic. As a result there was no serious impairment in our financial structure at a time when such a calamity would have had most disastrous consequences throughout the entire world.

The service which the Federal reserve system rendered to the country during this period can not be overestimated. And yet, the system, as you know, has been violently attacked because it failed to do the impossible to avert the losses suffered in getting the overexpanded agencies of production, both agricultural and industrial, back on a normal, peace-time basis.

As bankers you know how groundless is the charge that the Federal reserve banks contracted agricultural credits. As a matter of fact, far from contracting agricultural credits during the period of falling prices, the Federal reserve banks expanded bank credits and increased the volume of circulating notes in the agricultural States.

The Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond, for instance, during the calendar year 1920 increased its rediscounts by more than $10,000,000 and expanded its note issue by nearly the same amount. A similar expansion of credits was made by the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta and the other banks in the great agricultural areas.

These facts speak for themselves and justify the assertion that without the assistance rendered by the Federal reserve banks it would have been difficult, if not impossible, for the country to have come safely through the period of deflation or for our financial structure to have weathered the enormous strain to which it was subjected at that time.

What the Federal reserve system has been able to do for this country it is now doing to a lesser degree for the world at large. It is to-day one of the important factors in the effort which is being made to achieve world stabilization.

When Great Britain made the momentous decision to reestablish the pound upon a gold basis at its former value it meant that the old standard for financial transactions was to continue and that America was not to be left holding the world's supply of a metal for which the other nations might be seeking a substitute. Great credit is due to the Federal reserve banks for the part which they played in bringing about this result. These banks extended large credits to the Bank of England, and the British treasury arranged for additional credits with private American bankers. Great Britain has been on a gold basis now for more than two years and has not used a single dollar of these credits; nevertheless, without the support furnished by the Federal reserves banks I do not believe that stabilization would have taken place at the time when it actually occurred.

The movement back to gold has continued steadily, and other nations, including Belgium and more recently Italy, have been added to the list of countries maintaining the gold standard. In the plans for the stabilization of the rest of Europe, the participation of the Federal reserve system is equally necessary; and in all this the interests of the American farmer and manufacturer are vitally concerned.

The nations of the world must be reestablished on a sound financial basis if our surplus products are to find an export market. Only in this way can business compute in advance the price which it must pay for raw materials and figure more accurately on the price which can be secured for the finished products. If this can be done, business can operate on a larger scale and increase its foreign purchases, which means a greater demand for our own surplus products and an expansion in business here and in other countries as well.

It is indeed fortunate in this disturbed period in monetary affairs, when so large responsibility for world stability has been placed upon this country, that we have in the Federal reserve system an agency capable not only of exercising an important influence toward stability in our own money markets but also of aiding in financial reconstruction abroad.

The work which the Federal reserve system is doing is along sound, constructive lines. But the greatest mistake would be to expect the impossible. It is not a panacea for all the financial and economic ills which may befall the country. Neither the Federal reserve system nor any other system can control prices. The most that system can do is to influence to a limited extent, from time to time, the total volume of credit and its cost. While credit is one factor in influencing prices, it is neither the only factor nor the controlling one; and it would be asking the Federal reserve system to perform the impossible if it is to be charged with the responsibility for controlling prices merely because it can exercise a limited control over the amount of credit available.

The Federal reserve system has been in operation now for 13 years. During this time it has so established itself in the confidence of the country that Congress last year extended the charters of the Federal reserve banks for an indeterminate period. This act was one of the most important pieces of legislation that has passed Congress since the war, for it insured the continuance of the Federal reserve system as an integral part of our banking structure.

It is left for us to make certain that the system shall not be endangered by loading it down with extraneous or impossible tasks. It has already justified its existence and it will be indispensable in any future financial crisis which may arise. But if the system is to do this it must never be impaired by changes which interfere with the 12 regional banks in the exercise of their primary function as reserve institutions in providing credit and currency for the country.

I know that you can be counted on always to give the Federal reserve system your strong and unqualified support. It is a matter on which we can all agree, regardless of politics, for the Federal reserve system was established under a Democratic President and its continued existence has been assured under a Republican President. In matters of such general concern as banking—and may I add taxation also—it seems to me that partisan politics should not enter. These are fundamental questions which vitally affect the welfare of the whole country, and when that welfare is involved we should think not of class or sectional or partisan advantage but of what is economically sound and for the best interest of the country.

PRIVATE CALENDAR

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Private Calendar be called, beginning at the star, bills before that having been once objected to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the Private Calendar, beginning at the star.

Mr. BLANTON. And the gentleman from Connecticut will not keep us here later than 4.30?

Mr. TILSON. Inasmuch as we are not to work to-morrow or the next day, I think that we should work until 5 o'clock this afternoon. There are a number of bills on the Private Calendar in which individual Members are very much interested and seeing that the gentleman gets two holidays, I think we might continue until 5 o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. BLANTON. We are further ahead than we have ever been at this time during any other session of Congress.

Mr. TILSON. I appreciate that, but the individual Members have bills here that they are as much interested in as if they were of larger importance, so I think the gentleman ought to be content to let us work until 5 o'clock in view of the fact that we are going to give him two holidays together.

Mr. BLANTON. It will not be a holiday for me.

Mr. TILSON. It will at least give us a chance to catch up with our work.

Mr. Speaker, certain bills on the Private Calendar have heretofore been objected to, and it seems to me that it would not be quite fair to take such bills up on a day that is not regular Private Calendar day. I therefore ask that we take up the bills, beginning with the first one that has not been objected to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will begin at the star.

WILLIAM G. BEATY

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8983) for the relief of William G. Beaty, deceased.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers and dependents, William G. Beaty, who was a member of Company C, First Battalion, Mississippi Mounted Rifles (subsequently Company I, Second Mississippi Volunteer Cavalry), shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a private of that organization on the 20th day of May, 1864: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MILTON LONGSDORF

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8988) for the relief of Milton Longsdorf.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SNELL). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers and dependents, Milton C. Longsdorf, who was a private of Company I, Eighteenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on September 19, 1865: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WILLIAM H. MURPHY

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8989) correcting the military record of William H. Murphy.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

CHARLES B. HOLMES

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6916) to correct the military record of Charles B. Holmes.
The Clerk read the title of the bill.
The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SNELL). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?
Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Is the author of the bill present? I should like to know the reasons why this man, after 65 years, finds it necessary to have his military record corrected. And why was it not done years ago?
Mr. CHINDBLOM. Perhaps it is to get a pension.
Mr. TILLMAN. I understand that, but why should he have one?
Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.
Mr. HOOPER. I have had the same question in mind during the few weeks that I have been working on this calendar. I think the gentleman's question is very pertinent. It seems to be the policy here to allow this clearing of military records in this way. I shall take advantage of the gentleman's yielding to me to say that it seems to me, as a comparatively new Member of the House, that it would be a good deal better if we could have bills correcting the clouds on soldiers' records brought in in some omnibus form, instead of taking up the time of the House week after week on the Private Calendar with bills of this character. While I have not been objecting to them, and I am not going to object to them, I do not think it is fair to other soldiers who have not had the opportunity of having some Member of the House bring in a bill to correct their record, when the bills nearly always show on their face that the record is really not clear. It is an injustice to the thousands of soldiers who served without any blot on their records.
Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Arkansas permit an interruption?
Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.
Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. I realize the truth of what has just been said by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOPER], and yet I have a bill, not on this calendar, that I presented where I know the contrary to be true. A soldier of the Spanish War, John G. De Camp, of Hamilton, Ohio, was discharged, according to the record of the War Department, after 89 days of service. He can not get any pension under the law. The fact is, that he was not so discharged. They intended to have him discharged, and in order to have everything shipshape and ready, they signed a lot of discharges up in advance, and the date of his discharge was long after it shows on the record. He was in a hospital and was sent to another city to be discharged, but the discharge had been made out ahead, and it was wrongly dated. The War Department takes the position that it does not make any difference how wrong it is, no matter how wrong its records may be, it will not correct anything.
Mr. TILLMAN. The gentleman has quite a meritorious case in the one which he has cited. My inquiry here is directed to the fact that I have seen bill after bill pass here without anyone making any inquiry about them, and I know that they do not know anything about the facts, as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOPER] inferred, and so, for the protection of the Treasury and for the enlightenment of those who do not want to make captious objection, there ought to be something of the kind suggested by the gentleman from Michigan.
Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.
Mr. BLANTON. I suggest to my friend from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN] that his objection applies equally well to all similar bills that we have passed this afternoon.
Mr. TILLMAN. This is my reservation of objection.
Mr. BLANTON. The first one on this Private Calendar was one introduced by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER], and if you will look at the report you will find that he did not file a single affidavit in support of it. He said that he had no affidavits, and he merely made a statement on pure hearsay about what happened during the Civil War, and upon his hearsay statement the committee favorably reported that bill. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOPER] says that he is a new man. He was here all last Congress. I hope that he will get busy and help us object to these bills.
Mr. HOOPER. I did not say that I had not seen these bills passed before, but I am a comparatively new man, and I do not like to venture to make objections.
Mr. BLANTON. How long does the gentleman expect to be here before he becomes other than a new man in Congress?
Mr. HOOPER. The gentleman himself has not become an old man here yet, as far as he is concerned.
Mr. BLANTON. No; but things are getting pretty old here in respect to some of these bills.
Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, this matter of correcting a military record after 65 years in order to get on the pension rolls is a matter that should be more carefully considered. This man should have had his military record corrected years ago. I have no prejudice against the Union soldier. I think as gallant and as great soldiers as ever breasted the red tide of battle fought on both sides during the War between the States. I have great respect for the soldier of the North as well as for the soldier of the South. My father was a Confederate soldier. I wanted to get some idea of why it is that these military records are sought to be corrected after such a long time. Congress has in special bills abused the pension privilege in the past.

I recall when I came to Congress 12 years ago, there were two Democrats from two Republican districts here. Both asked to be placed upon the Committee on Invalid Pensions. It costs this Government millions of dollars to keep those two men in Congress, because they got pensions for everybody in their districts, and raised pensions for everybody. They made a specialty of that. They did not appear to care for the big questions before the Congress, but they contented themselves with introducing long strings of pension bills every year, and they got them through because they were members of the Committee on Pensions, just as we have been passing bills here this afternoon. So I have seen the matter abused. The splendid men who fought gallantly and well for the North are entitled to all that is coming to them. God bless them! I respect them; but it seems to me a little late for some man who perhaps never smelled powder, who perhaps would have jumped into the Potomac and swam across it if he had seen a Confederate soldier with a gun in his hands, to come in now at this date and have his military record corrected in order to be put on the pension roll. They should be required to make out a case, strong as Holy Writ, before having Congress to vote an honorable discharge for them so they can be pensioned.

And so, as a modest Member of the House who is not given to objecting to bills of any character, I simply wanted a little enlightenment in a general way upon this particular bill.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I would like to use the Yankee's prerogative of asking the gentleman why the Naval Committee has an absolutely different attitude with reference to clearing up records of their service; why it is that the men who served in the Navy or the Marine Corps can not get certain records cleared, whereas anybody can get his record cleared who served in the military service?

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not a member of the Naval Committee and have not made a study of that, and I did not know that that discrimination was practiced. But that is not pertinent to my inquiry.

Mr. REECE. There is one principle that usually guides the Committee on Military Affairs in the consideration of these bills.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, there is, I am sure, to be some meat in the gentleman's statement, and I will listen to it. I expect some real information from him. That is what I am in the best of faith seeking.

Mr. REECE. The committee is inclined to favor a case if a man served for a considerable length of time, a period of one or two or three years, and saw active service, saw service in battle, and then became ill, and it is established to the satisfaction of the committee that he did not come in; that he was in a hospital, perhaps, or he may have been furloughed home, or through a group of circumstances which he now seeks to explain he was not permitted to rejoin his outfit; in a number of those cases it may be that the organization he was attached to had been discharged, and in a great many cases after the war was over the organization was disbanded.

At the close of the war I can easily imagine that there was a great furore prevailing, and the people were anxious to get back home, and there was turmoil, so to speak. The war had gone on until everybody was worn out.

That was the principle upon which the committee has been acting in the consideration of these cases.

Mr. HOOPER. As to the evidence in these cases, a great deal of it is on ex parte statements, and it is hard to know for sure that you are doing justice to the soldiers who did not desert when you are asked to correct the records of those who are marked as deserters. There is no question about those who did not desert. I would not say anything about those old men except to say that perhaps it is not quite fair.

Mr. REECE. Let me make reference to that point which the gentleman has raised. Most of these people lived out in the rural sections. They were not familiar with the departmental routine, and they went on for a period of years without giving consideration to these questions at all. Then, after they became older, this came to their attention.

It is not the easiest thing in these cases to get information, but in most cases their affidavits are properly attested. Now and then other circumstances will warrant the reporting of a bill favorably, but most of them are supported by affidavits.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why is it that in this particular case, where 65 or 70 years have elapsed, no attempt is made to satisfy this committee that his record ought to be corrected?

Mr. REECE. Another consideration should be taken into account where a man has lived for 40 years with the respect of his neighbors and has lived a useful and righteous and virtuous life, so as to command the respect of his neighbors and those who have come in contact with him. It is a question how long we ought to continue to deprive him of the credit which comes from a service well performed and performed for a period of years.

Mr. TILLMAN. The gentleman has made a good general argument and defense. But I am still wondering whether anybody knows about the facts in this particular case.

I think we abuse the pension privilege; I do not know. I know that something like $6,000,000,000 have been paid out in pensions by this Government, and men tell me there will be $100,000,000,000 all together paid out in the next 20 years. I know a strong fellow who is now drawing $20 a month for service in the Spanish-American War. Since he got that pension of $20 a month he has quit work entirely and most of his time has been devoted to loafing and praying that his pension may be increased. He is strong. There is not a Jersey bull in his county that he could not hog-tie and pitch into a covered wagon.

So many clamor for an increase, and then when they have got that increase they never stop trying for a further increase.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. TILLMAN. Centainly.

Mr. JAMES. Did not the gentleman from Arkansas introduce a bill to pension all Confederate veterans?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; and it ought to pass. That is to say, the cotton tax, which was illegally collected from the southern people after the war, was unconstitutionally collected, and should be paid back to the southern people. I do not know of a more worthy thing to do than that. This illegally collected cotton tax, coming from the South, should be divided among the old Confederate soldiers. But that bill you are afraid to pass, and will not pass, fair though it is. You get your pension bills through; mine you refuse to consider. That is an important difference.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is called for. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

JOEL T. SMITH

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4127) for the relief of Joel T. Smith.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to state that I shall not object because I have never been an objector. I have taken up more time to-day on these matters than I usually do. I am having a little fun. I have been here 12 long years. I have voted for every private bill, every pension bill, and almost everything for my colleagues upon both sides of the Chamber, and during all of these years I have never had a claim bill reported from the Committee on Claims. I have before the Committee on Claims now a very meritorious measure. A friend of mine by the name of Stafford, who lives in Springdale, Ark., was the postmaster of that town for some time and somebody stole $400 or $500 from him. He had no safe place in which to keep the money and the Government had not provided him with a safe. He promptly reimbursed the Government. I introduced a special bill for his relief and the committee sent it to the Post Office Department last year. The Post Office Department said, "We do not care anything about it and are not going to make a recommendation either way." I have not been able to get that bill reported. And there are others, many of them.

I have another meritorious bill before the Claims Committee. The widow of a Union soldier became sick, and I introduced a bill granting some relief to the woman who nursed her for months. This woman was no relation whatever to the pensioner, but nursed her and cared for her during a long sickness and expended a large amount of money in her behalf. The Pension Bureau, after investigating the matter for a long while, said, "We do not owe you anything; we can not pay you anything, and your remedy is a special bill." So I introduced the bill. I filed affidavit after affidavit to show the justice of the claim, but I have never heard anything about it. I would like now and then, just for a change, to get a little recognition from somebody on one of my special bills. I have the highest opinion and regard—and he knows it—for my friend who began in Virginia but now lives in Massachusetts, Chairman UNDERHILL. He is the chairman of the committee, and I know he would like to favor me personally if he could. I want to call his attention to these two meritorious bills and ask him if he can not, out of the bigness of his Virginia heart, at some time give me a favorable report on them.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I suggest that the gentleman come to see me next Saturday morning, when I will talk with him.

Mr. TILLMAN. Talk, CHARLEY, is not what I want. I want my bills of real merit reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the account of Joel T. Smith, late postmaster at Chester, Mont., in the sum of $505, due the United States on account of the loss resulting from the closing of the First National Bank, of Chester, Mont.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FIDELITY & DEPOSIT CO. OF MARYLAND

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5925) for the relief of the Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to redeem the following-described United States certificates of indebtedness, without interest, in favor of the Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland, without presentation of the said certificates, which have been lost, stolen, or destroyed: Provided, That the said certificates of indebtedness shall not have been previously presented for payment: Provided further, That the said Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland shall first file in the Treasury Department a bond in the penal sum of double the amount of the principal of said certificates of indebtedness in such form and with such sureties as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any loss on account of the lost, stolen, or destroyed certificates of indebtedness hereafter described: United States certificate of indebtedness No. 9415, for $500, dated December 15, 1921, matured December 15, 1922, interest 4½ per cent per annum; United States certificate of indebtedness No. 9416, for $500, dated December 15, 1921, matured December 15, 1922, interest 4½ per cent per annum; United States certificate of indebtedness No. 18067, for $1,000, dated December 15, 1921, matured December 15, 1922, interest 4½ per cent per annum; United States certificate of indebtedness No. 18068, for $1,000, dated December 15, 1921, matured December 15, 1922, interest 4½ per cent per annum; United States certificate of indebtedness No. 18069, for $1,000, dated December 15, 1921, matured December 15, 1922, interest 4½ per cent per annum; United States certificate of indebtedness No. 11048, for $500, dated June 15, 1922, matured June 15, 1923, interest 3¾ per cent per annum; and United States certificate of indebtedness No. 11049, for $500, dated June 15, 1922, matured June 15, 1923, interest 3¾ per cent per annum.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to redeem, without interest, in favor of the Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland, 4½ per cent United States Treasury certificates of indebtedness Nos. 9415 and 9416, in the denomination of $500 each, and Nos. 18067, 18068, and 18069, in the denomination of $1,000 each, series TD–1922, issued December 15, 1921, matured December 15, 1922; also to redeem without interest 3¾ per cent United States Treasury certificates of indebtedness, Nos. 1048 and 1049, in the denomination of $500 each, series TJ–1923, issued June 15, 1922, matured June 15, 1923; the said certificates having been lost, stolen, or destroyed: Provided, That the said certificates of indebtedness shall not have been previously presented and paid: And provided further, That the said Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland shall first file in the Treasury Department a bond in the penal sum of double the amount of the principal of said certificates of indebtedness in such form and with such sureties as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any loss on account of the lost, stolen, or destroyed certificates of indebtedness herein described."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CHARLES R. WAREHAM

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8808) for the relief of Charles R. Wareham.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. This bill is to allow this postmaster $17,204.83. The report states the following:

The money chest setting on top of the safe indicated that an attempt had been made to open the outside door by hammering the safe around the combination, but the door was standing open and the combination and lock were in perfect condition.

That indicates clearly and unmistakably that that door was left unlocked and the combination not put on. In my judgment there was such negligence there that the Government should not be mulcted of $17,000.

Mr. UNDERHILL. If the gentleman will read the beginning of the report he will see this has the favorable recommendation of the department.

Mr. BLANTON. I know; and I want to say that the Post Office Department recently has made a favorable report in many cases where in years past there have been unfavorable recommendations.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I was going to refer the gentleman to reports made in the past, that where negligence has been shown the Post Office Department has been very loath indeed to give its recommendation to the passage of a relief bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I am afraid the present Postmaster General, who is an awfully fine fellow personally, is very prone to forgive his brother Republican postmasters when they are a little negligent. He is pretty generous with them, and he is not holding them down like the department used to hold them down.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the gentleman who reports this bill is perhaps a little without the pale of the Republican Party. We never ask whether they are Democrats or Republicans.

Mr. BLANTON. I know that, and if I had not noticed that clause in the report I would have let the matter go by. But that clearly and unmistakably shows the combination was not on. If they had put the combination on maybe the thieves would have been able to break it in or maybe not.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Most of the merchants to-day put a sign on a safe to the effect that "This safe is unlocked; please do not damage."

Mr. BLANTON. But the United States Post Office Department demands that the postmasters lock their safes and put the combinations on, and that is a matter of business precaution they ought to take. For the present I object.

LUC MATHIAS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8886) for the relief of Luc Mathias.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500 as full compensation to Luc Mathias, of Port au Prince, in the Republic of Haiti, on account of injuries and consequent expenses and loss of time suffered by him as the result of being struck by a United States Marine Corps automobile in the city of Port au Prince, Republic of Haiti, on June 25, 1926.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 1, strike out lines 3, 4, and 5, down to and including the word "to," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and in full settlement against the Government, the sum of $500 to compensate."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

VICTORINA MESA

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8887) for the relief of Victorina Mesa, of Cavite, P. I.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an appropriation in the sum of $500 be, and the same is hereby, authorized to compensate Victorina Mesa, of Cavite, P. I., for the death of her husband, Lucio Lupisan, pilot of the Banca Romero, as a result of collisions of the U. S. S. Rizal and Hart with said Banca Romero in Manila Bay on April 8, 1921.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out on page 1, line 3, and down to the word "authorized," in line 4, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and in full settlement against the Government, the sum of $500."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

J. L. SINK

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8216) to confer authority on the United States District Court for the Western District of Virginia to permit J. L. Sink, a bankrupt, to file his application for discharge, and to authorize and empower the judge of said court to hear and determine the same.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I want to ask the gentleman from Virginia why this interference with due process of court and the due order of court?

Mr. MONTAGUE. As the report states, Mr. Speaker, the bankrupt who is making this application is a farmer. He made a complete disclosure of all his property. He, of course, intrusted his case to an attorney, and the attorney, very unfortunately, was taken very ill and was ill for a long time. The bankrupt was surprised in the course of time to find that no application had been made within the period prescribed by law to secure his discharge. So this is simply to modify the statute of limitations and give the court the same power it theretofore had, and it may exercise that power within six months from the date of the approval of the act.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the distinguished gentleman from Virginia that the report of the Department of Justice shows that for the last fiscal year there were 47,758 bankruptcies, totaling $885,557,006. They were $80,000,000 more than the preceding fiscal year, and they were $500,000,000 more than they were 10 years ago. This $85,000,000 of loss annually, as the gentleman from Virginia knows, is passed on to the consumers every year in the cost of their products which the jobbers and wholesalers put on in advance in order to meet this loss. We are constantly enlarging this bankruptcy proceeding, and we ought to stop it.

I do not feel like objecting to this poor farmer getting this relief, but I want to say it is a matter we should give some study.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I agree with the gentleman that the general subject may require much study.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States District Court for the Western District of Virginia is hereby authorized and empowered to permit J. L. Sink, a bankrupt, to file an application for a discharge in bankruptcy in said court at any time within six months from the approval of this act: Provided, That it shall be made to appear to the judge of said court that said bankrupt was unavoidably prevented from filing an application within the time limit fixed by the general laws on bankruptcy: Provided further, That said application shall be heard and determined according to said bankruptcy laws.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JAMES P. WILLIAMS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4920) authorizing the Secretary of War to award a Nicaraguan campaign badge to Capt. James P. Williams in recognition of his services to the United States in the Nicaraguan campaign of 1912 and 1913.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, is this going to be a precedent for awarding campaign badges to our several thousand marines now over there in this new campaign? If it is, it is a bad precedent. I shall not, however, object to this bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to award a Nicaraguan campaign badge to Capt. James P. Williams, now a captain in the United States Army, Headquarters and Headquarters Troop, One hundred and fifty-sixth Cavalry Brigade, United States Army, reserve, for services rendered the United States Government in the Nicaraguan campaign of 1912 and 1913: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued by virtue of the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JOHN R. BUTLER

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8987) for the relief of John R. Butler.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, John R. Butler, who was a member of Company I, Seventh Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Cavalry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a private of that organization on the 20th day of December, 1863: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ARTHUR L. HECYKELL

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3721) for the relief of Arthur L. Hecykell.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Reserving the right to object, I see that the beneficiary of this bill was a machinist in the United States Navy and was retired as a machinist. The purpose of the bill will be to require the Secretary of the Navy to appoint him to the position of lieutenant in the Navy and then retire him at that grade. The Secretary of the Navy has reported adversely on the bill in the following language:

In view of the foregoing and for the further reasons that the proposed legislation is individual in character and is not for the general good of the naval service, the Navy Department recommends against the enactment of the bill H. R. 3721.

It appears that there were several other men formerly in the service retired that would have as much right to demand this benefit as this petitioner. If the Congress grants it to one it ought to grant it to all in the same situation. For that reason I object.

RUSSELL H. LINDSAY

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4302) for the relief of Russell H. Lindsay.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, the report of the Secretary of the Navy shows that he submitted this bill to the Bureau of the Budget, and General Lord reported to him unfavorably. The Secretary says:

For the reason above set forth and for the further fact that this proposed legislation is individual in character and is not for the general good of the naval service, the Navy Department recommends that the bill H. R. 4302 be not enacted.

For that reason I object.

CHARLES ROBERT O'LEARY

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4767) for the relief of Paymaster Charles Robert O'Leary, United States Navy.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I call attention to the report of the Secretary of the Navy Curtis D. Wilbur, which says:

In view of the foregoing, and for the further reasons that the proposed legislation is not for the general good of the naval service, and would encourage others to seek similar legislation, the Navy Department recommends that this bill be not enacted.

For that reason, I object.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, it is near adjournment time.

Mr. DARROW. Yes; but this does not entail any additional expenditure.

Mr. BLANTON. I am backing up your Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. DARROW. I realize that. This bill merely permits further examination, and if he passes it then to grant him this rank.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will tell the House what he has done with that farmers' petition that was as big as a box car, which was presented to him by the farmers of the United States, then I might withdraw my objection.

Mr. DARROW. I am sure that the same farmers that backed that proposition would back this proposition if the gentleman would permit it to go through.

Mr. BLANTON. No; oh, no. Mr. Speaker, I object.

FRANK STINCHCOMB

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6194) for the relief of Frank Stinchcomb.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act for the relief of Frank Stinchcomb, approved June 6, 1924 (43 Stat. L. 1374), be amended by adding thereto the following: "Provided, That if appointed a lieutenant in the regular Navy, he shall be entitled to count all service which he would have been entitled to count had he been appointed a lieutenant in the United States Navy under the act of June 4, 1920, for pay and all other purposes."

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, at the end of the bill I move to strike out the period and insert a colon and add the following, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is this the same amendment that we have adopted to several of these bills?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. It is in a little different language, because the language so used is not necessary in this case, but the language that I propose is suggested by the Director of the Budget.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK of Texas: At the end of the bill insert the following: "Provided, That no back pay or allowances shall accrue to this officer by reason of the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JOSEPH M. BLACK

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9151) for the relief of Joseph M. Black.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws conferring rights upon honorably discharged soldiers, their widows and dependent relatives, Joseph M. Black shall hereafter be held and considered to have been in the military service of the United States as a private in Company I, Fifty-eighth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, from December 3, 1861, and to have been honorably discharged October 24, 1862: Provided, That no back pay, back pension, or other allowance shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 10, strike out the words "that no back pay, back pension, or other allowance shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "that no back pay, pension, bounty, or allowances shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act."

The committee amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LUCY B. KNOX

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1406) granting six months' pay to Lucy B. Knox.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, there is a report here on this bill from the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Wilbur, in which he says that the Budget Bureau has indicated that it would approve an unfavorable report on the bill. The Secretary recommends that the bill be not enacted, and he does that over his own signature; therefore I object.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. LINTHICUM. This bill has passed twice.

Mr. BLANTON. I know; but I am backing up the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. We are all hoping that the gentleman will continue to back him up when he is right.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall not back him up on a big Navy, but I will on saving money.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The trouble about the gentleman is that he is entirely inconsistent in his conduct. Things on which he should back him up he does not, and things on which he should disagree with him he does not. Of course, the department says that this bill is in the interest of one individual. All of these bills are in behalf of some individual, and the department as a policy disagrees. But there is merit in this case, and the committee does not agree with the conclusions of the Secretary.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, as this is provocative of so much argument, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Oh, I will withdraw my argument, if the gentleman does that.

Mr. BLANTON. I know; but there is only a handful of us here, and I have been on watch for four and three-fourths hours constantly, and a few of us can not do it all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I insist on the regular order, which is: Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. The regular order is that we have not a quorum.

Mr. TILSON. Then let us get a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is quite evident that there is no quorum present.

Mr. BLANTON. Let us get a new shift; this shift has worked long enough.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. I second the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant-at-Arms will bring in absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I object, Mr. Speaker, because the Secretary of the Navy disapproves.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard. The Clerk will report the next bill.

VINCENTIA V. IRWIN

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2494) granting six months' pay to Vincentia V. Irwin.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve the right to object. Mr. Hanford MacNider, Acting Secretary of War, recommends the following:

I recommend that S. 1573 be not favorably considered by your committee, and be not enacted into law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill now before the House is House bill 9149.

Mr. BLANTON. S. 1573 is the same bill—identical. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Getchell is dead. There will be no opportunity, of course, for him to receive any pension or gratuity of any kind. His family presents this. No one of his family, as I understand, is or will be entitled to a pension on account of his service in the Civil War; but from a feeling of pride they ask that the record be corrected.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I had the impression that I had this bill marked for objection, but I find I did not have it so marked. I will be very glad to withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is withdrawn. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I have not had an opportunity to read the report in this case, but it seems to be one of those cases where a man is being taken up who has retired voluntarily from the service and Congress is authorizing him to be reappointed in the Army. If the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs or the gentleman who reported this bill are here, I would like to see if they can give us some information about this particular bill. In view of the fact that no one is here who seems to be able to give that information, I ask that it be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I have no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum. I think we ought to have a new shift. Just a few of us can not do all of the work here in one day. We are passing these bills entirely too fast.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman will realize that it was at his demand that a roll call was had a few minutes ago when it lacked only 15 minutes until 5 o'clock. I had given my word that we should try to run until 5 o'clock in order to dispose of a number of bills in which Members of the House are deeply interested. The gentleman from Texas objected to that program and demanded a quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. Which is the constitutional right I possess.

Mr. TILSON. It is.

Mr. BLANTON. It is the constitutional right of any Member to require a quorum present.

Mr. TILSON. It is.

Mr. BLANTON. Especially when he has worked constantly here since 12 o'clock, with important bills being passed in a quarter of a minute.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman was entirely within his rights, but the gentleman realizes that it is not at all necessary for the entire membership to be present when he and others are present who are studying these bills all the time in order that they may be carefully considered. It often happens, as the gentleman knows, that we transact business without the entire membership of the House being on the floor. The gentleman has seen fit to require that a quorum be present. With the calling of the roll we have now consumed 40 minutes of time and have almost put in the 15 minutes, which the gentleman refused to allow us to put in before 5 o'clock.

Mr. BLANTON. And therefore——

Mr. TILSON. "And therefore" having proceeded for 15 minutes, if the gentleman insists that we can not work any longer to-night——

Mr. BLANTON. I will say to the gentleman from Connecticut if he will stay here until 6 o'clock I will stay here with him and finish the calendar. The gentleman does not want to do that.

Mr. TILSON. No; I should like to go down to Calendar No. 203.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall not object. Let us proceed.

Mr. TILSON. Because the bills put on the calendar after January 23 have not been on the calendar for three days, and for that reason in analogy to the Consent Calendar.

Mr. BLANTON. I am willing to go on. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. TILSON. In analogy to the Consent Calendar I think that we should not consider bills that have been reported since January 23.

Mr. BLANTON. Let us proceed. I am willing.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman withdraws his point of no quorum?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

H. SENATE

FRIDAY, January 27, 1928

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty and everlasting God, who hast made man but little lower than the angels and hast crowned him with glory and honor, giving him dominion over the works of Thy hands, fulfill in us this day Thy prophecy of old. Reveal in us the majesty of human souls which have for home a universe that is one and continuous, the robe of divinity woven without seam throughout. Forgive the impatience of our unbelief and make perfect that which is lacking in our faith, that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will may be done upon earth. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

CAREER OF MAJ. GEN. GEORGE W. GOETHALS

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD statements on the career of Maj. Gen. George W. Goethals, United States Army, which appeared in the United States Daily last Monday.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the United States Daily, January 23, 1928]

REGRET EXPRESSED FOLLOWING DEATH OF GENERAL GOETHALS—SECRETARY DAVIS AND GENERAL SUMMERALL EULOGIZE BUILDER OF PANAMA CANAL

Maj. Gen. George W. Goethals, United States Army (retired), died in New York City on January 21. Upon learning of the general's death, the Secretary of War, Dwight F. Davis, and the Chief of Staff, Maj. Gen. Charles P. Summerall, in statements made public by the department on January 21 expressed their regret. The statement of Secretary Davis follows in full text:

"By the death of General Goethals the Nation loses a citizen who has performed outstanding service in both civil and military capacities. He demonstrated great ability as engineer and administrator. In the Army he was honored and respected for both his technical qualifications and his leadership."

The statement of Major General Summerall, read in full text:

"In the death of Maj. Gen. George W. Goethals the Army loses an illustrious comrade and a loyal friend. His epochal achievement in completing the waterway which unites the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans at the Isthmus of Panama has obscured the brilliance of many similar accomplishments throughout a period of over 40 years as a military engineer, military supply officer, and military administrator. General Goethals was one of the great Army figures of our day. His fame is world-wide.

"In peace his energy and skill were applied toward the advancement of our national prosperity and the promotion of the welfare of our people; in war to the assurance of the security of our rights and liberties. The Army feels a distinct personal loss in the passing of one whom it looked upon with admiration for accomplishment, reverence for character, and love for association."

SUMMARY OF CAREER

A summary of General Goethals's career issued by the War Department read in full text:

"General Goethals graduated from the United States Military Academy in 1880, and was commissioned in the Corps of Engineers. He served at many places in the United States on river and harbor work. From August, 1903, he served on the newly organized General Staff until he was appointed a member of the Isthmian Canal Commission by President Roosevelt. He became chief engineer of the Panama Canal, and by his abilities as an engineer, administrator, and leader he pushed the work on the canal to a successful completion. He became Governor of the Panama Canal April 1, 1914.

"By the act of March 4, 1915, he received the thanks of Congress and was appointed major general in recognition of his services to the Nation in constructing the Panama Canal. On November 1, 1916, he was retired at his own request after over 40 years of service. He was State engineer of New Jersey in 1917 and general manager of the Emergency Fleet Corporation from April to July, 1917.

WAR SERVICE RECOGNIZED

"On December 2, 1917, he returned to active service with the War Department as Acting Quartermaster General, and in January, 1918, was appointed Assistant Chief of Staff and Director of Purchase, Storage and Traffic. General Goethals was in charge of all purchases for the War Department, railroad transportation, and shipment overseas of all troops and supplies. He was also a member of the War Industries Board. He returned to the retired list on March 4, 1919.

"General Goethals was awarded the distinguished service medal in recognition of his especially meritorious and conspicuous service in reorganizing the Quartermaster Department and in organizing and administering the Purchase, Storage and Traffic Division during the World War.

"He was also awarded the French Legion of Honor (commander), the British Knight Commander of St. Michael and St. George, the Chinese Grand Cordon of the Order of the Wen Hu (Striped Tiger), second class.

"In 1913 the University of Pennsylvania and in 1915 Princeton conferred on him the degree of doctor of laws.

"He received the medals of the National Geographic Society and the Civic Forum and National Institute of Social Sciences."

Mr. COPELAND presented resolutions adopted by the Women's Social Section of the Westchester (N. Y.) Mr. ASHURST presented a communication, with attached resolution, from Maricopa Post, No. 720, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, at Phoenix, Ariz., which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARICOPA POST, NO. 720,
Phoenix, Ariz., January 19, 1928.

This organization has been advised that there is to be an effort made during the present session of Congress for the repeal of the Ashurst amendment to H. R. 12175, enacted by Congress in 1926, providing for a minimum compensation of $50 per month to ex-service men shown to have had tuberculosis of a compensable degree and who have reached a stage of complete arrest of this disease.

There are in Arizona several thousand tubercular ex-service men, many of whom have reached a stage of complete arrest of the ravages of the disease, and who would be seriously affected by the repeal of the Ashurst amendment.

It is a well-known fact that contentment and peace of mind are essentials to recovery of persons afflicted with tuberculosis, and the very knowledge that there is a movement afoot to withdraw the Government pittance granted these sufferers by Congress has already seriously disturbed the minds of many of these sick veterans and jeopardized their chances to maintain a condition of complete arrest of the disease.

Whereas Maricopa Post, No. 720, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, in regular meeting assembled in Phoenix, Ariz., January 10, 1928, having had the above subject matter under consideration and discussion, unanimously agreed to appoint a committee to draft a resolution of protest against the repeal of the Ashurst amendment, and that copies of the resolution be sent to General Hines, Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau; Senators ASHURST and HAYDEN, and Congressman DOUGLAS, of Arizona: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That Maricopa Post, No. 720, Veterans of Foreign Wars, do most vigorously protest the repeal of the Ashurst amendment to H. R. 12175, enacted by the Congress of the United States in 1926, and respectfully urge General Hines, Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, to give further consideration to this subject; and we further respectfully request the Arizona delegation to Congress to use their utmost endeavors to dissuade Congress from repealing the Ashurst amendment.

Respectfully,
EVERETT NEWCOMER,
Post Commander and Chairman of Committee.
C. W. STEELE,
Past Department Commander and Member of Committee.
JOHN E. PRICE,
Past Department Patriotic Instructor and Member of Committee.

Mr. TYSON presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 997 (Senate 920)

Whereas there are nine classes of officers in the World War—the regular, the provisional, and the emergency officers of the Navy, Marine Corps, and Army; and

Whereas eight of these classes have been granted by the Congress honorable retirement for their wounds and disabilities received as a result of their service in camp and field; and

Whereas the emergency Army officers who fought heroically, as evidenced by more than 2,000 battle deaths in France, have alone failed to receive the honorable retirement accorded all other classes of officers; and

Whereas there are 1,848 of these disabled emergency Army officers now suffering from disabilities received on the field of battle, whose honorable retirement has not been granted by Congress; and

Whereas we are informed that legislation is pending in both Houses of Congress: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That we do urgently request Congress to have this legislation removing this discrimination passed at this session of Congress; be it

Resolved further, That the clerks of the house of representatives and the senate join in sending a copy of this resolution to each United States Senator and Member of the House of Representatives.

Adopted by the House of Representatives of South Carolina, January 13, 1928.

[SEAL.]
J. WILSON GIBBES,
Clerk of the House.

Concurred in by the senate, January 13, 1928.
JAMES H. FOWLER,
Clerk of the Senate.

Mr. TYSON also presented resolutions adopted by Lieutenant H. L. McCorkle Camp, No. 2, National Sanatorium, Tenn., which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LIEUTENANT H. L. MCCORKLE CAMP, NO. 2,
SPANISH WAR VETERANS,
DEPARTMENT OF TENNESSEE,
National Sanatorium, Tenn., January 13, 1928.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

Your memorialists, Lieutenant H. L. McCorkle Camp, No. 2, Spanish War Veterans, Department of Tennessee, respectfully represent:

Whereas all other classes of officers who fought in the World War have been retired by Congress for their wounds, and the disabled emergency Army officers alone have been denied retirement for their mutilations and disabilities; and

Whereas more than 170 of these disabled emergency Army officers have died since this legislation has been before Congress, awaiting in vain this affirmative action of Congress giving them the relief to which they are so justly entitled; and

Whereas it is the claim of the veterans and organizations favoring this legislation that it is being kept from being enacted into law by parliamentary tactics alone: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be memorialized to take immediate action on said bill, to the end that the same be enacted into law and this discrimination against the disabled emergency Army officers be rectified at the earliest possible moment; and be it further

Resolved, That the adjutant of this post forward a copy to Hon. LAWRENCE D. TYSON, Senator for Tennessee, and to Hon. B. CARROLL REECE, Representative in Congress of the first congresisonal district of the State of Tennessee.

LIEUTENANT H. L. MCCORKLE CAMP, NO. 2, SPANISH WAR VETERANS, DEPARTMENT OF TENNESSEE, SANKEY GRAY, Commander.

LIEUTENANT H. L. MCCORKLE CAMP, NO. 2,
SPANISH WAR VETERANS,
DEPARTMENT OF TENNESSEE,
National Sanatorium, Tenn., January 13, 1928.

I, D. H. McDaniel, adjutant of Lieutenant H. L. McCorkle Camp, No. 2, Spanish War Veterans, Department of Tennessee, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of resolutions passed by Lieutenant H. L. McCorkle Camp, No. 2, Spanish War Veterans, Department of Tennessee, memorializing the Congress of the United States for the immediate passage of the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill, an act for the relief of disabled emergency Army officers, now pending.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and the official seal of the said Lieutenant H. L. McCorkle Camp, No. 2, Spanish War Veterans, Department of Tennessee.

Done at the National Sanatorium, Tenn., this the 13th day of January, 1928.

[SEAL.] D. H. McDANIEL, Adjutant.

Mr. TYSON also presented resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of citizens at Halls, Tenn., expressing their convictions and views with reference to prohibition and its enforcement, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HARRIS presented resolutions of the Sixth Annual Asphalt Paving Conference, indorsing various means and measures for the promotion of good roads and the improvement of highways, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD Senate bill 2850, introduced by me on yesterday, in reference to the flood situation.

S. 2850, Seventieth Congress, first session

A bill to provide for control of floods of the Mississippi River, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That the Federal Government hereby recognizes that the protection of interstate commerce from the destructive flood waters of the Mississippi River and of its navigable tributaries affecting such floods is a national duty and responsibility, and that all costs and charges connected with flood-control work shall be paid by the Federal Government without contribution from the States or local levee boards or districts.

SEC. 2. That for controlling the flood waters of the Mississippi River and its navigable tributaries affecting such floods and continuing its improvement from the Head of Passes to the mouth of the Ohio River, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, empowered, and directed to carry on continuously and as expeditiously as possible, by hired labor or otherwise, the plans of the Mississippi River Commission heretofore or hereafter adopted for the control of the flood waters of said Mississippi River, and that there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any sums of money not otherwise appropriated, from time to time as such appropriation may be needed, a sum not to exceed in the aggregate $775,000,000 for the purpose of carrying out the plans of said Mississippi River Commission to give complete protection against flood waters on said river.

That where levees have heretofore been constructed on one or the other side of the river and the lands on the opposite side have been thereby subjected to greater overflow, or where the Mississippi River Commission has heretofore recommended or may hereafter recommend that levees be built, the said commission is hereby authorized to acquire, by purchase or condemnation proceedings, rights of way for such new additional levees and to build the same out of the funds herein authorized to be appropriated.

SEC. 5. That the act of June 28, 1879, providing for the appointment of a Mississippi River Commission, and for other purposes, be, and is hereby, amended by authorizing the Chief of Engineers to be an ex officio member of said Mississippi River Commission with equal rights and powers now devolving upon other members of the commission; and by providing that the president of the Mississippi River Commission shall receive the rank, pay, and allowances of a brigadier general of Engineers.

SEC. 6. The officers from the Engineer Corps of the Army assigned to duty as district officers under the Mississippi River Commission shall retain their posts, at the option of the commission, at least six years, and shall devote their entire time to the work of the commission.

SEC. 7. That the Mississippi River Commission shall maintain in the river below Cairo a minimum channel width of 300 feet, with a depth of 9 feet at all stages.

SEC. 8. That the work of flood control on the Mississippi River shall be prosecuted with a view to protecting the valley from a flood exceeding that of 1927 by such percentage as the Mississippi River Commission shall, after investigation, deem necessary fully to protect the valley against destructive floods.

SEC. 9. That in acquiring lands necessary for levee ways, spillways, reservoirs, and the like, in the opinion of the commission necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, the said commission is hereby authorized to purchase such lands as they consider proper for such purposes, and in the event the commission is unable to acquire said lands at a fair and just price, it is authorized to go into the district courts of the United States in the districts where the land lies and acquire by condemnation proceedings the said lands. In such condemnation proceedings judges of the several district courts having jurisdiction over said lands are hereby empowered, authorized, and directed to appoint a commission, or jury, of three freeholders, whose duty it will be to go upon said land and make such investigation and hear such evidence as may be adduced and report to the court the amount of land taken and the value thereof; and thereupon the court shall enter a judgment vesting the title of said lands in the Mississippi River Commission, and upon the payment in the court of the amount of award of said commission or jury award the possession of such land to the commission. In case the commission or the landowner is dissatisfied with the report of said commission, or jury, an appeal will lie to the circuit court of appeals as in other cases; but such appeal shall not delay the awarding of the possession of said lands to the said commission.

SEC. 10. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to borrow on the credit of the United States from time to time, as the proceeds may be required to defray expenditures authorized by this act (such proceeds when received to be used only for the purpose of meeting such expenditures), the sum of $775,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, and to prepare and issue therefor coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe, and in denominations of $20 or some multiple of that sum, redeemable in gold coin at the pleasure of the United States after 10 years from the date of their issue, and payable 30 years from such date, and bearing interest payable quarterly in gold coin at the rate of 3 per cent per annum; and the bonds herein authorized shall be exempt from all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority: Provided, That said bonds may be disposed of by the Secretary of the Treasury at not less than par, under such regulations as he may prescribe, giving to all citizens of the United States an equal opportunity to subscribe therefor, but no commissions shall be allowed or paid thereon; and a sum not exceeding one-tenth of 1 per cent of the amount of the bonds herein authorized is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the expense of preparing, advertising, and issuing the same.

SEC. 11. That all laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. CARAWAY. I ask unanimous consent that the reference of the bill (S. 1103) permitting the withdrawal of water from White River, Ark., be changed from the Committee on Commerce to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. It is a bill I introduced myself dealing with rice irrigation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CLAIMS OF THE STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration after it shall have been read.

The resolution (S. Res. 123) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Comptroller General is hereby authorized and directed to state an account and report to the Senate of the indebtedness of the State of North Carolina to the United States upon certain of the bonds of the State of the principal amount of $58,000, and coupons thereof due and unpaid in the amount of $88,140, and the claims of the State of North Carolina, respectively, for advances during the War of 1812, as set forth in Senate Report No. 1559, Sixty-ninth Congress, second session, with interest computed under Maryland rule, and for the proceeds of cotton seized by the United States in the amount of $42,532.54 as set forth in Senate Report No. 248, part 2, Sixtieth Congress, first session, and in such statement of the account there shall be allowed to the State of North Carolina upon the said cotton claim interest from the date of the seizure of the cotton for the same period thereafter and at the same rate of interest as upon the State bonds aforesaid.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

THOMAS M. REED

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 124), which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Whereas Thomas M. Reed was nominated in 1921 by the President to be United States district judge for the first division of the district of Alaska, and was thereafter confirmed and entered upon the duties of his office; and

Whereas his term of office expired August 16, 1925, and on December 21, 1925, the President nominated him for the office of district judge for the first division of the district of Alaska, and his nomination was upon the same day referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and

Whereas a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary was appointed on said day to consider the nomination of said Thomas M. Reed, as well as the nominations of other persons named by the President at the same time to fill offices in Alaska; and

Whereas said subcommittee after full hearings upon each of said nominations unanimously reported to the Committee on the Judiciary on the 17th day of March, 1926, recommending that neither said Thomas M. Reed nor the other persons named be confirmed by the full committee; and

Whereas the said committee authorized the chairman of the committee to advise the President of the action of the subcommittee and also the full committee; and

Whereas upon being so advised the President withdrew the names of said persons, including the name of said Thomas M. Reed, and thereafter transmitted to the Senate the names of other persons than those adversely reported upon, except Thomas M. Reed, to fill the offices theretofore held by such persons whose names had been withdrawn other than Thomas M. Reed; and

Whereas no person has been nominated by the President to fill the office of United States district judge for the first division of the district of Alaska, although the term of said Thomas M. Reed as judge expired August 16, 1925, and notwithstanding the expiration of his term of office he has continued and still continues to hold said office and assume the duties appertaining thereto: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to take cognizance of the matters and things herein recited and the fact that said Thomas M. Reed is holding the office of United States district judge in said district of Alaska and performing the duties thereof without any appointment by the President, and without confirmation by the Senate of the United States, and that said committee be further directed to report to the Senate (1) whether in its opinion said Thomas M. Reed is legally holding said office or whether he is an intruder and usurper, (2) whether any proceedings are available by which to secure his ouster from said office, and (3) whether any legislation is required by Congress to deal with said matter or with situations which may arise of a similar character.

BIEBER BUILDING, WASHINGTON, D. C.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATERMAN in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1968) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to pay for the use and occupancy by the Department of Agriculture of the Bieber Building, 1358 B Street SW., Washington, D. C., and for other purposes, which was, on page 1, to strike out all after the figures "1928," in line 8, down to and including the word "if," in line 9, page 2, and insert "If."

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President——

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I understand that until the morning business shall have been concluded speeches are not in order. I do not like to interrupt the Senator from West Virginia, but I wish we might complete the morning business. We agreed to go on this morning with the joint resolution which is in charge of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], and if we should complete the business before the Senate to-day it is desired to have the Senate adjourn over until Monday; but if we can not do so, it will be necessary to have a session to-morrow. I am, therefore, going to ask the Senator from West Virginia if he will not wait until we get through with the routine morning business?

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, it is a very important matter on which I desire to address the Senate, for it really relates to the candidacy of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] for the Presidency. I therefore hope he will not object to my speaking.

Mr. CURTIS. I appreciate the interest the Senator from West Virginia is taking in my candidacy, but I do not think the floor of the Senate is the proper place to carry on my political battles. I prefer to fight for delegates in the States.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, if I can not speak now, I perhaps shall have to consume a great deal more time later in the day; and I am going to speak before the day is over. So I hope the Senator from Kansas is not going to object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Concurrent and other resolutions are in order. Is the regular order demanded?

Mr. NEELY. If the Senator from Kansas demands the regular order, of course I shall have to bide the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia not yield to me in order that I may call up House Joint Resolution 131?

Mr. NEELY. I will yield to the Senator for that purpose.

TAX REFUND

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a resolution coming over from a preceding day—the resolution of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. I should like to have my resolution read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 110) submitted by Mr. HEFLIN on January 14, as modified on January 23, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to the Senate a list, by States, of the names of people to whom taxes have been refunded, and the amount so refunded in each case, in the last refund of taxes made by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the Senate for just a few moments on this resolution. As to the advisability of adopting the resolution, I wish, first, to call the attention of the Senate to a letter that was written to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], the letter being signed by A. W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury. I also have a letter which is addressed to me, written in reply to my request for information as to the attitude of the department on the resolution, which letter is also signed by the Secretary of the Treasury. The letter to the Senator from Alabama reads as follows:

Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of December 29, 1927, wherein you request a list of refunds of internal-revenue taxes which have been made by this department, giving the names of persons receiving such refunds and the amounts of same.

The list which you desire is submitted by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to the Speaker of the House of Representatives at the opening of each session of Congress, and covers the refunds of internal-revenue taxes which were made by the Bureau of Internal Revenue for each preceding fiscal year. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue is required to submit such a report to Congress, pursuant to the provisions of section 3220, Revised Statutes, as amended by section 1111 of the revenue act of 1926. Section 3220 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, reads as follows:

"SEC. 3220. Except as otherwise provided in sections 284 and 319 of the revenue act of 1926, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, subject to regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized to remit, refund, and pay back all taxes erroneously or illegally assessed or collected, all penalties collected without authority, and all taxes that appear to be unjustly assessed or excessive in amount, or in any manner wrongfully collected; also to repay to any collector or deputy collector the full amount of such sums of money as may be recovered against him in any court for any internal-revenue taxes collected by him, with the cost and expenses of suit; also all damages and costs recovered against any assessor, assistant assessor, collector, deputy collector, agent, or inspector in any suit brought against him by reason of anything done in the due performance of his official duty, and shall make report to Congress at the beginning of each regular session of Congress of all transactions under this section."

Appropriations granted to this department during the past several fiscal years for making refunds of internal-revenue taxes have contained a proviso in each case for the submission of a report to Congress, similar to the report required by section 3220, Revised Statutes. The first deficiency act, fiscal year 1928, approved December 22, 1927 (Public, No. 2, 70th Cong.), appropriated $43,000,000 for refunding taxes illegally collected. This is the most recent amount which has been appropriated for that purpose. The proviso in this appropriation act requiring the submission of the report discussed herein reads as follows:

"* * *: Provided, That a report shall be made to Congress of the disbursements hereunder as required by such acts, including the names of all persons and corporations to whom payments are made, together with the amount paid to each."

The report covering refunds of taxes made by this department during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1927, was submitted to the Speaker of the House of Representatives at the opening of the present session of Congress. This report has been referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, House of Representatives, and is available in that committee for review by any Member of Congress.

In the preparation of these reports the Treasury has followed the form and procedure approved by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee at the time this legislation was enacted. The Treasury has incorporated in the report such information as the chairman of that committee thought necessary. The procedure followed in the submission of these reports involves the daily typing of all names of taxpayers to whom refunds of internal-revenue taxes are found to be due and the amounts of the refunds, in the same order in which such names and amounts appear on the refund schedules approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

The Treasury Department will again take up the form of the report with the present chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House. The department will be pleased to submit this report to Congress in the future in such manner as may be designated by the Ways and Means Committee.

To rework the present report so that the information contained therein would be in alphabetical order, or according to the various States and collection districts, would involve an expenditure of about $10,000. Inasmuch as our appropriation for this fiscal year is limited, it would be difficult to incur such an expenditure at this time.

It is to be regretted that we are unable to comply with your request at this time, but you may be assured that this report will be submitted in the future in any form that may be approved by the present Congress.

Mr. President, in the letter which I have received it is specifically stated that it will cost $10,000 to prepare the information in the form desired.

The letter further says:

To resubmit the report of refunds which was forwarded by the department to Congress for the past fiscal year, consisting of 245,440 names, in the manner provided for in the Senate resolution referred to herein would involve an administrative expense of approximately $10,000. Inasmuch as the appropriation which has been granted for the present fiscal year is limited, it would be difficult to incur such an expenditure at this time. For your further information it may be stated that to resubmit the list of refunds of taxes in accordance with Senate Resolution 110 would require the services of more than 100 employees for a minimum period of 15 days.

In other words, right at the time when the income-tax returns are coming in this year the Bureau of Internal Revenue would have to assign a hundred of its employees for a period of 15 days to collate the information and prepare it in the form desired.

The Senator from Alabama or any other Senator or any Member of the House can go to the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives and find out exactly the amount of the refunds granted to any individual and any association or corporation in the United States, and it does seem to me that it would be better to pursue that course than to involve the bureau in this additional work at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was not in the Chamber when the Senator began to read. Is the report of tax refunds filed with the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee?

Mr. SMOOT. Under the law it is required to be filed with the House of Representatives.

Mr. SIMMONS. Can we not have a copy of that report sent to the Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. Any Senator has a perfect right to go to the Ways and Means Committee and see it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand that anyone has a perfect right to do that, but Senators do not like to walk over to the House and ask for a paper of that sort. Why can we not have a copy of it sent to the Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. I presume it is not sent to the Senate because the law does not require that it shall be so sent; that is all. I presume that could be done, but the resolution of the Senator from Alabama requests that the names be furnished alphabetically and by districts, and that is what is going to take the time.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not wish to embarrass the department by requiring them to allocate a hundred men to do work which has already been done, but I do think there ought to be some means by which the Senate can secure the report which has been sent to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee without each individual Senator having to go there to get it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the law merely requires that the report be filed with the House of Representatives; but, if the Treasury Department has a copy of the report, I have no doubt we can get a copy of it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, let me inquire of the Senator if such reports which are furnished to the House are printed?

Mr. SMOOT. I can not state whether they are printed there or not. I judge not, because the law does not require it. The law merely requires that the list shall be filed with the House of Representatives.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That list is not in alphabetical order?

Mr. SMOOT. No; it is not arranged alphabetically, but is arranged in the order in which the refunds were made.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. As I understand, the Senator from Alabama wants to have the list furnished according to States.

Mr. SMOOT. Not only according to States, but alphabetically by States and by districts, and that is the work that is going to take a hundred employees 15 days at a cost of $10,000. Of all times when such a thing should not be done it is now when income-tax returns are beginning to come in and the bureau will be crowded in the extreme.

Mr. SIMMONS. What the Senator suggests is that we postpone the time for doing it?

Mr. SMOOT. I certainly would not want to insist that the work shall be done at this time, and I do not think the bureau ought to be compelled to do it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator also thinks that the information is now available?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But it is not available in the form requested by the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SMOOT. No. In other words, any Senator can walk over to the Ways and Means Committee of the House and ask for the tax refunds granted to any individual or corporation in the United States, and he can secure that information. I think it ought to be done in that way, instead of in the manner proposed by the resolution, which will involve an expenditure of $10,000 and take 100 employees from their present work and assign them to this duty while the bureau is crowded at this particular time.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am surprised to hear the Senator state that he does not know whether or not the list is printed.

Mr. SMOOT. I doubt whether it is printed, because the law, as I have said, merely provides that it shall be delivered to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, this information has never been given to the Senate. It is a terrible indictment against the Senate that the Senate has voted money to pay these refunds in the millions and hundreds of millions without ever having this list. I have tried repeatedly to obtain this important information.

The newspaper men have never seen it except just for a few moments at the Treasury Department. They were called in to look it over—they have told me this—and just had a few minutes in which to turn the pages and pick out names, all mixed up, jumbled together, from pages containing over 200,000 names. I dare say in all the ramifications of the various departments of Government there is no such loose, clumsy, and confusing performance as is found in this particular branch of the Government. I am asking that the names of people receiving refunds of taxes shall be given by States showing the amount refunded in each case.

Why can not the Senate be furnished with this information? Why are we not entitled to know in advance to whom they are refunding this money? You could not get a bill through a commissioner's court in any place in the United States without submitting to the commission itself the name of the person to whom money was to be paid and the amount of money to be paid; but here we are about to be called upon to vote for the refund of $103,000,000 without a scintilla of evidence furnished the Senate showing the amount and to whom it is to be paid.

Mr. President, it strikes me as a terrible indictment against this body if it permits that thing to continue.

It has been suggested to me that I amend this resolution. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] suggests that I amend it so as to require them to furnish us these names by States for amounts above $10,000. I am willing to accept that amendment. There are quite a number of these items that range around five and ten dollars, fifteen and twenty dollars, and so on. We would not care especially to have those small amounts. We might follow the suggestion of the Senator from Utah and go over to the House of Representatives and secure permission to look at the list furnished to the House, which has never been furnished to the Senate, and examine that list as to the smaller amounts; but I submit that this body, one branch of the legislative body of the Nation, is entitled to have a list such as I suggest furnished to it by the Secretary of the Treasury.

I wrote the Secretary of the Treasury for this list on the 29th of December. He is just now answering my letter, so that the Senator from Utah could use it in a debate here.

Mr. SMOOT. The Secretary's letter is dated January 14. I have a copy of it here.

Mr. HEFLIN. And mine was written on December 29.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator's letter to him was written on December 29.

Mr. HEFLIN. It is just about half a mile from the Secretary's office to the Capitol. It takes him half a month to get his facts and figures, or supposed facts and figures, ready and a statement ready to be submitted to the Senate.

Senators, it seems to me that we ought to demand this information. I think the Secretary should be required to give us this list containing names and amounts by States. I do not think that is asking too much of the Secretary of the Treasury. I know that bureaucracy has gone mad in the Capital. I know that some of these departments are setting themselves up above the lawmaking body of the Nation, and are becoming very arrogant and aristocratic and autocratic. They do not like to be disturbed about these matters; but this is still a government of the people, and we are the representatives of the people, and we are about to be called on to vote out of the Treasury $103,000,000 in refunds of taxes reaching back over the years of 1925, 1926, and 1927.

How much longer will these enormous refunds of taxes paid two and three years ago continue?

Will this business of favoritism never cease? Would any other lawmaking body or any other body in the world be as careless and indifferent to this kind of work as the Senate has been? I have protested and opposed the program to refund these taxes without specific evidence on the subject. So has the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]; and other Senators on this side and some on the other side have disapproved the manner in which this money has been refunded.

Mr. President, I ask that my resolution be modified in the way I have suggested, making the amount $10,000, instead of requiring the amounts and names of all persons to whom money has been refunded to be given.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). The Senator has a right to modify his resolution.

Mr. HEFLIN. I want it to read, "That all persons whose refunds amount to $10,000 and more." I do not think the Senator from Utah will object to it with all these other names stricken out. Personally I would like to have the entire list showing every name and the amount refunded in each instance. But the resolution as amended will bring to the Senate very important information. It will produce the information that some of us are particularly interested in at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not a question of the number of names. I do not know how many names there will be. It is a question of interfering with the work of the department right now, when it is so crowded with work; and not only that, Mr. President, but the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States passed this law and said that those names should be open to any Member of Congress.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand, this information is already in the possession of the House of Representatives; is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; under the law.

Mr. SWANSON. But they have not got it arranged alphabetically?

Mr. SMOOT. Not alphabetically.

Mr. SWANSON. It is all in a jumble, so that nobody can determine who is to be paid. Now, why would it take $10,000 for a clerk to take the report that was made to the Ways and Means Committee and make it alphabetical and send it here?

Mr. HEFLIN. By States.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand, it is all in a jumble—not fixed up alphabetically at all.

Mr. SMOOT. It is fixed up just as the payments have been made.

Mr. SWANSON. How long will it take the department to make a list by States of individuals and large corporations that have had these rebates? It would not take 10 clerks a week to take the list that the Senator from Alabama refers to and fix it up in that way and systematize it.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, certainly it would, Mr. President.

Mr. SWANSON. To take that list and simply fix it up so that people could look at it by States?

Mr. SMOOT. By States and districts and amounts. There are two hundred and forty-odd thousand of them.

Mr. SWANSON. Why did they not send it that way at first?

Mr. SMOOT. Because they did it according to the law; that is all.

Mr. SWANSON. The law does not say they must report in the order in which payments are made.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the way they would do, of course—report in the order in which they are paid.

Mr. SWANSON. It does seem to me that the newspaper people, the country, the Senate, and the House are entitled to have this information systematized as desired by the Senator from Alabama; and I do not believe it would cost a thousand dollars to get some clerks to take that and systematize it alphabetically by States.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, does not the Senator realize, though, that that information is not wanted?

Mr. SWANSON. Of course; and I can not see why they do not want it that way.

Mr. SMOOT. They have the information now.

Mr. SWANSON. But they have not the information. Who could get any information from a parcel of papers all mixed up, not arranged by States, not arranged alphabetically? Why did they not send it systematically at the beginning? All the Senator from Alabama wants is to have that information sent here so that the Senate can ascertain intelligently what it is doing when it votes $103,000,000, if I understand correctly. Is not that true?

Mr. SMOOT. I have already stated exactly what the resolution calls for.

Mr. SWANSON. If it costs $10,000, I am willing to vote $10,000 for this body to have information on rebates of $103,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that that $103,000,000 is yet to be provided, so that when the rebates are made it will be paid.

Mr. SWANSON. What we would like to know is the system by which it is done. I can not see the slightest objection in the world to taking this mass of information, systematizing it by States, and arranging it alphabetically. I can not see any objection to that. You say you have the information. Employ a few clerks to give that information to the country and to Congress.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to ask the Senator from Utah whether the objection to this is confined to the question of expense.

Mr. SMOOT. Not only the expense but the time in which it can be done. It will take 100 clerks 15 days to get this work out, and right now the returns of incomes are coming in from the 1927 taxes. To take a hundred men out of the work of receiving these returns and compiling this information, which any Senator or any Congressman can get in regard to any individual or corporation or association, is going to be a great inconvenience to the department and interfere with the work in connection with the income-tax returns, which are coming in now by the tens of thousands.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that all this information is in the hands of the House?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; under the law it is required to be there.

Mr. BORAH. The only question now is that of getting it in such a shape that a person can know what it is?

Mr. SMOOT. More easily; that is all.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah says the information is in the hands of the House.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Alabama a question? I have not investigated this matter, but it seems to me that there must of necessity be a record kept of each individual case, and the reason why the rebate was granted, and necessarily the address of the individual or firm, and his place of business, and the State in which he was located. It looks to me as though the persons in the Treasury Department would have every facility in the world for furnishing this information, except just the tedium of taking each case. Knowing the State, all that would be necessary would be to turn to the roster, find what States have had these rebates, and then the name of the individual. I do not know how they go about it down there, whether they make these refunds without keeping the name or address of the firm or corporation to be repaid the money; but I should imagine, in a place of such large business as our Treasury Department, that the files are all easily accessible by States, so that this work might be done without any unreasonable delay or any great amount of expense.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, I understand the proposition of the Senator from Utah to be this: It will take a hundred clerks to fix up this information alphabetically, but a Senator can get it, and it will take him two years to look through it and get any information. It comes to him all in a jumble. It will take a hundred clerks to get any system out of it so as to find anything, but we will turn it over to a Senator or Congressman!

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I ought to apologize, perhaps, for my ignorance on the subject, but I was not in the Senate Chamber when the resolution was read, and do not know just what it calls for. Does it call merely for information?

Mr. HEFLIN. The resolution requests the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish to the Senate, by States, the names of persons to whom refunds have been given in the last refunds made by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the amounts paid. I offered to amend the resolution by asking that they give the names and amounts only where the amounts are above $10,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Has the Senator any information as to how many refunds above $10,000 have been made?

Mr. HEFLIN. I have not, but the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] told me that there were a great many of them for small amounts, $3 and $5, and amounts like that. We do not care especially about those cases. He suggested that I make the limit $10,000.

Mr. NORRIS. I heard just a part of the remarks of the Senator from Utah, and I get this idea: That it is claimed that the information for which the Senator is asking in the resolution is already in the possession of the House of Representatives. Is that true?

Mr. HEFLIN. No, Senator. There is a list filed with the House with names of people residing in Alabama, New York, California, Nebraska, and all the States jumbled together. The newspaper men have told me that they were permitted to see the list for only a short space of time, not long enough to make any intelligent report on it. It is filed in the House in that form. This resolution asks that the Secretary of the Treasury furnish the Senate a list of names of those receiving above $10,000, by States, in order that we may have the information when in a few days we shall be asked to vote on a bill making provision for the payment of $103,000,000 in refunds.

Mr. SMOOT. The list has been filed with the House under the law, just as the refunds are paid, and there is not a Senator or a Representative who can not get the amount of the refund to any individual, association, or corporation, if he asks for it, as the law provides.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose I, or anyone else, should go and ask for the amount of Mr. Smith's refund. Is the information in such shape that a Senator or a Representative could get it without going through a voluminous mass of papers?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the items are in alphabetical order. You can get them in five minutes. All of the S's are under the letter S, and all of the A's are under the letter A, and so on.

Mr. SWANSON. Why, then, would it take a hundred clerks 30 days to fix the list up by States and alphabetically?

Mr. SMOOT. In the first place, they would have to go through all the names.

Mr. NORRIS. How many are there?

Mr. SMOOT. About 246,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator know how many there are which amount to above $10,000?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I have not that information.

Mr. NORRIS. I suppose such a limitation would cut the number down very materially.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it would cut the number down, but I do not know how many. By reference to the letter I find there are exactly 245,446.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to say to the Senator from Alabama that I have no idea how much it would be cut down if we should limit it to $10,000 and over.

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not know, either.

Mr. NORRIS. But to be valuable, to be of very much service, the list ought to be cut down very materially. A list of 240,000 names, even though it were arranged in alphabetical order, according to States, would still be a very voluminous document, and difficult to examine and get anything out of. I suggest to the Senator from Alabama that he fix the limit, say, at $25,000. That would certainly eliminate most of the names, and make it so that it would be handy to get. The idea of the Senator is, I suppose, to get information as to the large refunds.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I accept the suggestion made by the Senator from Nebraska, and ask that the resolution be modified accordingly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution will be so modified.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask for a vote on the resolution.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, one question before that is voted on. The Senator from Utah has said repeatedly that this list which is filed with the House is filed there under the law.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the law provide that the Ways and Means Committee shall have this information, but that the Senate Finance Committee shall not have it? I am just asking for information.

Mr. SMOOT. The law requires—and the Senator was a member of the Finance Committee when the law was framed——

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not disputing that.

Mr. SMOOT. The law provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall file with the Ways and Means Committee of the House a list of all refunds. It also gives the right to any Member of Congress to examine those lists at any time he may desire. That is what the law requires.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not disputing that at all. I simply have asked a question for information. It was a very great oversight on the part of the Finance Committee when it gave its approval to this provision not to have insisted that the Senate Finance Committee should likewise have a similar list, and I hope that if the tax bill now before the Finance Committee ever gets into the Senate—and I doubt very much whether it will——

Mr. SMOOT. Not if the Senator can prevent it.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator from Utah can prevent it, it will not come up this session.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, the Senator knows I am anxious to get it up.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, very well.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the Senator from Utah says it will not be gotten up if he can prevent it; that is, if the Senator from Utah can prevent it. I think he has made a correct statement as to that. What I am saying, however, is that when it does get out of the committee I hope that that provision will be amended so that the Senate committee having charge of this class of legislation will have the same opportunity to investigate and to advise itself as to what is being done as the House Ways and Means Committee has.

Mr. SMOOT. It was section 3220.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know that the names of those to whom refunds are proposed to be granted are many; but the amount which is appropriated for this purpose is very great, too. It is over a hundred million dollars, as I understand, that is now asked by the department to pay these refunds. I do not know when that matter will come before the Senate. It generally comes in one of the later deficiency bills; but I say to the Senator from Utah right now that whenever he does bring that matter here—whenever the Senate is asked to vote upon the question of whether it will make an appropriation to refund $103,000,000—I am going to insist, as a member of the Finance Committee, that the Senate shall have adequate and sufficient information to enlighten it before it passes any such large appropriation as that. The Treasury Department, I shall insist, must send us a list and a statement of these proposed refunds that will be at once intelligible and fully informative.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the particular reason for asking that the resolution be not passed at this time was a consideration of the expense attached to it and the fact that it would take the time of a great many employees. The limitation has been fixed at $25,000, and I can not say what number that would cut off. But the information is available to the Senate now.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I want to ask a question.

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. DILL. Are these names not available to the public now? This list, the Senator says, is sent to the Speaker of the House of Representatives. Does that mean that it is kept within his possession, without anybody being able to see it?

Mr. SIMMONS. The House has a list of the names locked up there. The Senator can go and get it.

Mr. DILL. I want to know whether the law prohibits the names being made public.

Mr. SMOOT. The law provides that they shall be deposited with the Ways and Means Committee of the House.

Mr. DILL. Is that interpreted to mean that nobody can see them except the members of that committee and of the House?

Mr. SMOOT. I think that anybody who asks there for the name in any particular case——

Mr. DILL. Oh, no; I am talking about the list.

Mr. SMOOT. That I do not know.

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the Senator that it is obvious the law does not require that the names shall be kept secret, because several weeks ago the New York Times printed page after page of the refunds to citizens of New York State.

Mr. DILL. I can not see why there should be any opposition to publishing them here.

Mr. SMOOT. I know that newspaper men go there and receive the information.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. I would like to ask the Senator if he knows how many folios one of these reports usually covers.

Mr. SMOOT. I could not say as to that.

Mr. BRUCE. Are they very voluminous?

Mr. SMOOT. Quite so.

Mr. BRUCE. Could not photostatic copies be taken of them at very slight expense?

Mr. SMOOT. The expense of getting a list of the names would not be very great; but what is asked now is that the department send the information alphabetically and by States and districts.

Mr. BRUCE. Should not all that be done at the Treasury?

Mr. SMOOT. The Treasury Department say they they can do it within 15 days, but that it will cost $10,000 and it will take 100 of their employees to do the work.

Mr. BRUCE. Should not that be done every year by the Treasury Department before they send the reports down? It seems to me the matter in the reports ought to be arranged according to States and according to any other principle of convenience the case may demand. Certainly I can not see that the Senator from Utah is justified in saying there would be any considerable expense in furnishing this body with a copy of these reports, because they could be taken photostatically.

Mr. SMOOT. My statement is based upon the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, which I have read.

Mr. BRUCE. Of course, if the names were all written out in longhand, that would be another matter. But there is no occasion for that. In my humble labors as a biographer I have had occasion to take very lengthy extracts from documents in libraries, and they are usually taken photostatically at very slight expense.

Mr. SMOOT. This does not mean a copy of the whole document alone; it requires the stating of the names and the addresses; and it would include the States and districts. That is why it would take a longer time. If it were a matter of just getting out the names and the amounts, it would not mean very much in the way of work.

Mr. BRUCE. Would it not be a good thing for the House and Senate to be altogether relieved of a task of that kind? It ought to be done at the Treasury Department before the reports are sent down.

Mr. SMOOT. This is according to law.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. I understood the Senator first to say that this list was arranged in the order in which the refunds were made.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I do say.

Mr. SWANSON. Subsequently the Senator said the names were arranged alphabetically.

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. SWANSON. Has the Senator any subsequent information, after looking over the papers? Are the amounts given in the order in which they are paid or are the lists arranged alphabetically?

Mr. SMOOT. They are filed in the order in which they are paid, but an index will be kept, of course, alphabetically arranged. If an amount is paid upon a certain date, that is filed with the House. The amounts are all given in accordance with the dates of payment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Utah that he is mistaken about their being filed in any order whatsoever. There is a general provision now which requires the Secretary to file the lists. They are filed, but are not alphabetically arranged.

Mr. SMOOT. The Secretary is not required to do that.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is right; he is not required to do it. He just files them pell-mell over at the House and they are put down in the cellar and nobody has charge of them. Several years ago I employed a man to go and seek out such information as he could get. It is most difficult to get the information. It is virtually no information at all, because there is no order about it. There is no way to obtain any particular returns. The present law virtually denies to the Congress any real information with reference to these returns.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I believe Senators are ready to vote to ask for the information for themselves as representatives of the sovereign States. I ask that the vote be taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to the Senate a list by States of the names of people to whom taxes have been refunded amounting in each case to $25,000 or more in the last refund of taxes made by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SOUTH CAROLINA AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATION

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 81) for the amendment of the act of March 3, 1927, by authorizing an annual appropriation to carry out the cooperative experiments contemplated by the act. The joint resolution was acted upon by the committee this morning and I was directed to report it back and ask for its immediate consideration. It will take only a moment. The Secretary of Agriculture has insisted that the experiment station in South Carolina shall be placed on the same footing with other experiment stations in cooperation with the Government. The joint resolution is intended to clarify the language of the existing law and is recommended by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SMOOT. In the past have they not been on the same footing?

Mr. SMITH. No. The language used in the creation of a cooperative relationship between the Government and my State was unfortunately chosen, with the result that the relationship terminated at the end of one year. The joint resolution is merely intended to clarify the language as indicated by the documents accompanying it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the act of March 3, 1927 (44 U. S. Stat. L., p. 1397), entitled "An act authorizing an appropriation to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to cooperate with the South Carolina agricultural experiment station" be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding the following:

"SEC. 2. That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated each fiscal year thereafter necessary appropriations to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry on the cooperative experiments contemplated by this act."

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROPOSED FARM RELIEF

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an editorial appearing in the St. Paul Pioneer Press of January 21 be printed at this point in the RECORD. It deals with agricultural legislation now pending before the Congress of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

NO SURRENDER

Whatever difference of view there may be about details of farm relief measures, the treatment being accorded the McNary-Haugen bill in Washington to-day is eminently unfair. The farmer's righteous demand for economic equality with other more favored industries is not receiving just consideration.

Through political strategy and parliamentary procedure the farmer's cause is temporarily pocketed in the House Committee on Agriculture, where deft operations are to render it innocuous and impotent. Defeatist propaganda sowed behind the lines has caused timid politicians to waver in their support. The whispered word of an impending presidential veto and suggestion that something should be prepared which would gain approval of the White House and party organization have spread through the Capitol.

The issue has not been met fairly nor the merits of the case openly discussed. Those who oppose the McNary-Haugen bill have made no sincere efforts to proffer a practical substitute that would accomplish the same results, namely, give to agriculture an equal measure of benefits that tariff protected industries enjoy. They take their stand behind a blank wall of opposition. When they talk of compromise they mean that the farmers should surrender everything that is vital to genuine agricultural relief.

Because of this attitude, the West is forced to stand firmly for the McNary-Haugen bill substantially as it is. Vice President Dawes has told the farmers to stick to their guns. Unquestionably when he made that statement he had in mind the fact that the enemies of farm relief have forced a choice between the McNary-Haugen bill or nothing. Therefore it becomes a duty of all true friends of the farmer to hold fast to the principles of the only concrete, workable plan of general relief which is before Congress as a practical reality.

The farmer will not permit his interests to be sacrificed to the exigencies of party politics. Politicians, thinking more of party than of the national welfare, may be able to return from Washington next spring with a counterfeit measure of farm relief. It is proposed to report out of committee a "McNary-Haugen" bill emasculated by omission of the equalization fee, which is the heart of the present plan for dealing effectively with surplus production and going to the root of the agricultural price difficulty. Such a spurious farm relief will not fool the farmers. They will not be put off with such a gesture. The issue dodged in Congress will reassert itself at the party conventions, in the campaign, at the election, and again and again in Congress until the question has been honestly faced.

Western politicians who are talking about deserting or betraying the cause of farm relief should take warning. They may waver, but the farmers will not.

INVESTIGATION OF SINKING OF SUBMARINE "S–4"

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 131) providing for a commission to investigate and report upon the facts connected with the sinking of the submarine S–4 and upon methods and appliances for the protection of submarines.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of House Joint Resolution 131.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] has proposed an amendment to the resolution striking out section 3 and providing for a joint commission of three Members of the Senate and three Members of the House to investigate the S–4 disaster. I have no objection to having a vote on his amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I have no objection to a vote, but I suggest the absence of a quorum, so that we may get absent Senators here, and then the Senate may vote immediately, so far as I am concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Ferris	McKellar	Shipstead

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON].

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, before the vote is taken upon the resolution of the Senator of Maine, and which involves, I think, a grave departure from the policy heretofore pursued when charges of neglect of duty have been preferred against department officials, I would like to ask the Senator from Maine if another submarine disaster should happen to-day, or a month from to-day, would he come here and ask for another commission to investigate it?

Mr. HALE. I think the commission which I am asking to have appointed will take care of that very matter and will make suggestions for the future which would in large measure reduce the chances for such an accident.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Such a course would seem to establish the policy that if an explosion occurs at an ammunition depot, if a gang of conspirators are found counterfeiting money in one of the departments, if a battleship explodes at sea no Senate committee is to make inquiry, but a special commission or bureau is to be set up to make the investigation for us.

Mr. HALE. I think the object of the investigation is to get the best information we can. So far as investigating accidents in the Navy or in the Army is concerned, I do not recall any cases where an investigation, either of a naval or Army accident has been made through a congressional committee. It is an unusual procedure.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do not care to prolong the discussion, but I want to protest most vigorously against the Senate of the United States abrogating its duty to inquire into charges of negligence against bureaus of the Government. Accordingly, I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, which provides for a congressional investigation into the causes of this most unfortunate disaster.

Mr. HALE. That is the question. We want to find out whether there is any actual neglect involved.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, may we have the amendment stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Virginia proposes to amend the joint resolution by striking out section 3 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

A joint committee composed of three Members of the Senate, appointed by the President of the Senate, and three Members of the House of Representatives, appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, is hereby authorized and directed to investigate the full facts of the sinking of the submarine S–4 in collision on December 17, 1927, with the United States Coast Guard destroyer Paulding off the Massachusetts coast, and the rescue and salvage operations carried on by the United States Navy subsequent thereto, to supplement the investigation now being made by a naval court of inquiry. And said joint committee shall submit a full report to each branch of the Congress, giving the result of this investigation and such recommendations as it may see proper to make.

And on page 2, line 17, after the word "the," insert "joint committee and."

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the failure of the Navy Department to have appliances and equipment with which to resurrect the sunken submarine S–4 is something that can not be excused by Congress or by the country. I am informed that the captain of the S–4 had already suggested that the officers and crew of that submarine were liable to be killed in the fashion that they were; but the Government seems to have taken no steps to be ready for such an emergency when it arose later.

The able and brilliant Representative in the House from Oklahome, Mr. MCCLINTIC, has pointed out that Germany is equipped with the proper appliances to raise a submarine in 10 hours. These American boys imprisoned in the submarine S–4 on the bottom of the ocean were there for days, sending messages to the outside world—to the officers of the Navy afloat above them, "For God's sake, hurry." The Navy was unable to bring them up, and there imprisoned on the bottom of the ocean they went to a slow and terrible death. It will not only be a terrible crime on the part of the Navy but it will be a terrible crime on the part of Congress if we do not provide at once the proper appliances at any cost.

It is a fearful thing to have men imprisoned in a submarine on the bottom of the ocean helpless and this Government, with its great wealth and power, failing to be provided for such an emergency. Germany has equipment, as I have said, already in use to raise a boat such as the S–4 in 10 hours. Why is it that our Navy has not provided such an equipment? It is certainly a terrible indictment against this Government that we were not able to bring these boys up at all until after they were dead.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON and Mr. HALE asked for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE] and vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], which I transfer to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TYSON. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BAYARD. The senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] is unavoidably absent. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES. I wish to announce that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] is paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN].

The result was announced—yeas 51, nays 32, as follows:

So Mr. SWANSON's amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, lines 5 and 6, it is proposed to strike out "three of whom shall be selected from civil life and two shall be retired officers of the Navy" and insert "four of whom shall be selected from civil life and one shall be a retired officer of the Navy; of the four members selected from civil life one shall be a United States circuit or district judge."

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I withdraw that amendment. As the commission will now have simply to do with the investigation of safety appliances, there is no occasion for it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

The Chair is informed that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] gave notice of an amendment.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I do not care to press the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I find it will be necessary in section 6 to make certain amendments, and I propose the following:

The commission shall, as soon as practicable, submit a full report to the President, who shall immediately transmit the same—

And so forth; to take the place of the wording which included the investigation of the S–4.

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection to that. I think it is a proper amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

THE MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to propose a unanimous-consent agreement. I find that it will be impossible for us to get a final vote on the shipping bill to-day; so I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it recess until Monday, and that after 3 o'clock on Monday no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than five minutes on the unfinished business.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I shall have to object to that. I told the Senator from Washington that I intended to offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. JONES. This will not prevent the Senator from doing that.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, are amendments in order now?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business will come before the Senate at 2 o'clock. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. BRUCE. I object to the request which has been made. I am very sorry to do it, because I should be very glad to see this bill come to a vote; but I have an amendment I want to offer to the bill, and I desire to have an opportunity to discuss it. There will be no opportunity to discuss the amendment under the arrangement that is proposed.

Mr. JONES. If the morning business is concluded, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate may resume the consideration of the shipping bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 744) to further develop an American merchant marine, to assure its permanence in the transportation of the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, line 9, after the word "authorized," it is proposed to insert a colon and the following:

Provided, That all subordinate officers and positions under the United States Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation of a clerical or ministerial nature, other than the position of seaman or other positions calling for the performance of purely manual or menial duties, shall be subject to the Federal laws relating to the Federal classified service and reclassification.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, would the Senator object now to the agreement I proposed?

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has asked me to yield for half an hour. He desires to express himself regarding the general merits of the bill. I have said to the Senator, of course, that I am willing to yield. Then I want an opportunity to say just a few words—not very much on the amendment.

Mr. JONES. Of course, the Senator will have all afternoon under this proposed agreement.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, what is the hour fixed?

Mr. JONES. The hour fixed is 3 o'clock on Monday. We will run just as late this afternoon as Senators desire to run.

Mr. TYSON. Will the Senator make that 4 o'clock?

Mr. JONES. Yes; I will make it 4 o'clock.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I regret that I shall be obliged to object to fixing the hour.

Mr. JONES. We will continue in session to-morrow, then.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, let us try to get together on the matter. Is the Senator going to object to it?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, it is an unfortunate thing that a question fraught with such potential possibilities to the Nation should receive such scant attention as apparently this measure has thus far received from this body.

There is nothing, sir, that means more to the future of the Republic, to the prosperity of the people of this Nation, and generally to the perpetuity of our institutions than sea power; and the necessity for that sea power in a nation which has reached preeminence in commerce upon the sea is demonstrated by the history of every country on the face of the earth that has ever risen to greatness at all.

If you will read the stories of the countries that have written themselves large upon the annals of time you will find that the greatness of nations kept pace with their power upon the sea, and that whenever there was a decadence of that sea power there was a similar decadence of the nation itself.

I have listened, sir, to nearly every speaker upon this subject as he stated his views upon Government operation and ownership. I have heard each individual vie with the individual preceding him in decrying and denouncing any effort upon the part of government to enter into any enterprise or any activity or any undertaking whatever.

It is not the time, to-day, sir, to discuss either the merits or the demerits of Government ownership. It is not, sir, it seems to me, an appropriate time, under the conditions that confront us in respect to our shipping, to indulge in either denunciation on the one hand of Government activity in business or in eulogiums upon the other.

I can not refrain, however, in passing, from remarking that there are some activities of government that are so national in their character, there are some things so requisite to be done in behalf of a people, that only the Government can undertake them, and only the Government can carry them through.

A flood such as has existed upon the Mississippi River in the past months is no undertaking for private initiative or a particular locality. It is a national calamity that the Nation itself should remedy.

On the Colorado River an improvement designed to rescue particular communities from danger from flood and to develop a great waterway of the Nation becomes a national undertaking, when only the Nation itself can transmute what is now a national menace into a future national asset.

I do not quarrel with my conservative brethren from New England when they ask us to purchase the Cape Cod Canal; but I can not refrain, sir, from a smile, perhaps of cynicism, when these same gentlemen acknowledge that New England is without the ability and her citizens without the efficiency to carry on what was an individual and a private enterprise and ask the United States Government to purchase it and operate it as a national undertaking.

Sir, you may talk, and all these gentlemen may talk, until all of us are hoarse about the Government's inability to transact business or to undertake anything in behalf of its people. It is an indictment of our kind of government itself that these gentlemen speak and these gentlemen write.

A year or so ago I went down through the Caribbean to a place where one of the greatest businesses on the face of the earth is being conducted, the Panama Canal; and that business, sir—for it is a business, among the greatest that exist on earth—is managed, operated, maintained, and conducted by the United States of America.

The little boat with which we came into port required certain repairs. It was taken to a dry dock there at Panama for those repairs to be made—taken to a dry dock that is the greatest dry dock that exists in all the world; and it is operated, maintained, managed, owned, and conducted by the United States of America.

I went to a store in Colon, a store where the kind and variety of goods beggar description, and where the prices were less than the prices in the city of Washington, and I bought at that store the things that were required upon our journey; and that store, sir, was operated, maintained, conducted, and owned by the United States of America.

I stopped at a hotel there; and my friend from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] doubtless is familiar with that hotel. It is an excellent one; a hotel maintained, operated, managed, conducted, and owned by the United States Government.

And so it was during all the period that we passed from one ocean to the other—the Government of the United States owning, operating, maintaining, and conducting every activity there—and I never felt prouder of the Government of the United States than in that journey through the Panama Canal, when I saw the kind of Americans that had gone down there and done the job, and done it well.

Our conservative friends from New England who inveigh against Government operation and Government ownership will concede, undoubtedly, what I say in this regard. There is an instance, were I endeavoring to argue governmental ownership or governmental operation of one of the greatest businesses on the face of the earth conducted better than private initiative and private endeavor ever could or would have conducted that business, conducted by the Government of the United States.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. Surely the Senator will remember that the great enterprise to which he refers, the Panama Canal, is, by the very nature of the case, a monopoly. There is no competition. The Government can do it in the most expensive manner that it desires; it can charge the rates that it pleases; it can conduct the business without interfering with any private party, because there is no competition possible. That is an entirely different case from the one we have before us.

Mr. JOHNSON. What of it? That does not answer the animadversions in which the Senator has indulged on Government ownership. Is that the case with the Cape Cod Canal in Massachusetts? There the enterprise was in private control, owned privately, and conducted by private individuals. They failed, and when they failed, then the Government of the United States was asked to purchase the failing enterprise and conduct it as a governmental enterprise. So it makes no difference that the Panama Canal may constitute a monopoly. The fact is that it is being conducted efficiently and well. That is the point, not whether or not there is another canal, or whether there could be another canal, but the Government itself is conducting there a great business enterprise, conducting it efficiently, and conducting it in every respect well.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. I agree with the Senator that if it were possible to create a similar monopoly in the shipping world, so that no other countries in the world could operate ships, and that we might have the monopoly of carrying the shipping into all parts of the world, their freight and our freight, without any more competition than the Panama Canal meets, the Government might well engage in it. But this is an entirely different enterprise the Senator is suggesting. Of course, if he can not see the difference, nothing I could say could show it to him.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not want to indulge in invidious remarks in answer to the last statement made by the Senator from Connecticut. I would not say, of course, that it would be utterly impossible for him to put understandingly or intelligently a proposition—that would be absurd—any more than I would expect him to say that it was impossible for me to understand his sometimes well-chosen English and his present ill-chosen English.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATERMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator from Connecticut continues to hold that the fact of monopoly settles the question of whether or not Government operation or private operation can be successful, then the Senator from Connecticut must believe that the Government of the United States, or the District of Columbia, should own the street cars in Washington, should own the gas company in Washington, should supply the people of Washington with electric light. I think those of us who believe in Government ownership of such utilities can congratulate ourselves that we have a great and able recruit.

Mr. JOHNSON. I so understand what he says, but I understand, too, that if he had the power he would turn the Panama Canal over to private initiative and private endeavor.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. HOWELL. The distinguished Senator from Connecticut does not make that distinction at all, that it must be a monopoly. The Cape Cod Canal, which he supported, was not a monopoly. Ships could go out around Cape Cod.

Mr. JOHNSON. I beg to call to the attention of the Senator from Nebraska that that is a different proposition, because the question of Government ownership depends, when you want to sell something that is in private ownership, upon whose ox is gored. That is all.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Cape Cod Canal was not a monopoly; it was a failure.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is the reason the United States bought it from private initiative and private endeavor, because it was a failure.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I suggest, in further reply to the point raised by the Senator from Connecticut, that the Panama Railroad & Steamship Line is not a monopoly. That is successfully conducted by the Government and stands on the same basis the Senator has mentioned with reference to the canal. It is a success under Government ownership and operation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, if the Senator from California will yield, apropos of what the Senator is saying, I would like to quote from the message of the Governor of Massachusetts, delivered this very month. The Senator knows, possibly, that the Boston Elevated Railroad is under public control. I quote from the Boston Globe what Governor Fuller says in his message:

> Mr. Fuller states the situation by saying that "public control has brought this road up from apparent bankruptcy to good condition and service." He observes that at the beginning of public control the common stock was quoted at $50 a share but has increased in value to $95 a share. "Therefore," he says, "it would appear that during the 10 years of public control the common stock has practically doubled in price. If this company were returned to private control, then there would be returned to the common-stock holders equity worth twice what it was 10 years ago."

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator from Massachusetts tell me what road that is to which he refers?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Boston Elevated Railroad, which owns the street transportation lines in the great metropolitan district of Boston. The State government, when the company was in financial difficulties, stepped in and took over public control 10 years ago.

Mr. JOHNSON. Has the Senator from Massachusetts read from an official utterance in Massachusetts?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have read from the governor of the State, what he himself says about public control.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, treason!

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I want to ask the Senator from California if the Panama Canal has not been a success financially, as well as from the point of view of service?

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, indeed, that is admitted. It is a success financially and a success in its management and its control, a success in every fashion in its efficiency.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. May I be permitted to remark that, judging by the number of people who have jumped to their feet in the last two minutes, apparently a great many people had their ox gored?

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the Senator mean by the Cape Cod Canal? I am afraid it was not a great many people who had their ox gored by the Cape Cod Canal; it was only the Treasury of the United States, Mr. President.

So we will pass the Cape Cod Canal. I have no desire to make invidious remarks concerning that. Indeed, I did not start out with a design or a desire to discuss Government ownership or operation in any aspect. In passing I remarked concerning the Panama Canal, because it seemed to me one great instance where Government activity might be recognized.

It seems to me that every individual who has any idea of economics would not wish to take the Government into every kind of activity or every kind of business; but, as I said in the beginning, I say now in the close upon this subject, there are certain things the Government must do or they are not done, and one of the things that it is obvious, from the history of shipbuilding in the United States and from the story of its merchant marine, that the Government must do, because private initiative and private endeavor has not, will not, and can not do it—one of the things that the Government finally must do if we wish a merchant marine is to take charge of that merchant marine, build it, and maintain it, and see that the people of the United States have a merchant marine. The story of our shipbuilding, the story of our merchant marine, the whole story of our sea power, demonstrate that beyond a peradventure of a doubt.

I was not greatly concerned yesterday in the contest that was here as to whether four members of the Shipping Board or five members of the Shipping Board or seven members of the Shipping Board should determine whether or not ships should be sold. I feel that if there is one in power, one in power who is able to make his policies felt and to enforce those policies, it does not make any difference what individuals on a subordinate board may desire to do. The man in power, if he is fit to wield the power at all, will see that his subordinate board and its subordinate members carry out the policy that is his.

I am not out of sympathy with an idea of that sort either. Six years I presided over the destinies of a great State. I understood what power meant there. We were carrying into effect new policies in that State. If any man who was a subordinate official, if an individual under the head of the government declined to carry out what was the policy of the government, then it seemed to me it was the duty of the disagreeing official to step from his position and permit the policies of him who was at the head and who took the responsibility to be carried out.

So it does not seem to me to be of any consequence whether four members on a board or five or seven are written in a bill as necessary for a particular purpose. A man who sits above them and appoints them can tell them what to do, and I assume, if he has policies and if he seeks to carry out real governmental policies, he will not only tell them what to do but he will see that they do it and carry out his definite policies, too, or the individual will not longer remain in his official position. So much, sir, for the amendment that was offered to the bill.

I want for a moment or two now to demonstrate the necessity which exists in this land for a merchant marine. Ours is a peculiar nation to-day, sir.

Ours is a producing nation. The cycle of development through which we have just passed has been principally internal, but our huge resources have given us a productive capacity almost beyond belief and far in excess of our own power to consume. This surplus must be marketed abroad if our general prosperity and our standards of living are to be maintained, and only thus disposing of our production can we avoid privation and hardships to great masses of our people. The desideratum can be accomplished in but one fashion; that is, with a due measure of sea power. By sea power I mean a sufficient merchant marine and an adequate Navy. Neither can exist separately. They are mutually dependent. They are the two cardinal elements which when combined are the sea power which every producing nation must have to be prosperous and stable. We must have first a merchant marine to carry our goods abroad, and we must next have a Navy to conserve, preserve, and protect that merchant marine. The merchant marine is as essential a part of our transportation system as are the railroads. To stop the ships would be equivalent to interrupting railroad traffic. To depend absolutely upon our trade competitors for the carriage of our goods would be like a merchant intrusting to his commercial rival and competitor the distribution of his wares. We need a merchant marine for the thousands of miles of internal sea travel now utilized between the various sections of our country. We need it because our unrivaled resources have, with an unparalleled genius and capacity for production, gone far beyond our ability to consume. We need it because exporting our surplus products is essential to maintain our standards of living and prosperity. We need it because we must of necessity import large quantities of essential products from overseas. We need it because the United States is at the center of the maritime world, with a position unequaled for the carrying trade to the great continents of Europe, Asia, and Africa. We need a merchant marine, lastly, because American commerce requires it and American national defense demands it. It does not make any difference whether you believe in a privately owned merchant marine or a Government owned merchant marine. Either is preferable to none. If we have not or can not have a privately owned merchant marine, then the Government of the United States must provide one.

The story of our ships and of our merchant marine proves that we can not have a privately owned merchant marine, and we are driven perforce to the other conclusion, no matter what the economic view may be, that the Government must therefore provide one. We have tried to build up for many, many years a privately owned merchant marine. We failed, signally failed, in all those years. Our policy of procrastination and vacillation has brought us perilously near to no merchant marine at all, and if we persist in argument, and if we continue this policy of procrastination and vacillation, within a very brief period Old Glory will be gone from the seas. There is no question of that and none to deny it. None can gainsay it. Down, down, down in the scale have we gone until under the estimates presented 14 years only will elapse until the American flag no longer floats upon the seas.

Now, sir, there never was a time in the history of this land when a merchant marine was so essential as at the present time. We have changed, sir, in this country in the last eight years. We have changed as an international trade competitor in the last eight years. Our position during that period has been transmuted from one far, far behind in maritime commerce into that of one who holds the proud position of being practically in the lead to-day of all the nations of the earth.

Since the Great War the United States has become the keenest international trade competitor in all the world. This has its compensations in the extended commerce of the Nation, the greater prosperity of our people, and in enhancing the general welfare. It has its dangers because success is ever the target for envy, and successful national commerce has always aroused hatred. In speaking thus I do not imply that either the rivalry, the envy, or the hatred of other nations because of our commercial success would lead to war. Indeed, America's intentions are so pacific, our policies are so utterly lacking in aggression, that it seems inconceivable the pursuit of legitimate commercial paths even to the exclusion of trade rivals could ever give such offense as would lead to armed conflict. But if our present preeminent position in trade and commerce is worth having it is worth safeguarding and protecting, and it is a lamentable historical fact, written red in the annals of time, that one of the greatest contributing causes of war has been trade rivalry.

Only recently have we reached our high position in the world's commerce. Until the World War Great Britain exceeded us by 50 per cent.

I take Great Britain for comparison because Britannia has ruled the waves for the centuries past. It is only to-day, in the long centuries of progress, that Britannia's rule upon the sea is challenged, and is challenged, sir, by this our country, the United States of America. So my comparisons, sir, are with Great Britain—Great Britain, which has had its trade supremacy in all the times with which we are familiar and during all the periods of commercial history.

Until the World War Great Britain exceeded us by 50 per cent. To-day we are practically equal. To-morrow the United States will lead. The statistics of trade show that in the first quarter of 1927 Great Britain lost in trade with China 17 per cent. The United States gained 12 per cent. In the previous two years Great Britain's trade with Australia has remained practically the same, while the trade of the United States had doubled. With Japan in this time British trade declined 10,000,000 yen, while ours gained by 150,000,000. During the same two years with India British trade dropped 10 per cent and American trade went up 10 per cent. South America is rapidly approaching the importance of the Far East as an outlet for the manufactured goods of the industrialized nations and here we find the United States making substantial encroachments upon British trade. With Argentine and Chile the British and American imports have increased about equally, but throughout all the enormous territory to the north the trend is very much like that in the Orient. Brazil will suffice as an illustration. In 1922 British imports were leading ours in a ratio of 4 to 3. By 1924 the United States imports had gone beyond those of Britain.

In western Europe, at the very door of England, we find her exports to Germany declined 10 per cent during the last two years prior to 1927, while American exports to that country nearly doubled. The same general trend with respect to Italy, France, and Spain is evidenced by the official statistics though in less degree than in the case of Germany. So it is also with Belgium, Sweden, Bulgaria, Egypt, and many of the lesser markets of the world. We have wrested the dominant rôle of world trader from Great Britain. Commercial supremacy is ours. The price of the maintenance of this commercial supremacy is eternal vigilance. Great Britain learned the lesson and in the centuries past Great Britain made her Government the guardian of her merchant marine and her navy its protector.

If we followed what happened at Geneva only last year, we will recall that there came echoing down the centuries the British idea of supremacy upon the sea and the necessity of a merchant marine and its dependence, for national defense and for supremacy upon the seas, upon a merchant marine. One of the points of difference at Geneva, it will be recalled, was the arming with certain types of guns of the merchant marine insisted upon by Great Britain and denied by American representatives.

In our day we have seen, in 1922 at the Washington Disarmament Conference and in 1927 at the fiasco of Geneva, British statesmen with an eye single to supremacy upon the sea. The long story of Great Britain's struggle and rise and final success, her proud boast that Britannia rules the waves thrill us with admiration for the patriotism, the statesmanship, and the vision of our English brethren. They understood as no other race has so thoroughly understood, and what we in our newness and with our multifarious diversions must learn, that sea power and the rise and fall of nations are closely linked. Progressively through the centuries they have gone together. In turn Phœnicia, Carthage, Greece, and Rome ruled the Mediterranean. Venice, Florence, and Genoa went farther afield and into the Baltic and Atlantic. The Hanseatic states with unparalleled industry struggled for commercial supremacy in the far North, and finally in world trade the cities of the Mediterranean were compelled to yield to London, Amsterdam, and Hamburg.

Trade rivalry brought on great wars of nations and in nearly every instance supremacy of the sea was the deciding factor. When the Dutch, through their natural instinct, acquired maritime dominance the challenge came from England and England's Navy took from the Dutch the commercial supremacy they had with such difficulty won. Spain rose to her great power and for a brief period her fleets controlled the water, sailed in undisputed rivalry the Spanish Main, and her galleons carried the commerce of both the New and the Old World. But England's fleets in bloody battle swept Spain from the sea, and naval defeats marked the decadence of Spain as a dominant factor on the oceans. The commercial history of the eighteenth century is written in the long-drawn struggle for supremacy between England and France. Commercial rivalry was the basis for the many and protracted wars of that period, and at their close England's sea power had relegated France to a secondary position.

Sir, dominance upon the sea has ever led to victory for the nation that held that supremacy. It was not really at Zama that Hannibal was defeated. Hannibal was defeated when Rome's dominance upon the sea forced him to make that long and perilous march through Gaul that wasted his strength and destroyed a large part of his force.

We are accustomed to think that Napoleon was vanquished at Waterloo. He was vanquished not at Waterloo. The downfall of Napoleon came at Trafalgar, and it came because England was supreme upon the sea. History teaches us what, under circumstances such as confront this Nation to-day, it is the duty of the United States to do. Here we have, for the first time in the story of this land, trade supremacy. Here we have to-day, sir, upon the sea a maritime dominance that the United States has never before possessed. We have wrested it from the tight little isle which for three centuries past has boasted of her supremacy upon the oceans that covered the earth, and to-day, with this supremacy that is ours, comes to us the warning that is written in the history of all time that we must protect, preserve, conserve, and maintain our sea power, or woe be unto this Nation in the days to come.

If we have to any advantage studied history, if we have followed the rise of nations and their fall, the oft-repeated tale holds its lesson and its warning. Willfully deaf to every dictate of prudence is the American who prizes our present proud commercial position and will not understand that it can only be maintained by an American merchant marine and an American Navy sufficient for its protection.

So what is the situation? As we have gone up by leaps and bounds in our commercial enterprise, as we have reached a proud position of dominance in foreign trade, what is the position of our sea power? Proportionally as we have gone up with our trade we have gone down with our merchant marine. In 1830 American vessels carried 90 per cent of the commerce of this country. Small it was and without difficulty moved then doubtless. In 1910, however, American vessels were carrying only 9 per cent.

I was here, sir, during the progress of the World War. When a Senator upon this floor during that period had nothing else to say he would rise and repeat the words of Lloyd George that had come to us 3,000 miles across the sea; he would shout to the very strength of his lungs, "Ships! Ships! and more ships!" I can recall the time when so unprepared were we, and when our merchant marine had sunk to so low an ebb that it seemed impossible that we could move the goods that were ours, when there was stagnation in every harbor in this land, and when we were threatened constantly and continuously by the horrors of an inability of communication and transportation. I recall that time and I remember that because we had no merchant marine we started feverishly to build, and we expended over $3,000,000,000 in the endeavor to build ships during the period of the war, a wasteful and extravagant expenditure that could only be justified by emergency and national peril.

We were required to spend that tremendous amount, we indulged in that frightful extravagance solely because we had not had the wisdom or the vision or the statesmanship or the courage to have a merchant marine of the United States of America, or to be prepared for the emergency that was then presented to us. We expended $3,000,000,000 and more; and these good, conservative Senators from New England say to us, "There is waste and extravagance, and it shows what the Government will do," and they use it as a reason why the Government should not prepare and provide for a merchant marine in the future. Wasteful and extravagant expenditure under stress is the very best reason why when the stress does not exist we should prepare in every possible way to prevent a recurrence of that waste and that extravagance.

Sir, in 1920, after the shipbuilding of the war, the American flag floated on ships carrying 43 per cent of our commerce. In 1924 the figure dropped to 34 per cent, and in 1926 it stood at 32 per cent. It is still decreasing, and at the present rate of decline a very few years will see in our foreign-trade shipping our flag disappear from the sea.

While our maritime trade has increased, and is passing that of every other nation, our ability to carry it is progressively decreasing, and the time may come when we can not safely rely upon other nations to carry our goods and expand our trade. Of course, such a time will come. No man can foresee it, none can tell the number of years that will elapse until it does arrive; but that it will arrive history demonstrates conclusively. When that time arrives, if in our ineptitude and sloth we have idly accepted the present precarious situation, disaster, hardship, and suffering will be our portion.

The argument for a merchant marine generally rests upon two premises: First, its necessity as a complement to the Navy and for ultimate national defense; and, secondly, the dependence of the Nation's economic welfare upon foreign commerce. Those are ample and incontrovertible reasons, but there is another equally cogent and of like importance. Few realize the extent of our so-called coastwise traffic, its essential ocean-going character, and the dependence upon it of many major industries. This coastwise traffic is, in fact, internal domestic trade, yet it follows external overseas routes and is necessarily carried in ocean-going vessels. There is nothing comparable in all the world to this coastwise traffic of the United States of America, except the overseas trade between the various parts of the British Empire. Upon this overseas trade, as Senators who followed Geneva conference will realize, the British ground their argument for naval supremacy; but the distances of British sea lanes are not greater than the distances of our coastwise sea trade, and the value of this coastwise trade of ours is more than half the value of Britain's total foreign trade.

Senators who are familiar at all with statistics of the past who understand that for centuries and more Britain has been the great carrying nation upon the ocean, and that in all that time there has been no challenge of her supremacy, will realize what the value of the coastwise traffic of the United States is when they understand that it is six-tenths of the value of the entire vaunted maritime trade of the British Empire. That is one of the reasons and one of the necessities for an American merchant marine.

When they recall, too, that our extensive pipe lines generally lead to the coast; that our great oil refineries are within easy access to deep salt water, and that our great oil industry depends upon ocean transport, and that this dependence will become greater as domestic sources are reduced, they will have a greater and a better understanding of this coastwise traffic of ours.

We know the sea route via Panama as the cheap transportation link, without which our lumber, coal, and other industries would suffer and languish. Few Americans have any true appreciation of the extraordinary value of our domestic seaboard commerce or its potent influence upon many of our great industries. Blocking this commerce would dislocate the country's entire business and bring hard times beyond anything in the Nation's experience.

Mr. President, I have shown how as our trade has increased upon the ocean our shipping has decreased. What an absurd thing you would think it to be if a great department store in the city of Washington continuously distributed its goods through its rivals' conveyances, and yet we, with the great sea trade that is ours to-day, are distributing our goods all over the world through the medium of the transportation agencies of our trade rivals. This, of course, indefinitely can not go on.

Sir, during this period of halcyon private initiative in shipbuilding, to which my distinguished friend from Connecticut would cling under all hazards; during the last 10 years, when private enterprise has built so many ships and carried so much commerce under the American flag upon the oceans that the American flag to-day is in danger of disappearing from the seas entirely, let us see just what ships have been built and just what tonnage is ours. I hold in my hand the report of Lloyd's showing the rise of world shipping and giving the statistics for 1927. I will not attempt to read all of these statistics. Some of them have already been put into the RECORD; but the report of Lloyd's for the last year, I believe, is of sufficient importance to be added as an addendum to my remarks, and I ask permission to print in the RECORD this report of Lloyd's upon the building of ships by various nations during the year 1927.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The matter referred to is as follows:

LLOYD'S SHOWS RISE OF WORLD SHIPPING—BUILDING UNDER WAY ON DECEMBER 31 NEARLY 1,200,000 TONS MORE THAN A YEAR AGO—TOTAL IS 3,118,000 TONS—APPROACHES THE 3,162,000 MARK OF JUNE 30, 1914—UNITED STATES OUTPUT FALLS

The lagging of the United States in the shipbuilding field was further emphasized yesterday when Lloyd's Register of Shipping declared in its quarterly report that world shipbuilding under way at the start of 1928 was nearly 1,200,000 gross tons greater than that at the close of December, 1926. This closely followed a survey of 51 of the principal American shipyards, which disclosed that work at hand was 45 per cent less than on December 31, 1926. The Lloyd's report is based on figures compiled from all maritime nations for the quarter ending December 31, 1927.

The total reported for the world is 3,118,000 gross tons, an increase of 44,000 gross tons over the preceding quarter and 278,000 gross tons over the quarter ending in June. Compared with the work under construction at the end of December, 1926, the present world total represents a gain of nearly 1,200,000 gross tons and is not far behind the pre-war quarter of June 30, 1914, of 3,162,000 tons.

Great Britain and Ireland lead with a total of 1,579,713 tons. The United States has 97,370 tons. On September 30 the United States reported 91,070 tons under construction and Great Britain and Ireland 1,536,416 tons. Construction increases were also reported for the quarter for Holland, Denmark, Sweden, Russia, and Japan. Sweden is now building more than the United States. Germany showed a drop of 44,000 tons since September. Great Britain and Ireland are building more tonnage than all the other maritime countries combined, according to Lloyd's figures.

The only changes of ranking among the countries were the movement of Sweden, with 100,700 tons, from eighth to sixth place, the drop of Denmark from sixth to seventh, and the United States from seventh to eighth.

Although 823,482 gross tons of merchant steamers and motorships were launched throughout the world, compared with 526,157 tons launched in the previous quarter, only 625,692 tons of new work was begun in these departments, against 760,930 tons in the September quarter. A decrease was shown in world construction of tankers, caused by a drop in Great Britain and Ireland, the figure for the quarter being 744,668 tons as against 775,632 tons in the previous quarter. Despite the drop, tanker tonnage constructed was more than double the 371,520 tons reported for the corresponding period a year ago.

An increase of only 20,000 tons over the construction of motorship tonnage was shown for the quarter, compared with September, but the total of 1,609,888 gross tons represented an increase of more than 700,000 tons over the total a year ago. Of the December total 652,894 tons were for Great Britain and Ireland, 244,309 tons for Germany, and 712,685 tons for all other countries combined.

Summing up the world ship construction situation, Lloyd's Register says that the tonnage of Great Britain and Ireland, Germany, Denmark, and Sweden more than doubled in 1927, while Holland, Russia, and Japan made lesser gains. The United States, Italy, and France are building less than a year ago. Their relative positions and totals follow:

	Dec. 31, 1927	Dec. 31, 1926
Britain and Ireland	1,579,713	760,084
Germany	472,295	211,062
Italy	183,216	239,776
Holland	174,887	145,005
France	115,029	143,068
Sweden	100,700	39,127
Denmark	97,710	41,142
United States	97,370	151,635
Russia	87,658	54,420
Japan	68,870	43,060

Mr. JOHNSON. Let me merely for purposes of comparison say that up to December 31, 1927, Great Britain and Ireland built 1,579,713 of tonnage, the United States 97,000 of tonnage, and that the United States was exceeded in shipbuilding during 1927 by Denmark, Sweden, France, Holland, Italy, Germany, and Great Britain. During the last few years, from 1922 to 1927, covering ships of 2,000 gross tons and over for transoceanic service, we find that Britain built 882 ships of 4,905,000 gross tons; Germany built 192 ships of 1,118,000 gross tons; France built 104 ships of 630,000 gross tons; Italy built 87 ships of 711,000 gross tons; Japan built 75 ships of 333,000 gross tons; and the United States during this period, when we were dependent upon private initiative and individual ownership and when we were eschewing anything on the part of the Government at all except the sale of the ships that belonged to the Government—during this period the United States built 18 ships of 195,000 gross tons.

The figures show that Great Britain outbuilt us 45 to 1, Germany 10 to 1, France 5 to 1, Italy 5 to 1, Japan 4 to 1; and then it is instructive and interesting to those of us who have been engaged somewhat in delving into the facts of the debts that are due us from countries abroad to observe not only how the economic conditions affect these countries that are unable to pay us, but what they are doing in regard to their navies. Here are the naval vessels laid down or appropriated for, built, and building as of March 31, 1927, mark it, in these countries that are unable—and we have heard it upon this floor again and again—to pay the debts that they owe the United States of America.

Japan has built 101 ships.

France has built 96 ships.

Italy has built 46 ships.

The British Empire has built 37 ships.

The United States, the creditor nation, has built 19 ships.

I desire, sir, this list of the construction, both in private shipbuilding and in naval vessels, to be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATERMAN in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Shipbuilding activities of the principal maritime nations from 1922 to 1927, covering ships of 2,000 gross tons and over, for transoceanic service have resulted in—

Country	Number of ships	Gross tons
Great Britain	882	4,905,853
Germany	192	1,118,635
France	104	630,613
Italy	87	711,499
Japan	75	333,327
United States	18	195,191
Total	1,298	7,895,118

Naval vessels laid down or appropriated for, built and building, as of March 31, 1927

Country	Number of vessels	Displacement, tons
Japan	101	339,201
France	96	221,828
Italy	46	102,207
British Empire	37	285,795
United States	19	150,909
Total	299	1,099,940

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I recognize one thing in to-day's realties. I have lived long enough, sir; I have seen enough, I think, of public life, never to hesitate to face realities nor to blink just what is transpiring.

I recognize to-day, sir, that the fundamental philosophy of government in this land, in a greater degree than has ever before occurred in the history of any nation, is business. Because I recognize that the fundamental philosophy to-day of my country is business, I appeal to the men in the Senate who believe that materialism always is the sole concern of government; I appeal to them even upon that ground. Forget if you will, sir, the years that are to pass. Forget if you will, sir, the future and the perpetuity of a Nation such as ours. Ground your philosophy if you desire solely upon business and profits. After all, business and trade are at stake in the merchant marine. Your business upon the sea and your commercial supremacy are involved. If your philosophy of government be just business and making money; if the only thing that we can prate about, either in a presidential election or at any other time, is prosperity; if, sir, the one thing that engages statesmanship to-day is materialism; then, sir, that materialism is at stake in the merchant marine just exactly as at stake there is to me the broader and the finer things of a free people.

Ah, if you forget to maintain this sea power of ours; if you forget, sir, to conserve it with your ships to carry your commerce and your Navy to protect it, then, sir, you may look for the time in the future when, with the decadence of the sea power of America, all that America means and stands for is imperiled.

From the material standpoint I appeal to those who believe government's chief concern is business and trade. If you believe in the wider aspect in the finer and more beautiful philosophy of government, sir; if you look to the dim future, and with the lessons of history before you, and pray that our country may go forward to its glorious destiny, you will write into law what is essential for an adequate merchant marine.

I plead to-day, sir, not only for trade and prosperity—trade and prosperity are at stake in this question—but I plead, sir, for the perpetuity of the ideals of this land. I plead, sir, for that power upon the sea that will enable us to maintain in all the years to come the supremacy American grit and courage and enterprise have won.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I have before me the United States Daily of January 26, in which is printed an address delivered by General Pershing on January 25 before the Chamber of Commerce of Kansas City, Mo. While the whole address is very admirable, I should like to have inserted in the RECORD that part of it which refers particularly to the merchant marine. I have indicated it here; and I think that portion of the address quite supports the view of the Senator from California.

I ask to have it inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATERMAN in the chair). Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The time will soon come when the contemplated waterways and the railways combined will have to be fully utilized to meet the demands. Since the barge lines up the Mississippi to St. Louis, established during the World War, are now paying their own way and saving the shippers millions of dollars annually, there seems to be no reason for further delay on the part of the Government in undertaking the improvements up the Missouri for the benefit of shippers from the territory tributary to this city.

To provide adequate and economical facilities for carrying the products of the country to the seaboard is not all. We can not stop there and await the convenience of the foreign carrier to take our wheat, corn, cotton, oil, and machinery to market for us. We can not rationally leave ourselves at his mercy, as we have unwisely done in the past, when at times, especially during the World War, cargo after cargo has been left to decay on our docks awaiting shipping that never came.

If we depend upon the national shipping of our competitor, even when available, to deliver our goods, we can not successfully compete, because of the excessive rates we must pay as compared with the favorable rates given to our competitor. The only guaranty of equal treatment is to provide shipping owned by our own people—shipping that sails under the American flag.

It will be recalled that during the war, because our merchant marine had practically disappeared from the seas, we were left almost in despair, and our armies for lack of sea transportation were all but fatally delayed in arriving on the western front. Only fear, self-interest, and vital necessity compelled the Allies to provide the additional shipping necessary to transport abroad the 2,000,000 Americans who barely arrived in time to prevent allied defeat. I would earnestly implore our people not to forget that lesson.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I have listened with the greatest interest, as I always do, to the splendid oratory and well-chosen periods of my distinguished friend, the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. I agree with him in what he says about the importance of the merchant marine. Of course, he and I do not agree about government in business. He believes that the Government, because it does conduct the business of the Panama Canal ably, and does conduct various other enterprises ably, as no one will deny, should also go into the business of competing with the shipping interests of this country and the world. He gives as his reason for that fact that it is the only way we can get a merchant marine.

Mr. President, I hope the Senator will pardon me for wishing that he and his friends who are so anxious to get a merchant marine, and who appreciate so fully the importance and the necessity of a merchant marine, would devote their splendid efforts and their magnificent oratory and their unanswerable arguments in regard to its importance to securing some kind of aid which would permit our citizens to engage in this business, and would give them a chance to compete on terms of equality with the other nations of the world.

The Senator has told us how many more ships the other nations of the world have built within the last few years than we have. Those figures have been put into the RECORD once or twice recently, and there is no answer to them. We all know that under the present conditions it is extremely difficult to persuade American capital and American business to go into a proposition in which, if they compete without any form of Government aid, means financial loss to them.

Because the Senator from California and his friends have been unable to secure any recognition of the sound business policy followed by Great Britain and other nations in building up their merchant marine, and to secure the adoption of similar practices here, he wishes us to go into the business of building, operating, and conducting the shipping industry.

Personally, as I have said before, I wish the Senator would devote his powerful arguments to endeavoring to convert those who seem to fear anything which may come under the word "subsidy," not as it is in the dictionary, but as it was suggested by the Senator from North Carolina the other day—the political meaning and political aspects of the word "subsidy."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand the policy of the Senator from Connecticut, as he would incorporate it, if he could, into a policy for a merchant marine, it would be that of a subsidy.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator knows that when he uses that word it covers a multitude of sins, like many words that one might suggest.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator means a multitude of virtues.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am glad the Senator puts that construction upon it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not want the Senator to get into the RECORD with such an error as saying that subsidy was a multitude of sins. I knew he meant a multitude of virtues, so I was aiding him.

Mr. BINGHAM. Unfortunately, other people think it covers a multitude of sins as well.

Mr. BORAH. I think the Senator from Connecticut in that respect is correct. We are placed in the position here, as I understand, of either voting for an initial proposition looking to Government ownership or turning to a subsidy. Is not that correct?

Mr. BINGHAM. If the Senator chooses to apply the word "subsidy" to payment for services rendered; if the Senator chooses to apply the word "subsidy" to loaning money at the same rate of interest at which you borrow it.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, I am permitting the Senator to put his own construction upon "subsidy," because I am not seeking to load down that word with any sins that it does not already have, and I will not. The Senator distinguishes, then, between his proposition and a real subsidy?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly. I should say that I would be opposed to the kind of subsidy which would merely give a certain amount of money to any company that was willing to build and operate ships to help them do so. That, I consider, might lead to very grave disorders and to corruption and many unfortunate ends.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to be conceded on all hands that the Government has to take a hand in it in some way. It either has to do the business itself or else it has to aid those who do.

Mr. BINGHAM. If we are to compete with the countries mentioned by the Senator from California in the building and operating of ships, we must render some kind of aid.

Mr. BORAH. If we start with the Senator's proposition, we will also have to repeal some of our laws with regard to the employment of seamen, will we not?

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not think that is necessary. I should hate to see that done, because I believe that our laws in connection with seamen have been drawn up so as to make life on the sea as attractive as it can be made and to furnish proper living quarters, proper food, and so forth.

Mr. BORAH. The difference between the compensation of labor abroad and in this country under those rules would be very great.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is very great with some countries; not so great with other countries.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know of any country with which it is not very great. What country is it?

Mr. BINGHAM. I understood that the cost of operating under the British flag is not so very much less than the cost of operating under the American flag, whereas the cost of operating under the Norwegian flag, I understand, is very considerably less. I am not certain about those things.

Mr. BORAH. I do not mean to indicate that I would want to see the law repealed; but that is one of the matters which create the great difference in the shipping business between the two countries.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am not seeking any such change, I will say to the Senator. What I am seeking is that this country give opportunity to American citizens to go ahead and develop sound business.

The Senator from California in his magnificent phrases has appealed, as he has so often before, against materialism in this country. This is not a question of materialism, after all; it is a question of the development of character. I am one of those who believe that under a paternalistic system character does not develop as well as it does under that system of government founded by the fathers, under the system proposed by Thomas Jefferson.

I believe that it is better for the character of future American citizens that they be given opportunities, opportunities to make mistakes as well as opportunities to succeed, and that they be not looked after too greatly by a paternalistic government.

I believe in giving them such aid in the way of protection against cheap foreign labor as is necessary and such protection as is necessary against the operation of cheap foreign ships. I believe in giving them whatever aid can be given in a proper manner without waste of the public funds, but I do believe that this method now before us is really a form of paternalism, and furthermore, that it will cost the taxpayer far more in the end, as well as costing us the development of character far more in the end, than some other method which might be proposed and which ought to be adopted.

Yesterday the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] asked a question with regard to this company of Americans which would like to build the fastest ships in the world, a picture of one of which is on the wall before us, to be built somewhat after the manner of the recently constructed great aircraft carriers, the Saratoga and the Lexington, which, with airplanes discharged from their decks as they near a port would make it possible to cut the time in two and would reduce the time of the crossing of the Atlantic Ocean from six days to three days.

The Senator from Massachusetts, in regard to this matter, said:

In view of the many obstacles which it is alleged have been resorted to to obstruct the developing of an American merchant marine, some of us are suspicious that these propositions are not now made in good faith, being made at the very time of the discussion here of this important measure and never heard of before. I would like to have the Senator, if he sees fit to make reply, tell us who these individuals are, what their connections are with the shipping business, to what extent we can rely on their present promises? Are they doing this in good faith and to what extent they have been engaged in the shipping business, or is this simply a gesture made here on the eve of the attempt to pass this bill to raise further obstacles and objections to the development of an American merchant marine?

In an effort to answer that question, Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from Massachusetts and others who are interested that the Transoceanic Corporation of the United States, of which Mr. Lawrence Wilder is the head, made a presentation to the Shipping Board on last Tuesday, in the course of which Mr. Wilder said:

This is the proposal of the Transoceanic Corporation of the United States, organized and financed entirely by Americans, to establish a modern ocean transportation system to fly the American flag across the North Atlantic, our most important and essential trade routes.

We look only to such general legislation as will encourage other American capital to follow our lead. We do not ask anything for ourselves alone and we are sure that what we ask is justified by sound business and economic principles.

The investment of private capital of $50,000,000 forms a part of our plan, and we have received assurances from entirely American sources of sufficient financial support to warrant us in making our proposal. This is the first time in more than 50 years that private American capital in any important amount has come forward to advance America's prestige and safety at sea. When our plan is taken up for official consideration, we will lay the details of our financial support before the proper department of the Government.

We submit that the Government will by this loan have at its service six fast, gigantic airplane carriers with crews trained in actual service at sea, for all of which the Government will have expended nothing. The advance of 75 per cent of their construction costs will be repaid with interest. To duplicate such powerful units for its own strictly naval use, the Government would need to appropriate their full cost of construction, and in addition bear the full cost of operation and training. In time of peace, these ships will pay their own way. In time of war, they will be deadly units of our armed forces at sea. Their readiness will cost the taxpayers nothing.

Whereas it is proposed by the measure before us, Mr. President, to authorize the expenditure of more than $150,000,000 of the taxpayers' money. Mr. Wilder said further:

Fast ships have been built and proved practical by the Navy. We ourselves have recently completed in our yard at Camden, N. J., the Navy's newest fighting unit, the airplane carrier Saratoga. She is a pioneer vessel. The research and experience gained in designing and constructing her we now propose to apply to commercial vessels.

Our board of directors is being formed. When constituted the names of its members will be announced. I am able to say, however, at this time that they will be men of national reputation in their respective fields.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I am informed that the following gentlemen reported to the Shipping Board on Tuesday, January 24, concerning this project. I should like now to give the names of these gentlemen. I shall be through in a few moments. I hope the Senator will wait until I get through with the list.

Mr. NEELY. I wish merely to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator can ask all the questions he desires to ask just as soon as I get through with this statement.

The question has been asked—and I am endeavoring to answer it—as to who these gentlemen are who are interested in this project. That is a perfectly fair question. It was put forward by the Senator from Massachusetts in entire good faith. Undoubtedly, had the proposal been for these steamers to run from the port of Boston, he would have heard of it long before. One of the reasons why I heard of it so early was that the proposal was to run from some part of Long Island Sound, either from Montauk Point or from New London, or possibly from Narragansett Bay, at the mouth of Long Island Sound.

The men concerned in this in addition to Mr. Wilder, the president of the company which just built this great airplane carrier, the Saratoga, are as follows:

Clinton L. Bardo, one of the group, was assistant general manager of the New York Central Railroad when the Grand Central Terminal was built and was in charge of the operation of the construction of that magnificent building. He then became general manager of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, a position which he held for 13 years. For 40 years, almost to a day, he was associated with American railroad enterprises. He left the railroads to become vice president of the American Brown Boveri Electric Corporation two years ago.

Prof. Herbert C. Sadler during the war was in charge of the engineering section of the United States Shipping Board. Under his direction was built our remarkable war emergency fleet, one of the most amazing achievements of all the history of shipbuilding in the light of quantity and speed of production. He served the United States Government also as consultant of the Mississippi Board of Army Engineers before the war and as a member of the United States Load Line Commission. He has occupied the chair of marine engineering with the University of Michigan since 1900. He induced the authorities of this university to build for him the only model test basin outside of the Washington Navy Yard and those abroad. With the aid of this advanced technical equipment he was able to perfect the design of our outstanding lake passenger and cargo carriers. Among the ore-carrying cargo steamers is the Kerr, which, with shore equipment of his design, made a record of loading 12,500 tons of ore in 16½ minutes, and at the other end of her run unloaded in 3 hours and 5 minutes. He has aided in the design of the splendid Great Lakes passenger ships which, carrying 1,200 souls per night, unload not only their passengers but 500 or more tons of freight and are ready to make a return voyage with an equal freight and passenger load each day, with a stop in port of eight hours.

It will be appreciated by Senators who are interested in the merchant marine that one of the greatest losses in connection with the merchant marine is the amount of time spent in port. By the association of such men as Professor Sadler with this enterprise we are justified in thinking that the construction of these ships and the way in which they will be built and operated will tend to cut down that loss to a degree to which it has never been cut down before in ocean transportation.

E. H. Rigg was naval architect in charge of the building of the Navy's new airplane carrier Saratoga and is supervising construction of two new 10,000-ton scout cruisers for the Navy. He developed the idea of 1,000-foot ships adopted abroad and not adopted in this country, where the idea developed, in the Leviathan, Majestic, and Berengaria. He is chief naval architect of the New York Shipbuilding Co. yard at Camden, N. J., now owned by the American Brown Boveri Electric Corporation, where the ships of the round-the-world fleet of the Dollar Line and the South American fleet of the Munson Line were built. He is one of the outstanding American naval architects.

Theodore E. Ferris, one of the recognized authorities on naval architecture, was the father of the fabricated ship, making possible the fabrication of completed parts of steel ships in our inland steel fabricating plants and their assembly at the seacoast. Without this our shortage of shipyards at the time of the war would have made the construction of our great emergency fleet utterly impossible.

Dr. Elmer A. Sperry is discoverer of the gyroscope, the gyroscopic compass, founder of the company bearing his name, and the inventor of "Metal Mike," an automatic steering device which controls ships better than a man could do. He is also inventor of the gyro stabilizer. The yacht Savarona, the largest yacht under American registry, recently on her trial trip negotiated a 75-mile per hour hurricane in which this device assured comfort to her passengers. Doctor Sperry is one of the foremost American inventors and engineers.

John F. Metten, formerly vice president and chief engineer of William Cramp & Sons Ship & Engine Co., now president of the Marine Engineering Corporation of Philadelphia, has designed the machinery for many ships for the Navy in his 25 years of connection with this profession. The new Matson liner Malolo, the only passenger and cargo ship built in America for the high seas in the past eight years, is powered with engines of his design. She is noted already for her remarkably low fuel consumption and her ability to withstand shock.

M. W. Torbet is a graduate of the mechanical engineering school, University of Michigan. He has had long experience in the sea operation of destroyers and Coast Guard patrol boats and is a leading authority on marine propulsion. He has specialized with success in the new science of balancing rotating parts. He is now chief engineer of the shipbuilding division of the American Brown Boveri Electric Corporation, Camden, N. J.

J. A. Burkhardt is chief engineer of the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Co., Fore River, Quincy, Mass., and was formerly connected with the Bath Iron Works. In his 20 years of American technical shipbuilding work he has participated in the construction of many destroyers and similar high-speed ships for our Navy.

Homer Ferguson, president of the Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co., needs no introduction.

S. W. Wakeman, vice president and general manager of the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, Fore River plant, is in the same category.

G. W. Middleton, vice president of the Babcock & Wilcox Co., New York City, outstanding American designers and builders of stationary, marine, and Navy boilers.

J. Howland Gardner is a graduate of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. He served on the board of survey and as consulting engineer for the Shipping Board in 1917, which board was charged with the repairing and reconditioning of the interned German ships and with operation of them through the war zone. From April to August these ships made 100 crossings. He is now vice president of the New England Steamship Co., with vessels making round trips between New York and various ports on Long Island Sound in 48 hours, handling more passengers and freight than are accommodated by any line in the North Atlantic service.

I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will be satisfied that men of high caliber and broad experience are connected with this company.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will say to the Senator that I have no facts to contradict the Senator's assertion.

Mr. BINGHAM. Another man connected with the company is Thomas H. Rossbottom, for 35 years in the employ of the Panama Railway & Steamship Co., and who was loaned by the War Department to the United States Lines and served as general manager, which position he retained until he was returned to the Panama line as vice president and general manager one year ago. This line has since shown a splendid actual operating profit.

C. A. McAllister's early sea experience was with the Coast Guard. He subsequently became vice president and then president of the American Bureau of Shipping, a bureau wisely set up by the United States to control the design and building of ships and to provide insurance rating for such ships, all of which was handled previously by the English Lloyd's. This is probably the most outstanding accomplishment of this Nation in stimulating our merchant marine.

Prof. Simon Litman for 20 years was on the faculty of the University of California and University of Illinois as professor of economics and transportation. In this work he is an outstanding authority and is the author of several works dealing with ocean commerce and transportation.

Prof. G. G. Huebner is, like Professor Litman, the outstanding eastern authority on the economics of ocean transportation, and occupies this chair at the University of Pennsylvania.

Addison G. Foster, for three years conference assistant of the United States Lines in London, was for the last three years assistant passenger traffic manager in New York.

J. E. Slater, graduate of Harvard, assistant to the general manager of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, professor of transportation of the University of Illinois, and now secretary and treasurer of the American Brown Boveri Electric Corporation.

Mr. President, it is quite evident from those names and from things which these gentlemen have done that this company which it is proposed shall be organized if they can secure proper governmental aid is as well equipped as is humanly possible with the brains, the experience, the intelligence, the initiative, and the responsibility to go ahead and give us a line of steamers across the Atlantic flying the American flag, built in America, conceived by American brains, and put into operation by Americans, of which we shall all be proud, if they are given the proper Government aid—not a subsidy in the sense of the word which means simply the handing out of the taxpayers' money so they may conduct a profitable enterprise, but Government aid in the form of a proper loan, on which they will pay the same rate of interest that the Government pays in securing the money, and in the form of proper contracts for the carrying of mails in a manner faster than they can be carried by any other line.

Finally, I desire to call attention to the fact that the corporation which I have just been describing has succeeded in securing the services of Commodore Herbert Hartley as first operating officer of the Transoceanic Corporation of the United States. Commodore Hartley was for 28 years with the American Lines. He was the senior captain of that fleet when he resigned to accept appointment as commander of our one great trans-Atlantic liner, the Leviathan, immediately after her reconditioning. He carried the broom of North Atlantic speed supremacy at his masthead on his first trip across the ocean. In other words, he may be said to be the ablest sea captain of longest experience that we have operating in the North Atlantic.

Having resigned his position on last Tuesday, January 24, to enter commercial life, he again returns to his first love, the sea, to recruit, train, and be responsible for the operating personnel of America's challenge for high-sea supremacy.

Commodore Hartley, accepting appointment as the first operating official of the Transoceanic Corporation of the United States, said:

> The dream of my life has come true at last. This means a declaration of our maritime independence. If I had been offered any other position connected with the sea, I would not have accepted it.
> I see this as the beginning of our return to first importance on the seas. I am going to supervise every item of design to be sure that my many years of experience are incorporated in every detail. I am going to see that they truly represent our American flag on the high seas.
> I shall watch every ship launched and take each on her first journey. With my associates I shall determine the American terminal and the port of call in Great Britain.
> I shall dictate the membership of every crew, and I will be responsible for those who man our ships. To the millions of people in every State and town I will guarantee utmost safety, comfort, and speed. They can trust me, as they have trusted me before.
> I am committing my reputation to the new American merchant marine and I demand support. Our flag must fly again on every ocean. For the first time in nearly a century we are returning to the sea.
>
> I pledge to the many Americans who have intrusted to me their lives and the lives of their dear ones in the past greater safety, comfort, and speed.
> I am giving myself to this undertaking to put our country back on the high seas and to give America again its proper maritime position. I thank God for this opportunity that has been afforded me.

In connection with the company which I have been discussing, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a Senate resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 125), as follows:

> Resolved, That the United States Shipping Board is directed to report to the Senate, at the earliest practicable date, the proposal of the Transoceanic Corporation with respect to the construction of fast passenger vessels, together with the recommendations of the board with respect thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have no objection to the present consideration of the resolution, but I want it understood that there will be no delay in forcing a vote on the pending bill to await any report pursuant to the resolution.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is understood.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, unless there is included in the resolution a request for all information that the Shipping Board can obtain as to the financial responsibility of the company, I shall object to its immediate consideration.

Mr. BINGHAM. I understood that the resolution involves the entire project and everything connected with it and all the information they have, together with their recommendations.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator know for how much they are incorporated?

Mr. BINGHAM. I am trying to get all the information possible, and the resolution asks for it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator has given information about their experience and business past, but I have not heard anything said about the financial standing or responsibility, how much money is behind them, how much they are incorporated for, or whether this is simply a project to incorporate in the future and raise money by the sale of stock.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the Senator will withdraw his objection, we can secure that information as rapidly as possible from the Shipping Board.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator include in his resolution what I have asked him to include?

Mr. BINGHAM. I shall be glad to have the Senator from Massachusetts prepare such an amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I object for the present, until such an amendment can be prepared.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the resolution will go over under the rule.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, before I proceed with my formal remarks, I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. May I ask the Senator from Washington if the bill is now perfected?

Mr. JONES. The bill is now perfected, so far as committee amendments are concerned.

Mr. COPELAND. I would like to ask the Senator another question. In section 6 there is a clearance clause——

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Barkley	Edwards	McLean	Simmons
Bingham	Ferris	McMaster	Smith
Black	Fess	McNary	Smoot
Blaine	Fletcher	Mayfield	Steiwer
Blease	Frazier	Metcalf	Stephens
Borah	George	Moses	Swanson
Bratton	Hale	Neely	Thomas
Brookhart	Harris	Norris	Trammell
Broussard	Harrison	Nye	Tydings
Bruce	Hayden	Oddie	Tyson
Capper	Heflin	Overman	Wagner
Caraway	Howell	Pine	Walsh, Mass.
Copeland	Johnson	Ransdell	Walsh, Mont.
Couzens	Jones	Robinson, Ind.	Warren
Curtis	Kendrick	Sackett	Waterman
Cutting	Keyes	Schall	Watson
Deneen	King	Sheppard	Wheeler
Dill	La Follette	Shipstead	Willis
Edge	McKellar	Shortridge

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I would like to make a formal presentment of the amendment which I spoke of as intending to offer to the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 9, after the word "authorized," and before the period, insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That of subordinate officers and positions, under the United States Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation, of a clerical or ministerial nature, other than the position of seaman or other positions, calling for the performance of purely manual or mental duties, shall be subject to the Federal laws relating to the Federal classified service and reclassification; but this proviso shall have no application to bureau or division chiefs or heads or other subordinate officials or officers or employees under said board or corporation charged with executive functions involving the exercise of executive initiative or discretion.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to renew the request which I made a while ago as to a recess. I understand the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and also the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] wish to speak on Monday for probably an hour or two. So I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it take a recess until noon on Monday next, and that after 5 o'clock on Monday no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than five minutes on any amendment or on the bill to its final passage. That will give the remainder of to-day and five hours on Monday, and I hope that it will afford ample time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington?

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator said 5 o'clock?

Mr. JONES. Five o'clock on Monday.

Mr. JOHNSON. Why not make it 4 o'clock?

Mr. JONES. That would be agreeable to me, if it would be satisfactory to the Senator from California and the Senator from Utah.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the hour be fixed at 5 o'clock, it would mean probably that we would have to sit here until after 6 o'clock before a final vote could be had.

Mr. JONES. I do not think so; we would probably have just one vote on the passage of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suggest that the Senator modify his request so as to make the hour 4 o'clock.

Mr. JONES. That would be entirely satisfactory to me if it would be agreeable to the Senator from California and the Senator from Utah.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, the Senator does not mean 4 o'clock to-day?

Mr. JONES. No; 4 o'clock on Monday. I am perfectly willing to make the hour 4 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. KING. I should be very glad to accommodate the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], and may I suggest to the chairman of the committee that he modify his request so that the Senate will meet at 11 o'clock, because I am sure there will be a number of Senators desiring to participate in the debate on Monday, and that will give us an additional hour?

Mr. JONES. That will be satisfactory to me, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I hope that request will not be made.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I have no desire to delay the passage of the bill or a final vote upon the bill. As has been remarked, there are a number of Senators who desire to make some observations, and all I am concerned about is lest some one Senator being recognized might proceed to consume practically all of the available time. I shall not address the Senate at any great length, but it seems to me that if we meet at 11 we might well vote at 4; otherwise, let us meet at 12 and take the vote at 5, as suggested by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, I wish to say that I hardly believe a time can now be set to vote on Monday. I understand that the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] expects to speak at some length.

Mr. COPELAND. I expect to proceed this afternoon.

Mr. TYSON. I think the hour ought to be 5 o'clock.

Mr. KING. May I say to the Senator that that has been agreed to on this side?

Mr. TYSON. That the hour shall be 5 o'clock on Monday?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. TYSON. I think 4 o'clock would not afford sufficient time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Washington again state his request for unanimous consent?

Mr. JONES. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it take a recess until 12 o'clock on Monday next, and that after 5 o'clock on Monday no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than five minutes on the bill or any amendment thereto. That will give an opportunity to discuss briefly any amendments that may not be disposed of before the hour of 5 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request does not include an immediate recess?

Mr. JONES. No; the request is that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it recess until Monday. I expect that the Senate shall remain in session this afternoon until 5 o'clock unless something should occur to make it advisable for the Senate to conclude its business earlier.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there specific objection to the request of the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, withholding any objection for a moment, is it possible to add to the request or to make a part of it an understanding that the bill shall be discussed and that the time will not be consumed in discussing the next Democratic national convention and kindred matters? It is extremely unfair to those who are interested for or against the bill to limit the time of the debate and then have the time consumed by those who are more interested in other matters.

Mr. JONES. I am perfectly willing so far as that is concerned to limit debate to the bill.

Mr. NEELY. And let us also have it understood that no Senator will read from a newspaper or an almanac, as the Senator from Connecticut did for an hour this afternoon.

Mr. JONES. We are wasting considerable time now.

Mr. NEELY. Reserving the right to object, I ask unanimous consent to address the Senate immediately after 12 o'clock next Monday concerning the prohibition questionnaire which the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has submitted to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], who is a candidate for the Republican nomination for President.

Mr. JONES. How much time will the Senator from West Virginia desire?

Mr. NEELY. Not more than 20 minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. If we are going to start a national convention and prohibition discussion on next Monday, the opponents of the bill and its friends will not get any time to discuss the measure, and unless we can have some arrangement to insure that the bill will be discussed on Monday I am going to object.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I suggest that we take a recess until both national conventions shall have concluded their sessions.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I think I had the floor when a call for a quorum was made. I am sorry, but I think I can not yield longer.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HARRISON. What became of the request for unanimous consent?

Mr. KING. Objection was made.

Mr. HARRISON. Who made objection?

Mr. COPELAND. I understood the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] made it.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not understand that the Senator from West Virginia made any objection, but only proposed a unanimous-consent request himself. Will not the Chair again state the request for unanimous consent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was objection made by the Senator from West Virginia to the unanimous-consent proposal of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President——

Mr. FESS. Will the Senator from New York yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I did not understand that the Senator from West Virginia made objection.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not understand that he did.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, the Senators from Ohio and Mississippi are correct, I simply reserved the right to object until my request for unanimous consent had been granted. That request was for a few minutes to discuss a matter which the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], by a question of order, prevented me from discussing this morning.

Mr. FESS. The purpose of the request for a recess was to afford an opportunity to-morrow for some committee work. I think that the membership of the Senate present would be very glad to have the Senate adjourn over to-morrow. I think there is some misunderstanding about the matter. If the situation were understood, I feel quite sure that the Senate would be ready to accept the suggestion of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON. And also give the Senator from West Virginia the 20 minutes he desires.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I would be very glad to ask unanimous consent to give my good friend from West Virginia one hour on Wednesday.

Mr. NEELY. I thank the Senators from California and Indiana for their kindness; but I do not want to wait until Wednesday to make my remarks.

Mr. JONES. I ask that I may modify my request so as to provide that on the convening of the Senate on Monday 15 or 20 minutes may be accorded to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. NEELY. I do not object to the modified request which the Senator from Washington now submits.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If the Senator from West Virginia begins at 12 o'clock on Monday to express himself, he doubtless will say much that is well worth listening to, whereupon, I imagine, replies will be made; and the upshot of the whole matter will be that it is quite likely that the whole afternoon will be consumed in the consideration of other matters than the bill now before the Senate. Wherefore, while hesitating to do so, yet, in view of the uncertain future situation, I can not give my consent to limit debate on the bill at 5 o'clock on Monday next. I will gladly join in a suggested unanimous-consent agreement to permit the Senator from West Virginia to address the Senate for half an hour or an hour or such time as he may desire.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California object to the modified request for unanimous consent preferred by the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. HARRISON. Will not the Senator from California suggest some date, so that we may vote on this matter and take up some other measures that are rather urgent?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes; I suggest Tuesday.

Mr. HARRISON. Is that agreeable to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. JONES. I should like to have the bill disposed of on Monday.

Mr. HARRISON. It looks as if the Senate should agree on a proposition like this. I can never recall when there was any objection raised to a Senator who wanted to discuss a matter proceeding immediately following the convening of the Senate.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I think, perhaps, this matter can be settled if we give the Senator from West Virginia unanimous consent to address the Senate for 30 minutes or for so much time as he may desire immediately after the reading of the Journal on Tuesday.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I appreciate the kindness of my very good friend from Indiana. But in view of the unusual means by which I was prevented from speaking this morning I must insist upon my right to address the Senate on Monday. In the exercise of that right I neither ask nor desire any favors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California has made objection to the request of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Senator from Washington, in the time of the Senator from New York, can we not meet at 11 o'clock on Monday?

Mr. JONES. We can meet at 10 o'clock, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. HARRISON. Why can we not meet at 11 o'clock, let the Senator from West Virginia have 20 minutes, allow 20 minutes for reply to him, and then start the discussion on the pending bill, and vote at 5 o'clock?

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, Saturday is not the Sabbath day, and there is no reason why we can not discuss this measure on Saturday. There are important committee meetings to be held on Monday and other matters which ought to be attended to, and I do not think we should meet at 11 o'clock on that day.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to take a moment to say that I was willing to barter away part of the time on Monday; but I object most strenuously to trading away one day after another, several days ahead, because we have appropriation bills which must be taken care of from time to time. The Senate knows that there is the utmost liberty of debate when an appropriation bill is up, and Senators talk about everything on earth, so that they can then get all the time they want.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I think I surely will not be discourteous if I say that I should be glad to be permitted to proceed for a few minutes without interruption.

Some time ago I addressed a question to the Senator from Washington, and I will now repeat it.

The last section of the bill is a clearance clause. It says:

> All acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed to the extent of any such inconsistency.

Disregarding for a moment section 2, what do we repeal by this bill?

Mr. JONES. I will frankly say to the Senator that I do not know of anything that we repeal. This is a precautionary provision that is usually put in measures of this kind.

Mr. COPELAND. That is exactly the answer I expected. This bill does not do anything—not a thing in the world—except, in section 2, to provide how the ships shall be sold. This has been heralded to the country as a bill to provide for the building of an American merchant marine, and it does not provide anything of the kind.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, this is what it does in addition: Instead of repealing, it supplements the act of 1920, and authorizes appropriations for the building of new ships. That is not done in the act of 1920, and that is the substantial part. There is nothing repealed by it, but there is something added to it.

Mr. COPELAND. All right. Then I will ask the Senator, could we not make appropriations for new ships now?

Mr. JONES. Such appropriations are not in order on appropriation bills.

Mr. COPELAND. If a bill were presented here and referred to the Committee on Appropriations and given favorable consideration there, could we not appropriate the money?

Mr. JONES. We could do it by simply setting aside our rules and not carrying out our rules; but if any Senator invokes the rule that it is not authorized by existing law, out it goes. We can do lots of things by unanimous consent.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator from Washington intimate that the Congress of the United States can not appropriate money if it sees fit to do so?

Mr. JONES. I thought I made myself clear.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator has not, to me.

Mr. JONES. If we were to bring in in a bill an appropriation item that is not authorized by law, any Senator could make a point of order and exclude it.

Mr. COPELAND. I agree to that.

Mr. JONES. Of course, by unanimous consent we could pass a hundred million dollar appropriation to-morrow or this afternoon for the building of ships.

Mr. COPELAND. I agree to that; but suppose I introduced, or the Senator from Washington did, a bill proposing to spend $150,000,000 for ships, and that were referred to the Committee on Appropriations. Could not the Committee on Appropriations bring in a recommendation to the Senate of the United States that we should make that appropriation?

Mr. JONES. I suppose they could bring in a recommendation if it is legislation; but as an item to an appropriation bill it would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. COPELAND. That is to say, if the bill were on the floor and then I proposed the addition of $150,000,000——

Mr. JONES. If the committee proposed something of that kind, it has been held here that a point of order was good against it. It has been held good against an item that I offered.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator mean to say that there is no way in the world in which the Congress of the United States can make an appropriation without its being ruled out on a point of order?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, of course we could suspend the rules by a two-thirds vote. We could pass it by unanimous consent, but I do not know of any other way. If the House put an item in the bill and it came over here, then it would not be subject to a point of order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The Senator from New York or the Senator from Washington or any other Senator, however, could introduce a bill to-day, and have it referred to the appropriate committee, authorizing the expenditure of any sum for the purchase, acquisition, or building of ships; and if that committee reported it out, and it was passed, then the appropriation could be carried in the appropriation bill.

Mr. JONES. That is exactly what we have before the Senate now—a bill that has been referred to a committee and reported by the committee authorizing these appropriations, and we are trying to pass it.

Mr. COPELAND. Now, Mr. President, for a moment I desire to take up this bill item by item.

The first section reads:

That the policy declared in section 1 of the merchant marine act, 1920, is hereby confirmed.

In section 1 of the bill we simply reaffirm what is now in the law. That is not new. We have not built any merchant marine by that procedure. We have not added any new ships to the peace Navy of the United States by that; so that does not amount to anything.

The second section refers to the way in which the ships shall be sold. I will skip that for a moment.

Now we come to section 3.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator will agree that section 2, however, is the adoption of an absolutely new policy.

Mr. COPELAND. Oh, yes.

Mr. EDGE. In order that the merchant marine can not go out of Government hands.

Mr. COPELAND. Oh, yes. I shall refer to that at considsiderable length before I get through, I may say to the Senator from New Jersey; but I want to leave that for a moment.

Section 3 provides that—

In addition to ordinary repairs to vessels incident to their regular operation, the board may recondition—

And so forth.

On that subject I refer you to section 12 of the existing law. It reads:

That all vessels may be reconditioned and kept in suitable repair and until sold shall be managed and operated by the board or chartered or leased by it—

And so forth. There is not anything new there; not a thing.

Section 4 provides as follows:

The necessity for the replacement of vessels * * * is hereby recognized, and the board is authorized and directed to present to Congress from time to time recommendations setting forth what new vessels are required—

And so forth. They can do it now. That is not new. That is the law to-day.

Now we come to section 5:

The appropriations necessary to carry out the provisions and accomplish the purposes of this act are hereby authorized.

That does accomplish what the Senator from Washington said. An addition could be made to a bill through an amendment proposed on the floor; but if the Senator from Nebraska wanted to build $100,000,000 worth of ships he could present a bill and have it referred; and if he got the votes he could make the appropriation; so that is not new.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, as I understand the Budget system, if the item for an appropriation, whether this bill authorizing it passed or not, were placed in a bill in the House and came over here, of course it would not be subject to a point of order.

Mr. COPELAND. Then the fact is that there is not a single thing in this bill proposed by the Senator from Washington that changes the law in one important particular, except that it provides that hereafter a ship can be sold only by the affirmative vote of seven members of the board.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator is correct, then the Senate has been wasting its time here for several days about an immaterial and irrelevant matter. Is that right?

Mr. COPELAND. It has.

Mr. NORRIS. We are about as bad as the little burlesque performance that has been going on for 10 weeks down here in Judge Siddons's court.

Mr. EDGE. I do not think it is an insignificant or an irrelevant matter to absolutely rivet down Government ownership and operation for all time to come, which, of course, is admittedly a part of this bill.

Mr. COPELAND. I assumed that the Senator from Nebraska was speaking of the sections I named. The five sections I have pointed out mean absolutely nothing. I have heard it said upon this floor time and time again during the past week that if we pass this bill we are going to have an American merchant marine, and that is all nonsense. There is not a word of truth in it.

Mr. NORRIS. If the very able and illustrious attorneys for this millionaire defendant who is supposedly on trial for contempt of court hear about this, they will immediately take it up and start out, down there in this court, to try the Senate.

Mr. COPELAND. I should not be surprised if the country tries the Senate when it finds that it has a gold brick.

Mr. NORRIS. They will not be able to do that. It will be done right down here.

Mr. COPELAND. When the country finds that it has a gold brick the country will try the Senate.

Now we have done something, however. The purpose of this bill is supposed to be to build a merchant marine. What we have done is to kill an American merchant marine by the adoption of section 2 as amended by the committee. Now, why? Why?

There is only one way in which that could be made stronger, and I am surprised that the committee did not think of it. There are seven members of the board. Why did not the committee say that vessels can be sold only when the proposal gets the affirmative votes of 14? That would be twice as strong. You will never sell a ship under this arrangement; and, of course, many of the Members of the Senate who are for this bill never want to sell a ship. That is the purpose of the bill. That is what it is for.

Mr. EDGE. I think they admit that, do they not?

Mr. COPELAND. Let me say to the Senator from New Jersey that we have asked this question of them: The law has not been changed, except that now it takes seven affirmative votes. Suppose seven of them voted to sell: That is conceivable, although not likely to happen. Then what would the men here do who want to maintain these old hulks for ever and ever? What would they do then? These ships can be sold even now by a stretch of the imagination with the possibility of having seven affirmative votes.

Mr. EDGE. If the Senator will suffer one further interruption, I do not want to interfere with his train of thought, but there seems to be a feeling existent from the debate so far that the sale of these ships must be prevented, because if they should be sold we will cease to have a merchant marine.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. EDGE. Whenever we sell the ships they simply pass from the custody of the Government to that of some operator, under contract. The operator certainly would not buy the ships to scuttle them if they were seaworthy; so that the American merchant marine continues just the same. It is just a question of the ownership and the administration and the loss to the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator for what he has said, and let me point out to him and to others what has happened.

We have heard about these ships being sold, 10,000,000 tons, or whatever it was, or it might have been a million tons; I do not know. You would think that by reason of that fact the Shipping Board had deliberately and intentionally and unpatriotically sought to hamstring and destroy the American merchant marine. Now, what has happened? How many ships did we build during the war? May I ask the Senator from Washington if he remembers how many ships we built during the war?

Mr. JONES. I think it was a couple of thousand.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator says a couple of thousand. I have forgotten the exact number. Now, we went ahead and built those ships. We did it under pressure. Half of them are not worth using for anything but scrap iron. These ships that were sold to Henry Ford were not any good. They were not of any use to an American Navy. They were just waste that had to be taken out and sifted out. The Shipping Board has sifted out thousands of tons of these ships, but they were not worth saving. We could not afford to maintain them, and we did wisely when we got rid of them.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, in connection with the Ford transaction, I think it is generally understood, although I have no intimate knowledge of it, merely newspaper references, I think that Mr. Ford in this once case at least made a very bad business bargain. He afterwards destroyed the ships, and the Government got more for them than he ever possibly could have realized for them.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no other object in view than to get as much light on this subject as possible.

Mr. COPELAND. I know that.

Mr. NORRIS. I listened the other day to the remarks of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and I confess I was very much impressed by what he said. The Senator was speaking about some ships, and assuming, as I do, that the Senator was right about it, they ought to have been disposed of if they were no good.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I can not remember the details or the exact figures, but I got the idea from what the Senator from Florida said that we had ships costing us about $30,000,000 which the Shipping Board sold for less than $4,000,000, and included in the number were some of the best ships in the entire world, as I remember the statement. They were disposed of.

I am frank to admit that if I were sitting as a juror or judge to try the matter I would have to have more evidence before I would be satisfied with myself in rendering a verdict or reaching a decision. But with that kind of evidence before us, it seems to me there was reason, at least, for us to sit up and take notice that these ships were being disposed of rather recklessly. That is the way it appeared to me at the time.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator for what he has said. The Senator from Florida did say that we were giving away ships, and that we had scrapped ships. I want to be equally frank with the Senator and to be honest with him in making reply to the question he has raised. Not alone these ships that we sold to Mr. Ford, but we had a lot of lake ships, wooden ships, many of which have been disposed of, and we have sold ships—the Senator from Florida is entirely right in that—for very much less than they cost. The Shipping Board operated under the law passed in 1920, the Jones Act, and it found that certain of its ships had succeeded, services had been built up which were for the good of the country, and they found private operators who were willing to take those ships on terms. They did sell them, and they sold them for very much less than they cost us. In that sense we furnished a subsidy.

Mr. HOWELL. And for very much less than it would have cost to reproduce them at the time.

Mr. COPELAND. For very much less than it would have cost to reproduce them at the time; yes. I agree with that. We did that because the Shipping Board in its wisdom, acting under section 5 of the law, determined that it was wise to turn the ships over to private operators because the country at large would be under no further obligation as regarded replacements or reconditioning or other expense. They did turn them over by vote of the board.

I do not know whether that was wise or not on the part of the board. If it had been declared to be the purpose of the Government in the Jones Act to make money out of the shipping, to operate a merchant marine in the same way private individuals would operate it, then they violated good business sense by selling the ships, because those ships were beginning to be profitable. But replacements had to be made, reconditioning had to be done, and the Shipping Board considered it for the best interests of the country to dispose of the ships. What became of them?

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator let me ask him a question before he goes into that part of it?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator said they had to be reconditioned.

Mr. COPELAND. Some of them had been reconditioned.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I was going to call to the attention of the Senator. I remember that the Senator from Florida, who is now in the Chamber and who, if I do not quote him correctly, I would be glad to have him correct me, gave instances, one in particular that impressed me very much, where a ship had just been reconditioned, equipped, supplied with all the necessary things to put it into such condition that they were ready to go to sea with the ship, they had the groceries and the fruit and canned goods and everything on board, and then it was sold immediately for less money that it cost the Government to do the reconditioning that was done.

Mr. FLETCHER. Less by $2,000,000. The ship was a German ship. She had cost $1,600,000, or about that, to build. We seized her during the war and used her in the transport service, and then we reconditioned her. The Shipping Board spent $2,000,000 reconditioning that ship.

Mr. COPELAND. All of which is true, and I admit it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then they spent $41,000 in hotel supplies for the ship.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. And sold that ship for $100,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Not much more than it cost the Government to put the groceries on the ship with which they were to feed the crew and the passengers. I want to submit a question to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. I will answer it if I can.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no doubt the Senator can answer it; but I submit to the Senate that when such disclosures as that are made to the Senate it seems to me we will be derelict in our duty if we do not look into it and see what the trouble is, if there is any trouble. If there can be a reason given for that kind of business, all well and good, but I, myself, can not conceive very well taking a ship and putting it into that kind of condition and then selling it for a song. If that was to be done, why was it not done before the reconditioning was accomplished? It would have been better to have said to somebody, "Take the ship for nothing and we will give you $50,000 for taking it."

Mr. FLETCHER. The only argument I have ever heard advanced in support of that action was that the ship was actually losing money and they wanted to get rid of it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. JONES. The Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] have kindly consented to withdraw their objections to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement, that when the Senate concludes its business to-day we take a recess until 12 o'clock noon Monday, and that after 5 o'clock on that day no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than five minutes on the bill or any amendment thereto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. BRUCE. I object, though I dislike very much to do so. Looking at the history of this session, what sort of assurance is there to be given to any reasonable man that anyone who desires further to participate in the discussion of this bill will have an opportunity to do so? We know how brainstorms spring up in this Chamber and sweep over it, making it impossible to discuss measures which are supposed to constitute the unfinished business of the day. We may have another anti-Catholic agitation or another antiprohibition crusade or some other subject may come up rendering it absolutely impossible to discuss the measure which is the unfinished business of the day.

I have offered an amendment to the bill, and I had hoped that it would meet with no opposition. I was delighted to find that both the Senator from Washington and the Senator from Florida seemed to be friendly to the amendment. Still, the amendment may call for discussion or explanation, and in that event I would like to have a little time in which to discuss it or explain it.

Mr. JONES. Let me suggest to the Senator that his amendment is the pending amendment. We can not dispose of anything else now until we dispose of his amendment.

Mr. BRUCE. I understand that.

Mr. JONES. So that I am sure it will be considered.

Mr. BRUCE. I intended to explain it two hours ago, but the Senator from California came to me and asked me if I would not be so kind as to yield to him, and I said yes. Then the Senator from New York came to me and asked me if I would not yield to him, and I assented. I showed an unusually accommodating disposition, and for all I know I am just as far from an opportunity to discuss the amendment as I was in the beginning.

Mr. JONES. I want to assure the Senator that I have no doubt in the world but that his amendment will be fully considered, and I will say to him frankly right now that I have no opposition to the amendment.

Mr. BRUCE. I am delighted to hear the Senator say that, and if the request can be so modified as to allow me 10 minutes, I shall have no objection.

Mr. JONES. I can not, of course, guarantee the Senator 10 minutes, but I hope the Senator will not object to the proposed agreement. Under the circumstances, and with the consideration we have had of the pending measure, I can not believe that any Senator will take up the time on Monday in the discussion of an extraneous matter.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I would like to say to the Senator from Maryland that I think most of the Senators here are friendly to his amendment, and if he gets only five minutes after 5 o'clock, which this agreement would give him, and more time is necessary, I am sure there are many other Senators who will take up the cudgels for him.

Mr. BRUCE. I withdraw my objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The agreement was reduced to writing, as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Ordered, by unanimous consent, That when the Senate concludes its business to-day it take a recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday, January 30 next, and that after the hour of 5 o'clock p. m. on said day no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than five minutes upon the pending bill (S. 744) to further develop an American merchant marine, etc., or upon any amendment proposed thereto.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Massachusetts has perfected his amendment to the resolution I offered, and I ask unanimous consent to present the Senate resolution regarding this matter which was offered a little time ago and objected to by the Senator from Massachusetts, and I request immediate consideration. If it leads to any debate, I shall withdraw it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I am not disposed to object to the resolution, but I do object to any sort of thought or idea that we are going to delay action on the pending bill until we get some response to the resolution. If it is introduced for a purpose of that kind, I shall certainly object to it.

Mr. JONES. I may say to the Senator that we have just had a unanimous-consent agreement regarding procedure on the bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. The resolution was explained when I introduced it. I stated that it was not offered for that purpose at all, and that there would be no effort to delay the passage of the bill to await this information.

Mr. FLETCHER. With that assurance, I withdraw my objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the resolution.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 125), as follows:

Resolved, That the United States Shipping Board is directed to report to the Senate, at the earliest practicable date, the proposal of the Transoceanic Corporation with respect to the construction of fast passenger vessels, together with the recommendations of the board with respect thereto.

Mr. BINGHAM. I understand the Senator from Massachusetts has an amendment to offer.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I move that after the word "vessels," in the fourth line, there be inserted the following language:

its financial condition, its plans for future financing its shipping business, when and where the company was incorporated, the amount of money the United States Government will be required to expend to give the necessary aid to this company to enable it to establish an adequate merchant marine under the American flag.

If that amendment is adopted, I shall have no objection to the resolution. I will say that I originally included in my amendment an inquiry as to whether the company had ever operated ships, but the Senator from Connecticut agrees that this company has never operated any ships, so I have omitted that part of the amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. I accept the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the United States Shipping Board is directed to report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date the proposal of the Transoceanic Corporation with respect to the construction of fast passenger vessels, its financial condition, its plans for future financing its shipping business, when and where the company was incorporated, the amount of money the United States Government will be required to expend to give the necessary aid to this company to enable it to establish an adequate merchant marine under the American flag, together with the recommendations of the board with respect thereto.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I will attempt now to answer the question of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, will not the Senator yield to me to ask a question of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. TYSON. The Senator from Florida spoke about a ship being sold for a very small amount. I wanted to ascertain whether or not that ship, which cost $3,600,000 and which was sold for $100,000, is now in the service, and whether or not it is making any money or is being operated at a loss.

Mr. FLETCHER. I can not answer that. I forget the German name of the ship, but she was called the City of Los Angeles after we reconditioned her, and put into service from San Francisco or Los Angeles to the west coast of South America. Then they decided to sell her, and advertised her for sale. My information is that she was on a voyage from Los Angeles to Hawaii while the advertisement was being published, and when she returned to Los Angeles she was sold for $100,000 to the Los Angeles Steamship Co., and is now in operation between Los Angeles and Hawaii. Whether she is making money or not I am not advised. I do not know about that.

If the Senator from New York will allow me a moment further about the sales, I have the data here. The statement is that the board's record of ship sales since June, 1921, is as follows:

Ships sold, 1,141; amount, $85,176,678.17.

Sales made but not consummated, three; amount, $191,720.

In operation, 290; spot operators, 15; spot fleet, 7; total, 312; available for sale or operation, not assigned, 486; making a grand total of 798 ships at present. Those are figures which, I think, are official.

Mr. COPELAND. Now I will answer the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TYSON]. No Shipping Board ships have ever made any money. It is widely heralded that the United States Lines are making money. To make clear to the Senator what I mean by "United States Lines," I mean the line including the Leviathan, which is our major line, consisting at the present time of the Leviathan, the President Roosevelt, the George Washington, the Republic, and the President Harding. It has been heralded far and wide that that line is making money. It is not making money. All the figures show no depreciation and show no interest charge. It is not making money. That is absurd. No service of the Shipping Board has made any money. The very fact that year after year that board is coming here asking for money shows that fact. We have lost $200,000,000 in seven years operating the ships of the Shipping Board, and in a bill now pending before us is a request for $13,000,000 for the year to come.

I had not quite answered the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and I want to do so. I wish to point out to him first what is the milk in the coconut. I want to show him why some of those who are so interested in preventing the sale of these ships or in acquiring more ships are so greatly concerned. I shall show some of the reasons and then I will answer the question. It bears on my reply.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator just a moment at that point?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator said that we lost about $200,000,000. Will the Senator not be fair enough to say that when freight rates were high, right after the war, prior to 1921, these ships were operated by the Government, and we cleared net approaching $200,000,000 at that time? As a matter of fact, from the time of our entering into this business up to date they have not cost the people of the country anything of any consequence.

Mr. COPELAND. I will go as far as the Senator wants me to go in being fair. It is true that when the submarines had swept the seas of ships, and foreign nations had no bottoms and we had ships, we did make some money. But when the ships of foreign nations were restored we commenced to lose money, and we are losing it year after year, and we will continue to lose it. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] yesterday stated that to replace ships, to make the necessary reconditioning and replacements, would cost $25,000,000 a year for 15 years. Am I right in that statement? That is exactly what he said. Therefore, $275,000,000 must be added to this fleet which the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] says made money up until 1921. It is not making any money now and it never will make any money until these millions of dollars are spent and the country can determine whether it is going to spend $275,000,000 to make replacements and to put these lines on a paying basis, or whether it is going to encourage private operation.

Now, I will come back to what I started to say to the Senator from Nebraska. Down on the Gulf of Mexico there are 10 lines. For the sake of the RECORD I will ask permission to insert at this point in my remarks the figures relating to those lines, and then I will not have to bother the Senate to read them all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Statement of losses and operators' compensation, Gulf operators, January 1 to November 30, 1927

Line	Home port	Number of vessels as of Nov. 30, 1927	Total loss for period	Managing agents' compensation (included in loss)

Southern States Line	do	26	1,480,757.15	399,823.95

Total		116	4,114,081.19	1,694,727.90
Including inactive vessel expense.			949,226.00
Total			5,163,307.19

Mr. COPELAND. These 10 lines in the 11 months between January 1, 1927, and November 30, 1927, in their operations lost $5,163,307.19.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator how many ships were engaged in that particular line?

Mr. COPELAND. One hundred and sixteen ships.

Mr. EDGE. Does the Senator know how many ships are now being operated by the United States Shipping Board?

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from Florida just gave us figures. How many ships are now being operated, may I ask the Senator from Florida?

Mr. FLETCHER. There are in operation 290; spot operators 15 and spot fleet 7, making a total of 312. There are available for sale or operation, not assigned, 486, 128 of which are classified as surplus.

Mr. COPELAND. Out of 290 ships now operated by the Shipping Board 116 go out from Gulf ports—from New Orleans, Galveston, and Mobile—and last year in 11 months lost $5,163,000. That has been the experience year after year with every line connected with the Shipping Board.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again to me?

Mr. COPELAND. With pleasure.

Mr. EDGE. Does the Senator think under those circumstances there will ever be a chance, with seven members of the Shipping Board, of whom one is from the Gulf, one from the Pacific, one from the Atlantic, and one from the Great Lakes region, of their getting a unanimous vote to sell any of those 116 ships?

Mr. COPELAND. I will say, of course, that those lines could never pay and they will never get into private hands.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. I want to say, before the Senator from Nebraska interrupts me, that, so far as I am concerned, I have no desire to stop the operation of those ships. I yield now to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish the Senator would tell us just where those ships were operating. Did they go to foreign ports from the southern cities which he named?

Mr. COPELAND. I see that I should state what the lines are, and I think it is advantageous for the Senate to know. The first one is Gulf to Brazil, the River Plate Line from New Orleans. There are 14 ships in that line. That includes the American Delta and the American Dispatch Line. Then there is the Gulf-West Mediterranean Line from New Orleans.

Mr. NORRIS. That means there were 14 of those ships operated from New Orleans?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; to different points in South America. That is exactly what it means.

Mr. NORRIS. It occurs to me that it may be true—but I do not know whether it is or not—that there is an exceedingly large number of ships which are being operated from the port of New Orleans to South American ports. As a business proposition, if the Senator were operating those ships so as to make them as nearly profitable as possible, would he have that many ships running from New Orleans alone? Would he take practically half of the ships of the fleet and run them from a few ports? Would it not be better if they were divided up among other ports? In other words, are the board operating this on a businesslike basis or are they trying to lose money?

Mr. COPELAND. There are 89 ships running out of New Orleans at a total loss of over $5,000,000. Now, the Senator from Nebraska will begin to see why there must be a unanimous vote of the Shipping Board in order that no ships shall be sold.

Mr. NORRIS. It is not a question of selling. It seems to me the question now is whether the board are using good business sense and good business judgment in their operations. The question of selling there by a mere majority vote or by unanimous vote is not involved in that proposition. In other words, if we run out of the port of New Orleans more ships than ought to be operated from that port, instead of dividing them up along the Atlantic coast clear to Portland, Me., are we using ordinary business judgment in that kind of operation, and can we expect anything but to lose if we do business that way?

Mr. FLETCHER. Does the Senator mean there are 89 Shipping Board ships sailing from New Orleans?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Where does the Senator get those figures?

Mr. COPELAND. From the Emergency Fleet Corporation, Washington, January 10, 1928.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know as to those figures. I do not know how many ships operate from there; but according to Doctor Klein, Director of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, some 60 per cent of the exports of the United States move through our southern ports.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand there is a large amount of business there, and I am not trying to say they should not operate the necessary ships to carry it. It may be that this number is not too great; but I confess it strikes me offhand that when we put practically half of the ships which we own into one line running out of one port, we are not exercising good business judgment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves that point may I say that the costs which the Senator gave are not the aggregate. In addition there are the costs of repairs. The board do not take into account in those figures deterioration or depreciation, nor do they take into account capital.

Mr. EDGE. That is just net operating loss, as I understand it.

Mr. COPELAND. There is no replacement and no interest charge.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand all that. However, I submit to the Senator that that does not bear, as I see it at least, on the question as to whether these ships should be sold by a bare majority vote or unanimous vote of the board. It seems at first blush—and I admit on full investigation it may be explained—as worthy of investigation as at least indicating that there ought to be a new Shipping Board, and that they ought to pay more attention to a business proposition than to have all their ships running out of one port.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator begins to see why there have been so many differences of opinion in the Shipping Board.

Mr. EDGE. Does the Senator know whether any offers for the purchase of any of those particular lines have been made to the Shipping Board?

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from New Jersey is a business man. He knows nobody will make an offer for those ships.

Mr. EDGE. No; I would not agree to that. I would say, just as the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] indicated, that 60 per cent of the commerce goes through ports in that section of the country, and I think he is entirely correct. I would have thought it was perhaps a little more. In my judgment if some of those lines, as the Senator from Nebraska indicated, were administered on a business basis by business men, there would not be a $5,000,000 loss in the operation of 116 ships. I believe that those lines, some of them running to the ports of South America and carrying the cargoes which they must carry, could be sold at a fair price and operated by private interests. But they can not be sold at any price if it is necessary to have a unanimous vote of the board, with a member from every section of the country necessarily acquiescing in the sale.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator, but not for a speech.

Mr. ODDIE. No; I do not desire to make a speech. In regard to the question which has just been raised by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] and the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] in reference to bids that have been tendered to the Shipping Board, I should like to place in the RECORD a statement to the Shipping Board recently made by the mayor of Tacoma, Wash., in which he sets out telegrams from the Chamber of Commerce of Tacoma and the Merchants' Exchange of Seattle and gives a good picture of the condition of shipping in that section of the country, and points out very clearly the fatal effect of the interchange of ports clause which has been forced into the bids.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Nevada is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SALE—PACIFIC AND ORIENTAL AND AUSTRALASIAN CARGO LINES

To the Honorable Members of the United States Shipping Board:

A group composed of more than 40 citizens of the State of Washington, financially responsible and having the support of every industrial community, primarily interested in the line of cargo vessels heretofore operated under the name of the American-Oriental Mail Line, being desirous of purchasing the service between Puget Sound ports and the Orient, submit to your honorable board the request for modification of the specifications and conditions set forth in the pending invitation for bids.

The pending specifications exclude this group from the opportunity to buy the line.

The desire of purchasing this line was initiated at a reception given in honor of Commissioners Teller and Myers, on September 15 last, by prominent business men at the Tacoma Hotel. These commissioners had viewed the municipal port facilities at Tacoma and the docks and terminals privately operated. At the luncheon which followed both these commissioners declared that the municipal terminals, with their equipment of loading and unloading facilities, constructed at a cost of over $3,000,000, are the most modern and efficient in the United States; that the cargo line operating out of Puget Sound had been built up at Government expense of approximately $1,000,000 to where it is now self-sustaining; that the law gave preference in the sale of services established by the Government to local communities primarily interested; that it is the practice of the board to sell services with guarantees protecting each service sold from competition of Government operation and from competition of other services by vessels sold by the Government; that each service purchased would not be subject to the competition within its own local territory, securing to the purchaser of the ability to maintain and operate the service purchased without the danger of being broken down and bankrupted in the interest of other services; that it is the policy of the law to preserve the individual integrity of each service established in order that the purchaser may maintain such service for the benefit of the community primarily interested.

Assurance was given by these two commissioners that in formulating specifications the preference right of the community to purchase provided by the merchant marine act would be respected.

Following this meeting an underwriting group with firm commitments of ample capital was formed and is in position and anxious to purchase the line. The plan of this underwriting group is to form a corporation with stockholders representative of the producing industries of the State of Washington, whose primary object is to maintain the line in the interest of shippers and industries of the State and to encourage the manufacture of products originating in the Orient and the Philippines.

This is the first time a potential purchaser has presented to your board an application for acquisition of a line by a group of citizens of a community whose primary interest is in the public welfare, prospective profits from the purchase and operation of the ships being subordinate.

Relying upon the assurances of the two Pacific coast representatives on your board, and the former practice of the board, and the resolution of your board in November ordering the sale of this and the two other lines operating out of American Pacific ports, with restricted service thereby protecting each line from competition by the purchasers of the other lines to be contemporaneously sold, arrangements were definitely completed for submitting a bid.

The Pacific coast papers of December 28 and 29 gave us the first information that the former policy of the board and the policy outlined in the resolution passed in November was about to be reversed, and that permission was to be given to purchasers of any one or a combination of any two of the lines to be sold to divert their ships, thereby opening up each port to full and practically unrestricted competition. This action could not be viewed in any other light than a device in the interest of persons or combinations of persons seeking a common control of all three lines to the exclusion of a prospective purchaser desiring to acquire and operate one of the lines as an independent service, thereby excluding from the bidding our group constituted to acquire the Puget Sound Line.

Thereupon the Merchants Exchange of Seattle, an association of independent dealers in grain and grain products, authorized its president to send to the chairman of the Shipping Board the following telegram:

SEATTLE, WASH., January 2, 1928.

T. V. O'CONNOR,

Chairman United States Shipping Board, Washington, D. C.:

Merchants Exchange of Seattle is vitally interested in oriental transportation of grain products from Puget Sound. The action of your board early in December resulted in an association of local State of Washington capital for financing a company to purchase and operate the Puget Sound oriental cargo ships you are proposing to sell. Your recent action, as stated in press, allowing diversion of the California and Portland ships into Puget Sound for the purpose of taking and delivering cargo is viewed with apprehension and will probably result in withdrawal of these interests from competitive bidding. We ask you to at least postpone further definite action in way of final specifications until we have an opportunity to examine the tentative specifications and to present to you such modifications as our interests will require. This is a matter of great importance to the entire State of Washington, whose production and export of grain should be afforded every opportunity to reach the markets of world and especially the Orient. Any monopoly of transportation to Orient will be a serious impediment to the welfare of entire Northwest. An immediate reply will be appreciated, and if the board is willing to accord this association the courtesy of a hearing we will send a representative to Washington without delay. Please place this telegram before the board at its meeting on Tuesday. Further, please understand that we are without full information—is confined solely to what has been published in papers. Your local office is unable to give us any information covering the proposed specifications.

H. P. CHAPMAN,
President Seattle Merchants Exchange.

This telegram, received at Washington on January 2, was not placed before the board for consideration at its meeting on January 4. On January 4, at 5 p. m., after the adjournment of the meeting at which the present specifications were adopted, the following telegram was filed in the Western Union office at Washington and received at Seattle the following morning:

H. G. CHAPMAN,

President Seattle Merchants Exchange, Seattle, Wash.:

Reference your wire December 30 respecting sale west-coast lines, this matter will be given consideration by the board.

T. V. O'CONNOR, Chairman.

On January 2 the following telegram was sent to Hon. Jefferson Myers, who has repeatedly given assurance that the State of Oregon interests would not be given any preference over those of the State of Washington:

TACOMA, WASH., January 2, 1928.

Hon. JEFFERSON MYERS,

United States Shipping Board, Washington, D. C.:

According to press reports, board is proposing to modify specifications for sale of oriental cargo ships in such a way that independent producers of lumber cargo seeking a market in Orient will be seriously handicapped, because they can not run the risk of becoming purchasers of the ships operating out of Puget Sound under contract to maintain a minimum service and at same time Columbia River and California ships be allowed to come into Puget Sound on their way to Orient and pick up cargoes. Apparently a more serious phase will be the opportunity of California and Oregon ships to compete for Puget Sound cargo from the Orient. This line should be protected from competition of the other two lines. Apparently the frame-up is in the interest of California operators, designed to eliminate Puget Sound purchasers. Not having before us full details, we may be mistaken in respect to what is proposed, but in any event we should have an opportunity to be fully heard before a definite conclusion is arrived at. Assuring you that we are vitally interested, and propose to back our trade interests if we can do so with substantial investment, we request postponement of definite action until tentative plans have been studied and you have had an opportunity to hear and to consider our interests. Please place this telegram before the board.

E. G. GRIGGS,
President Douglas Fir Export Co.

The following telegram, authorized by the Tacoma Chamber of Commerce, was sent to Hon. Jefferson Myers by J. F. Hickey, president of the chamber:

TACOMA, WASH., January 2, 1928.

Hon. JEFFERSON MYERS,

United States Shipping Board, Washington, D. C.:

When you were our guest at a luncheon in Tacoma last September you assured us that you would afford Tacoma every reasonable opportunity to purchase the Puget Sound oriental cargo ships. The announcement of board early in December of conditions of sale was apparently satisfactory to investors in this community willing to financially back a purchase of these ships in interest of all Puget Sound industries to end that these ships might not fall under the control of California and other interests. It is of greatest importance to Puget Sound ship interests that these cargo ships should be preserved as independent carriers free of any monopolistic control and especially free of California domination. The recent action of board apparently made by you reversing earlier order convinces us that you do not understand situation, otherwise you would not have favored clause allowing a diversion of California ships into Puget Sound service, thereby enabling them to kill the Puget Sound Line at their discretion. Further, as the papers report, Tacoma is not mentioned as an alternative port from which these ships may be operated. The clause relating to minimum service should include Tacoma with Seattle or at least be in the alternative. Believing that you intend to be fair and reasonable and not partial to Portland interests cooperating with California we are appealing to you now to secure a postponement of final action on invitation for bids until we are able to be represented before the board and present our case. Specifications as ordered by the board at its last meeting will effectually eliminate from bidding a strong association of Puget Sound interests whose chief object is to preserve in hands of an independent public service corporation the operation of these ships. If you proceed along line of those specifications without waiting on us to be heard we can interpret your action in no other light than an intention to exclude real community interests from becoming shipowners and to place Pacific shipping in hands of a monopolistic combination of ship operators. We do not believe that you would knowingly support any scheme which will exclude legitimate Puget Sound investors. Please place this telegram before the board.

J. F. HICKEY.

The minutes do not show that the telegrams sent to Commissioner Myers were read to the board or called to its attention. These two telegrams were not answered. In view of the situation the group of underwriters proposing and desirous to purchase the Puget Sound Line, in the interest of the State of Washington, employed counsel and experts in Pacific coast shipping, and directed M. G. Tennent, one of the underwriters, and mayor of Tacoma, to proceed immediately to Washington, there to examine the specifications authorized by the board and to determine whether the specifications as adopted exclude this group of proposed purchasers from the opportunity of submitting a bid, and if so to take such action as in their judgment is necessary to protect the interests of the State. This group has been advised by counsel employed after examination of the specifications for the sale of the three lines, and by practical operators acquainted with the movement of vessels on the Pacific, that it is not safe to submit a bid for the Puget Sound Line, and that it is not safe to purchase that line under the conditions of sale as now published. No purchaser of an individual line can afford to undertake to maintain such individual line on schedule in view of the ability afforded by the specifications to either one or both of the other two lines to enter its field of trade and make its losses so heavy that bankruptcy will result, or to avoid bankruptcy such line will be compelled to sell to its competitors, thereby consummating the evident effect of the existing specifications bringing about a monopoly of Pacific Ocean shipping.

The uppermost question for your board to determine now is whether you will offer the three lines for sale under the existing specifications which afford to a combination of bidders for all the lines to be thereafter under common control or whether you will change the specifications so that individual services heretofore established by the Government at the expense of more than $4,000,000 shall be sold and maintained as separate units, with guarantee of protection from intrusion.

We have been reliably informed that citizens primarily interested in the California Line and citizens primarily interested in the Oregon Line will, if the right of deviation is eliminated and guarantee of protection given, present to your board bids for the respective lines in which such primary interests exist. You need have no fear of not receiving adequate bids if on reconsideration you proceed as the merchant marine act directs, to give opportunity to each individual community to purchase its own service without facing the peril of being eaten up by a combination to establish a monopoly.

It has been stated by individual members of your board that the provision allowing deviation of vessels is deprived of its teeth by the provision that a minimum service shall be maintained.

That provision does not afford protection. The service out of California ports carries 21 vessels. The minimum service requiring 48 round voyages is capable of being economically performed by from 12 to 15 vessels, thereby enabling the owner of the California Line to use 6 of the ships purchased, free to go wherever they choose, to and from any port on the Pacific. This line will have at its disposal, without purchasing additional ships, which it has the privilege to do, a fleet of at least 5 free ships with which to absorb cargo of the Puget Sound Line, which is compelled to operate on schedule with a minimum number of 24 sailings, which makes deviation impossible. It will readily be seen that no person or group, in the face of such potential competition, can afford to buy the Puget Sound Line without being a party to an arrangement for control of the California Line.

Furthermore, the ships of the central or Oregon Line can make their minimum sailings with layover, in ample time to deviate into Washington ports. Some of its ships might deviate into Puget Sound with incoming cargo and some of its ships into California ports with incoming cargo. Or if it be desired, all of its ships might, with profit, be deviated into the territory of either the northern or southern service. The right of deviation provided by the present specifications are peculiarly favorable to the Oregon Line. This line represents the local interests and supports commercial prestige directly antagonistic to the ports of Puget Sound. Under the specifications the Columbia River will have a commercial prestige artificially created by an administrative arm of the United States, to the great prejudice of the State of Washington.

Our sole purpose in making this application is to secure a revision of the specifications under which these lines are to be sold, to the end that the group of citizens represented by this application may not be excluded from becoming purchasers by the imminent danger of the investment being wiped out through the ability of competing interests to profit at their expense.

We submit that sales shall take place under specifications giving each local community the opportunity to purchase the lines in which it is primarily interested and operate the same in preference to a combination desiring to purchase and operate under a common control, which will be, in plain language, a monopoly created contrary to law by an administrative branch of the Government.

We believe that the present specifications were adopted by the board without consideration of the interests of each local community and without consideration of the fact that if sales shall take place under the existing specifications a monopoly of the Pacific Ocean carrying trade will inevitably result. We do not wish to postpone or obstruct the sale. We favor private ownership and control of these lines. In this we are in accord with the administration policy. We ask only that the law shall be observed so that such private ownership and control of shipping may be in accordance with the merchant marine act and not in the interest of any particular port or group of ports, and particularly not in the interest of any private operator or group of operators vested with control of Pacific transportation with the power of such control to oppress private industry.

We respectfully request this board to recall the pending advertisement, to afford each community having a primary interest in these sales to point out to the board wherein each separate community is prejudiced by the present specifications, and to aid the board in formulating specifications which will preserve and maintain as separate units the lines heretofore established at Government expense.

This application involves a decision by your board whether you will adhere to your former practice of protecting each individual line so that communities specially interested may bid or whether you will depart from that practice and adhere to the present specifications which will enable a monopolistic combination to purchase all three lines to the exclusion of individual communities from the privilege of purchasing.

M. G. TENNENT,
In behalf of Washington citizens who desire to purchase the Puget Sound Line.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, this statement shows the unfairness of the Shipping Board in dealing with this situation. I reiterate what I said yesterday, that there is an attempted monopoly on the Pacific coast through the bids framed as they are to-day, with the clause in regard to interchange of ports. This statement shows very clearly the injustice and wrong in that clause.

Mr. President, in this connection I desire to say that I made several statements yesterday regarding these matters which have been challenged by Herbert Fleishhacker, of San Francisco, in the public press. I accused him of certain things. I reiterate all that I said yesterday—every word. It can be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. In an attempt to divert attention from this issue he has brought personalities into the discussion of this question. I refuse to indulge in personalities. I stand on the statements that I have made, and I ask that the American people study those statements.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HALE. I beg the Senator's pardon; I thought he was through.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator from Maine desire to make a speech?

Mr. HALE. I desire to make a very short speech.

Mr. COPELAND. Will it wait?

Mr. HALE. It will wait.

Mr. COPELAND. If the Senator will let me go along awhile——

Mr. HALE. Certainly; I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought he had given up the floor.

Mr. COPELAND. I expect to occupy the floor for a considerable time longer; but I wish to be courteous, and will yield if it is an important matter the Senator has in mind.

Mr. HALE. I want to say just a few words about the pending bill from the standpoint of the needs of the Navy.

Mr. COPELAND. Then I shall ask my friend to wait, because I am going to talk about that subject, too, and I am afraid he might make my speech before I talked, and that would spoil my speech.

Mr. HALE. There is no danger of that.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] has just told us how he feels; he referred to what the chambers of commerce in the Northwest and on the Pacific coast have said; but one does not need to get the statement he has presented, and I am not going to refer to that in detail; but I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that it does not make any difference who operates these ships or whether they make money or not, I will say to the Senator from Nevada, for the managing agents, the members of chambers of commerce, on the Pacific coast have received for the 11 months from January 1, 1927, to November 30, 1927, $600,000 compensation for operating these ships, although the ships themselves lost money. If the Shipping Board can find somebody who will buy the ships and operate them as going concerns and as business undertakings so that they are left under the American flag and serve the American people, I shall be in favor of letting such private individuals have the ships. Then we shall not have to pay out $600,000 to those who operate the ships, regardless of whether they make money or not.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from New York to read the statement which I have sent to the desk to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. COPELAND. I shall be very happy, indeed, to do so. On the particular subject, to go back to our muttons, managing agents down on the Gulf have something "pretty soft." Does the Senator know how much they received in compensation for running ships at a loss of $5,000,000? They received $1,694,727.90.

Mr. NORRIS. Who are the gentlemen to whom the Senator refers?

Mr. COPELAND. They are members of the chambers of commerce and other agencies.

Mr. NORRIS. How did they get their hands into the pot?

Mr. COPELAND. They are the agents of the Shipping Board in those sections.

Mr. NORRIS. In the different ports?

Mr. COPELAND. In the different ports.

Mr. NORRIS. They act as agents?

Mr. COPELAND. They are the agents; they are the business managers.

Mr. NORRIS. Do they get a commission?

Mr. COPELAND. It does not make any difference how much the ships lose, they get their pay.

Mr. NORRIS. Are they paid a salary?

Mr. COPELAND. How about that; I will ask the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand they are the operators. The Emergency Fleet Corporation operates but one line directly, and that is the United States Lines.

Mr. NORRIS. Do I understand that the Shipping Board says, for instance, to the chamber of commerce of some city, "You operate these ships"?

Mr. COPELAND. Not to chambers of commerce of cities, but to members of chambers of commerce.

Mr. FLETCHER. They are called the operators of the ships, and they get a commission on the business which they procure for the lines—the service they render.

Mr. COPELAND. They operate better than any surgeon of whom I know; they cut Uncle Sam open and take out a couple of million dollars every year. That is the kind of operating they do; that is what is going on.

If I were a candidate for President it would not do to talk in this vein, but do Senators think when the Gulf region is served with 116 ships, 89 of them out of the port of New Orleans, that the commissioner who is appointed from that section will ever vote to sell any of those ships? He would not do it until the infernal regions freeze over, and every Senator here knows it.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand the Senator's statement, it amounts really to a charge that when a man is appointed from the South he feels under obligation to carry on that kind of unbusinesslike proceeding merely because it has to do with his section of the country. I wish to say to the Senator that if ordinary care is used by the President in selecting members of the Shipping Board, I think it is perfectly possible to secure members for that board who are not that selfish and really dishonest, unpatriotic, and unbusinesslike.

Mr. COPELAND. Oh, I would not characterize them in that way. I confess to the Senator from Nebraska that I can not take quite the unbiased view of a question involving my State that I can of a question involving his State; that is perfectly natural; and that was contemplated by the Jones law, because it specifically provides in section 3:

> The commissioners shall be appointed with due regard to their fitness for the efficient discharge of the duties imposed on them by this act, and—
> Besides being appointed for their fitness—
> two shall be appointed from the States touching the Pacific Ocean, two from the States touching the Atlantic Ocean, one from the States touching the Gulf of Mexico, one from the States touching the Great Lakes, and one from the interior.

That indicates that the purpose was to see to it that the highest interest of each section should be subserved.

Mr. NORRIS. I would take the purpose of that law to be that by selecting as members of the board men from various sections scattered all over the country we would be more apt to secure men holding viewpoints in harmony with those obtaining in the different sections of the country. I do not think it was the intention of the law that any one of the members of the board should act in the capacity of a representative of the section from which he comes. He represents the entire country, after all, and, if he is fit to be a member of the Shipping Board, he ought to be sufficiently broad-minded and fair and honest to stand above being the advocate of a particular section. It is conceded, however, I think, that men coming from the West have a little different viewpoint from men coming from the East; they grow up and live in a somewhat different atmosphere, and they know the local conditions. So a man coming from the Great Lakes section would have the viewpoint of that section. I do not think the law intended that a man who, for instance, was appointed from the Great Lakes section should as a member of the board act as an advocate of the Great Lakes region.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a suggestion?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows that even in the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is presumed to be and actually is a quasi judicial body, we question men who are appointed on that commission; and we have realized—or at least we have thought we realized—that they came with the provincialisms and the idiosyncrasies and the views of their particular sections.

Mr. NORRIS. We do that even in the case of Supreme Court appointments, I think.

Mr. KING. Exactly. So that we must expect that the men who are placed on the Shipping Board will carry with them the views which they entertain and the views which their constituents entertain.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. TYSON. I understand the Senator's idea to be that if the member of the Shipping Board from the South, for instance, should not want to sell any of the ships because of his connection with the South there would be no ships ever taken away from southern ports. It seems to me, however, that if a majority of members of the Shipping Board wanted to take ships away from New Orleans, notwithstanding the fact that they were not sold, they could do that at any time. In other words, if any member of the board refused to sell at any time simply because he wanted to keep his own section supplied with ships the board could order those ships away at any time. So the argument along that line which we have heard, it seems to me, would not apply at all, because if the one member wanted to punish the others they could punish him by taking any number of ships away from his section. That would always be within their power, and therefore I do not think the Senator's argument would go very far so far as keeping ships indefinitely in a given locality is concerned.

Mr. COPELAND. It will not go far if the purpose of the law is to keep the ships in the hands of the Shipping Board and to operate them as Government ships so long as they are there; but no one need tell me that if a man comes from New Orleans, and an attack is made on his city, or what he believes is for the best interest of his city, he will not stand out against any action which he may think will hurt his city or State, and I honor him for his position.

Mr. TYSON. I also agree with that statement.

Mr. COPELAND. That is true, likewise, of the two members of the board from my section and the two from the Pacific coast. I have already pointed out that the only thing in the bill which is new, the only thing that changes the law or changes the situation as regards the building of ships, is the provision requiring a unanimous vote on the part of the board for the sale of ships. There is not another new thing in it. There is not any doubt at all that if the amendment which has been accepted in Committee of the Whole shall finally prevail and become a part of the law, there will never be any ships sold, but they will continue in the hands of the Shipping Board because of regional jealousies. Now I am going to leave that subject for the moment.

The Senator from Florida yesterday told about the dreadful thing that happened to the country by reason of the sale of the ships. I want to speak about this.

The Senator says we have less foreign commerce than we had in 1914. Of course, we have fewer ships, because we sold some to Henry Ford, and we scrapped some, and so forth; but what became of the ships that the Senator was worried about? What became of them? Did they go into British hands? Did they go to Australia? Were they taken over by the French or the Germans? Not at all. The law says that these ships can not be sold to any foreigner without the permission of the board, and that any person who has such a ship and does sell it to a foreigner can be put in jail and fined a lot of money and left in durance vile. You can not dispose of them to foreigners. They can be put in other United States service; they can be put in coastal trade or intercoastal trade, but they can not be sold to foreigners. Now, bear that in mind. The Shipping Board, whether it is a good or a bad board—and I think myself it is a good board——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? Is there a limit of time on this provision in the law prohibiting the sale to foreign corporations or foreigners?

Mr. COPELAND. No, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. It runs forever?

Mr. COPELAND. It runs forever. When we have sold these ships there has been a five-year limit, that they must be operated in a given service for not less than five years; but when it comes to perpetual ownership they can never leave the American flag.

Mr. FLETCHER. Except by consent of the board.

Mr. COPELAND. Without the consent of the board.

What has become of these ships? Where are they? Are they carrying the commerce of other nations? Are they being operated for the benefit of Kamchatka or some other place? No. Here is what has happened to them:

We have the west coast of South America, the Grace Line, six ships. We have the east coast of South America, the McCormick Line, six ships. Then we have the other McCormick Line. What is the name of that, Senator; do you remember? They have six ships. Then we have the Export Mediterranean Line. Let me show you what we did or what we are proposing to do to that line. I want you to see how outrageous we are in the treatment of the people who have bought these lines. I want the Senator from Nebraska, who is so just and fair in all matters, to see what has happened.

Here is the independent offices appropriation bill; and the amount asked for by the Shipping Board was increased by $1,400,000; for what? In order that some of these reserve ships of the Shipping Board might carry coal into Mediterranean ports.

We sold 21 ships of the Export Line to American citizens. They operate into the Mediterranean. We did that only last year or the year before; and now, for fear American citizens may make money, we appropriate $1,400,000 to take some of our reserve ships and put them in competition with this privately owned line.

In this connection, I want to send forward for printing in the RECORD a telegram of protest from the manager of this line. I do not believe that the people of this country are willing to have a private concern which we have encouraged, and a concern to which we have sold ships, so unjustly dealt with as by appropriating money to run ships in competition with it.

There being no objection, the telegram referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., January 27, 1928.

HON. ROYAL S. COPELAND,
United States Senator from New York,
United States Senate Office Building:

Have noted action by House of Representatives appropriating approximately $1,000,000 to assist coal exporters in developing coal-export trade by using Shipping Board tonnage for this purpose. We already handicapped by indirect aid furnished cotton and grain shippers from Gulf to Mediterranean ports by supplying extra tonnage for this purpose and at rates at which no private operator of American tonnage can compete. In view liberal aid furnished coal exporters, cotton and grain exporters, can not understand the unfriendly attitude of Congress toward your bill providing mail subvention for privately owned American tonnage in overseas trade. Having purchased 21 vessels of American registry from the United States Shipping Board and agreed to maintain a regular service from North Atlantic to Mediterranean and Black Sea ports, we had every reason to assume that Government aid would be forthcoming and that the development of an American merchant marine would be encouraged, as provided for under the marine act of 1920 and other existing legislation. If privately owned American shipping is to be left suspended from a limb to compete with the heavily subsidized fleets of French, Italian, German, and British owners, the future offers little encouragement for the private owner of American tonnage in the overseas trade. Therefore strongly urge that Congress give some consideration to the present plight of the only privately owned fleet under the American flag in the transoceanic trade, which would be materially relieved by the passage of your bill.

HENRY HERBERMANN,
President the Export Steamship Corporation.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. TYSON. From the report of the United States Shipping Board, on page 5, I read this:

As a result of the establishment of trade routes by the board, steamships flying the American flag have again appeared in the principal ports of the world for the first time in 75 years, not a single one of them in competition with privately owned American-flag vessels.

Mr. COPELAND. Correct. That is the truth. When was that report printed? What is the date of it?

Mr. TYSON. This is of date July 1, 1927.

Mr. COPELAND. And it is true to-day; but if we appropriate this million dollars, if the Senate concurs in that addition to the bill, it will mean that we will be competing with the Export Line to the Mediterranean, and then in the next report made by the Shipping Board that statement could not be truthfully made.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator has been too generous in his concession toward the fairness of the board. I have heard many complaints from individuals who claim to know the facts that corporations and individuals who had acquired ships from the Shipping Board and put them into overseas trade had their routes paralleled by the Shipping Board at rates which made it almost impossible for them to survive. In other words, the Shipping Board pushed the sales of its ships, got ship lines established, and then went into competition with ships which it had sold; and when men bought boats from the Shipping Board there was no certainty that parallel routes would not be established which would result in the destruction of the capital which they had invested and compel them to abandon the enterprise in which they had embarked.

Mr. NORRIS. That would seem, however, to be rather contradictory to the report which has just been read from by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TYSON].

Mr. KING. I do not believe that report is accurate.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, I should like to ask the Senator from New York a question. I am reminded of this question by what has just been said about rival lines composed of ships formerly owned by the Government and sold to private parties.

I should like to inquire, if the Senator can give me the information, whether these ships that have been sold to private corporations and then operated have, after the sale and their operation by the private parties, made money, or whether they have lost money?

Mr. COPELAND. Some of them have made money. I can not answer for all of them. Some have made money.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. KING. I want perhaps to modify or at least supplement the statement I made a moment ago. Some of those ships which I stated were operated in competition with vessels which had been sold were operated under MO–4 contracts; but back of it, of course, was the Shipping Board.

The Shipping Board made the MO–4 contracts. They guaranteed no losses, of course, upon the part of those who had entered into those contracts; and they, with no losses, and receiving a percentage upon the gross returns, did not care whom they injured, and they went into competition with men who in good faith had purchased ships and were trying to develop our merchant marine. There the board did wrong; and, of course, the operations under those MO–4 contracts in effect were operations by the Government.

Mr. NORRIS. I am informed that those contracts have all been modified. The Senator from Washington so informs me.

Mr. KING. They have been modified, it is true, but nevertheless some exist; and to-day men are operating ships under modified MO–4 contracts to the great injury of the Treasury of the United States and the American people.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator from New York will permit me to make this interruption and observation, I may say here that when the Shipping Board sold ships to private corporations it would not seem to me to be the proper thing for the Shipping Board immediately to go into competition with the ships they had sold to private parties; and yet I can not help but think of this:

We have sold these ships because they were no good. They were of no value. We could not operate them and make any money, and we sell them; and the persons who buy them operate them and seem to get along in some way, and do not have the investment that the Government had in the ships, because they buy them for a very much less figure than it would cost to get them in any other way. Now, if we are selling the ships because they are in such condition that they can not operate profitably, it seems to me that we are contradicting ourselves if we have to stay out of competition, after we do sell them, with ships that we have sold because they were of no account.

Mr. COPELAND. We agree to do that when we sell them.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that; but we say on the one hand that we are going to sell these ships because it does not pay to operate them, and then somebody else operates them, and we say "Now, we will get out of the way and not compete with you," when as a matter of fact we have decided before we sold them that they were not any good.

Mr. COPELAND. I am not going to have any controversy with the Senator or anybody else on the comparative merits of private and public operation. Of course, that is what the Senator has in his mind.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I am not thinking of that, I will say to the Senator now. I do believe that if the Government is going to operate ships it ought to do so through a corporation, and it ought to give that corporation as much freedom as a private party would have. In other words, it ought to do it on a business basis entirely. If we consider as a matter of policy that we ought to operate, even though it is at a loss we will have to pay something out of the Treasury to keep them going. That is another proposition, but an entirely different one. No matter whether it is going to be at a loss or at a profit, if we are going to operate them at all we ought to operate them on a business basis entirely.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator wants them operated in accordance with a business policy; and yet it is proposed to hamstring the board by making it impossible to sell a ship, no matter whether it is a good ship or not, unless you get seven votes in favor of it.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not like to disagree with the Senator from New York and go contrary to his judgment, but I will have to say that I do not believe that is very important, as I look at it. I would vote for a provision that the Shipping Board should not be allowed to sell ships without the consent of Congress. I think the experience in the past has demonstrated that something of that kind ought to be done, because I do not agree with those Senators who say that as long as a unanimous vote is required there never will be any ships sold. I realize that the Supreme Court has held that the President has the absolute right, without giving any reasons for it, to remove every member of the Shipping Board. He appoints them, and he can remove them as he sees fit and when he sees fit for any reason that he sees fit. If the President of the United States wanted to have all the ships sold, as it seems President Coolidge does—and I mention that without any criticism; I realize that it is a question that has two sides to it—he can bring about their sale by removing every member of the board, if it is necessary, and appointing only men who are in favor of selling the ships.

Mr. COPELAND. Now, Mr. President, I will hasten on. At this late hour it is a shame to keep the Senate in session. I will hurry through.

I want to complete the list of ships which I have spoken of as having been sold. The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] spoke about it the other day, lamenting the fact that these ships have been sold. I want to get into the RECORD the fact that we have 73 ships: Including the west coast of South America, the Grace Line, 6 ships; the east coast of South America, the McCormick Line, 6 ships; the second McCormick Line, 6 ships; the Export Line to the Mediterranean, 21 ships; the Munson Line to the east coast of South America, 4 ships; the Clyde Line to South America, 7 ships; the American and East African Line, 6 ships; the Dollar Round-the-World Line, 7 ships; the San Francisco-Oriental Line, 5 ships; and the Admiral Line from Seattle to the Orient, 5 ships. That is a total of 73 ships; but they are running under the American flag and serving the American people.

Mr. President, certainly no loyal American can be proud of the fact that our country has failed to devise a system that will keep the American flag on the high seas. Since the end of the World War Great Britain, besides building up her Navy, has added 5,000,000 tons to her merchant ships. Just think of it—5,000,000 tons added to the merchant shipping of Great Britain since the war! France, Italy, Germany, and Japan have engaged in shipbuilding. England and these other four countries together have increased their tonnage 7,774,000 tons—peace ships, merchant ships, nearly 8,000,000 tons since the war—besides rehabilitating their navies.

While these great maritime powers have added nearly 8,000,000 tons to their merchant shipping, the United States has done nothing. There is not a keel laid down in a shipyard of this country for transoceanic service or for foreign service to be operated under the American flag—not one. While these other countries have added 8,000,000 tons to their merchant marines, not one ton has been added in all this time to the American merchant marine.

What is wrong with our country? Why are we lagging behind the smallest of maritime countries?

When we had had but a quarter of a century of national existence we had built up a merchant marine equal to that of Great Britain. In 1830 we were carrying 90 per cent of the American foreign trade in American ships.

I have here a diagram which no doubt Senators have seen, but it is most graphic, showing what has happened in these years to the American merchant marine.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has mentioned the time in our history when our merchant marine was carrying a very large percentage of our produce.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. What about our Navy at that time? Did we not have a large Navy then?

Mr. COPELAND. No. I am with the Senator in his position.

Mr. NORRIS. That brings to mind the claim that is made that in order to have a large merchant marine we necessarily must have a large Navy. The history of our country rather demonstrates the contrary, it seems to me.

Mr. COPELAND. If we are to have a large Navy, we have to have a large merchant marine. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. NORRIS. But the reverse of that is not true.

Mr. COPELAND. When we get into that matter, the Senator and I will be on the same side, there is no question about that.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator's statement of a moment ago may be subject to misinterpretation by some. It is quite true that, following the war, Great Britain and Germany, as well as some other European countries, built a large number of ships, and we have built but few since the war. But the fact is that after the war was over Great Britain's merchant ships, by reason of the submarine activities during the war of Germany, had been destroyed; she had considerably more than 8,000,000 tons of her overseas merchant ships destroyed, and Germany's fleet was entirely wiped out.

So they were compelled immediately to begin the construction of ships, whereas in the United States we had nearly 2,900 ships, big and little; and I am not including those that belonged to the Navy. We had a surplus of ships. We did not know what to do with them. We have hundreds of them now locked up in harbors rotting and deteriorating. So it would have been an act of folly for the Government or for private persons to have begun investing capital in the construction of ships, when we had such a large number.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I think the Senator has made a good point, and a little later I shall point out that the specific difficulty we have now relates to these big ships of ours, which carried a major part of our passenger and freight traffic. I will speak about that, but I think the point raised by the Senator is a very fitting criticism, because they did as he has said, and they had to replace them in a very large way.

Anyway, in 1830 we were carrying 90 per cent of the American foreign trade in American ships. As late as 1860 we carried nearly 70 per cent of our trade in American ships. In spite of the high-powered shipbuilding incident to the war, we were not able during that period to carry even one-half of our foreign trade in our own ships. To-day hardly more than one-quarter of our commerce is carried by our own bottoms.

During the war we spent billions of money to develop an American merchant marine. During the past seven years the Government has expended almost $200,000,000 to operate the ships owned by the United States Shipping Board.

In spite of these efforts, in spite of this unceasing flow of gold, we have a merchant marine which is steadily declining in tonnage and in efficiency. What are we going to do about it?

I had hoped that this bill that has been brought before us might be a bill which would encourage the building of an American merchant marine, but I have already shown to the Senate that there is not one single constructive thing in the bill, nothing in it except this stop-look-and-listen warning to capital that it must not invest in American ships or American shipping.

The World War developed every industry in America. We find ourselves with all the machinery and equipment, with the acreage and facilities to supply and feed the world. We can not prosper unless we have permanent and dependable arrangements to move our goods to the uttermost parts of the earth and to bring their products to our shores. Old markets must be refreshed and new markets discovered. There must be a means of advertising our wares, of getting them to the foreign markets, of bringing back raw materials and such needed substances and products as are not to be found in America.

This transportation and sale must be accomplished in the most economical manner possible. It must be in the hands of dependable friends, and there are no more dependable friends than our own nationals, who in addition to their patriotism have a selfish interest in the maritime welfare of this country.

As has been said, we are at the parting of the ways. We must choose between Government ownership and operation of the ships, or we must find an effective means of stimulating private endeavor, and the building and operation of merchant ships by private citizens of the United States. Possibly a combination of these two policies may be provided.

Our merchant marine is dying at the top. Unless there are replacements in our major lines we must steadily decline as a first-class maritime power.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I am in entire accord with the Senator, and he and I are together on this ship question, but how does he propose immediately to bring private capital into this proposition?

Mr. COPELAND. Before I close these formal remarks I shall tell the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. Of course, the Senator asks the question as to why these things are so, why there has been a constant decline in American shipping, and all that. He answers his own question; that is to say, there are but two methods by which the situation may be handled, either by direct Government ownership or by a system of subsidy. The reason why we do not have ship subsidy is very evident to the Senator. It is to me after having tried for years to get it. One reason is that a number of Senators and Representatives are conscientiously opposed to the idea of subsidies. The other is that a great many Representatives, and a few Senators, are afraid of their constituents—are afraid to vote for a ship subsidy and then go home and enter upon a campaign of explanation. I personally know that to be true because of my interviews and contact with a very great number of the Members of the House. Of course, I am not going to talk about the Senate at this particular time; but, absolutely, they are afraid of their constituents on the proposition.

Speaking for myself, I know of no one question to-day being considered by the American people that I would rather go and take the platform to advocate than the question of a ship subsidy, either a tonnage subsidy or a mail subvention, because there is not only the commercial argument back of it but there is also the patriotic impulse back of it that will enable one to appeal to the people. Nevertheless, we do not do it. The practical question is this, I want to say to my friend from New York, agreeing with him as I do on the fundamental principles involved: How does he intend now to keep the flag on the sea unless he does it by the method proposed by this bill?

Mr. COPELAND. I will be very happy—and that is the only excuse I have for consuming the time of the Senate—to try to show a way to do it, and I am going to hurry through and get this formal address into the RECORD, in order that I may present an amendment to the bill which, if it is adopted, I believe will be a beginning of the solution of the problem.

Our major operations are performed by the United States Line. In this line is just one ship capable of functioning as a first-class ocean liner. She was a gift to us of a kind Providence. The Leviathan, by fortuitous circumstance, was in an American port and became ours upon our entry into the war. The two ships planned by the Germans to run with her—the Majestic and the Berengaria—are the backbone of the present English fleet. We attempted to run the Agamemnon and Mount Vernon, sister ships, but they are not of the type of the Leviathan, and never were. They never were fitted for the North Atlantic service, and never will be, no matter how much money we spend on them. They will be only a stop gap. Yet it was explained to us in the Committee on Appropriations that those two ships could be reconditioned in a year and could fill in the time in the North Atlantic service until private enterprise or some other method might be found to put real ships into that service.

We are attempting to maintain a first-class service with ships unsuited for the North Atlantic service, small in tonnage and slow of speed. All you have to do is to look at what we have—the President Roosevelt with a speed of 17 knots, the George Washington with a speed of 18 knots, the Republic with a speed of 14½ knots, and the President Harding with a speed of 17 knots—competing with 28-knot ships.

If we are to maintain such a service as every proud American would desire his country to maintain, there must be replacements and the immediate expenditure of anywhere from thirty to fifty millions of dollars to make this line anything like a satisfactory one.

Then, in addition, the Senator from Washington said on yesterday that we must spend $25,000,000 a year for 15 years to put this American shipping of the Shipping Board upon a foundation which will make it acceptable to the country.

Because we have no vessels capable of carrying the mails in competition with foreign bottoms, the United States Government is expending annually a million and a half of dollars to vessels of foreign registry, mostly British, for the carrying of our mails. Because we have not had enterprise enough to make it possible for the building of capital ships to carry the commerce of our country we are contributing to Great Britain a million and a half dollars to carry on this service.

No one can doubt—certainly I do not—that for many years to come the Shipping Board will have an important function to perform. There are ports to be served and countries to be reached, services which will not attract private capital for many years, if ever.

I would not have these services destroyed. The fourth and fifth classes of ships must be operated by somebody. The national interests demand it. We have the machinery in the Shipping Board to carry on these services, and in my judgment Congress should be liberal in the appropriations necessary to maintain such services.

It must be somebody's business, too, to provide "spot ships," ships which can be called upon in time of industrial or agricultural emergency to move the products of American factory and American farm.

Let me add one more word, Mr. President, and then I suppose that if we take a recess while I am on the floor I will have the floor when we meet again on Monday.

Mr. NORRIS. At least nobody would be so discourteous as to take the floor away from the Senator.

Mr. SWANSON. If we take a recess, we will resume exactly where we were when we took a recess.

Mr. COPELAND. It is cool, and as a doctor I realize how necessary it is for Senators to have a square meal and all that sort of thing, but I just want to say a word further, and then I will be willing to have the recess taken, provided I may still have the floor when we meet on Monday, because I want to finish what I have to say.

I want to point out that the Cunard Line and the White Star Line, these great competitors for the business of the North Atlantic, are building tremendous ships. The Germans are building two ships, and $20,000,000 of American money is going into the building of those ships.

Mr. President, I ask that at this point in my remarks there be printed the proposal which has been made by Mr. Wilder and his associates to establish a new merchant ocean service. I desire to have it printed at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROPOSAL TO ESTABLISH A NEW AMERICAN OCEAN SERVICE, PRESENTED TO THE SHIPPING BOARD BY LAURENCE R. WILDER JANUARY 24, 1928

Gentlemen of the United States Shipping Board:

This is the proposal of the Transoceanic Corporation of the United States, organized and backed entirely by Americans, to establish a modern ocean transportation system to fly the American flag across the North Atlantic, one of our most important and essential trade routes.

We now propose to build six ships in American shipyards capable of crossing the ocean in four days from dock to dock, more than 900 feet long, 90 feet beam, with a displacement of at least 35,000 tons, with accommodation for 800 passengers in greater comfort than exists on any trans-Atlantic liner of any nationality to-day, and with ample space for mail and 1,000 tons of express cargo. We propose to maintain sailings three times a week from each side of the Atlantic.

These ships will have a continuous sea speed of 33 knots per hour and a maximum of 35 knots per hour—substantially 9 knots faster than the present fastest liner.

Because aircraft and ships are already correlated in the navies and in some commercial ways, these ships have been designed as airplane carriers. The funnels and masts will be set to one side of the deck and the whole top deck will lie open and clear as an airplane landing field.

We are here to ask the Shipping Board to declare first that this is an essential service under section 7 of the merchant marine act of 1920.

To make our project possible we request, second, a revision of the loan provisions of the merchant marine act, so as to make possible the use of Government credit facilities in the form of a construction loan of three-fourths the cost of building ships, at the Government's current rate of interest. For six ships this would amount to $94,500,000.

This loan is to be protected by prior liens on the ships themselves and will be retired in 20 years by amortization.

We request, third, revision of the mail carrying act to establish rates not as a subsidy but commensurate with the new speed and frequency of the service, its cost, and its utility. Authority would be given to the Post Office Department to enter into ocean mail-carrying contracts for periods not shorter than 5 years nor longer than 10 years.

Fourth, and last, because approved insurance whether here or abroad is limited on any single ship to $9,000,000, we request protection in case of total loss in the form of cancellation of the loan against that ship to the extent not covered by amortization and insurance.

We hope also for provision by which our crews, or a part of them, can be enrolled in the Naval Reserve.

In every way we look only to such general legislation as will encourage other American capital to follow our lead. We do not ask anything for ourselves alone and we are sure that what we ask is justified by sound business and economic principles.

The investment from private capital of about $50,000,000 forms a part of our plan, and we have received assurances from entirely American sources of sufficient financial support to warrant us in making our proposal. This is the first time in more than 50 years that private American capital in any important amount has come forward to advance America's prestige and safety at sea. When our plan is taken up for official consideration we will lay the details of our financial support before the proper department of the Government.

We submit that the Government will by this loan have at its service six fast, gigantic airplane carriers, with crews trained in actual service at sea, for all of which the Government will have expended nothing. The advance of 75 per cent of their construction cost will be repaid with interest. To duplicate such powerful units for its own strictly naval use the Government would need to appropriate their full cost of construction and, in addition, bear the full cost of operation and training. In time of peace these ships will pay their own way. In time of war they will be deadly units of our armed forces at sea. Their readiness will cost the taxpayers nothing.

Fast ships have been built and proved practical by the Navy. We ourselves have recently completed in our yard at Camden, N. J., the Navy's newest fighting unit, the airplane carrier Saratoga. She is a pioneer vessel. The research and experience gained in designing and constructing her we now propose to apply to commercial vessels.

Foreign nations are building new ships of modern, fast design with which to compete for the North Atlantic trade. To a considerable extent they are using American capital with which to do it. They are not reconditioning old ships. If we are to be successful in maintaining an American merchant marine against them, it must be done by building better ships than theirs.

Across the North Atlantic flows a stream of about 300,000 first-class and cabin passengers. Nearly three-fourths of them are citizens of the United States. The fact that 12 per cent of the total traffic volume is already handled by slower American ships indicates the volume that would be handled by this faster, more comfortable American service. The tendency to use fast ships is unmistakable. It has resulted in the gradual elimination of older, slower vessels and their conversion into cabin ships as a means of squeezing a few more years of productive life from them. We propose to give these passengers a better and more frequent service than any now available and at strictly competitive rates.

Time is the essence of mail service. We offer a new frequency and speed, reducing transit time from one-third to one-half the present from dock to dock and expediting it still further by use of shore-to-ship and ship-to-shore airplane service. The importance of this economy of time to a country of such vast financial and commercial power as ours must be obvious.

The rapid marketing abroad of from 12 to 15 per cent of our excess manufacturing production is essential to our high standard of living and our continued prosperity. A triweekly movement of express cargoes at a speed 10 knots faster than now generally available should commend itself. In 1926 our American boats carried only slightly more than 4 per cent of the 1,969,555 tons carried in combination cargo and passenger ships between United States and North and South Atlantic ports of Europe.

Our dependence upon foreign ships is well known. We carry less than 30 per cent of our production in ships of our own flag and even this percentage is decreasing alarmingly each year. Our experience at the beginning of the war, when foreign ships on which we had depended were called away from us to serve their own people while our goods destined for overseas shipment piled up on our docks, and our experience again when the general strike and the long-continued coal strike in England diverted foreign ships from their usual cargoes, should leave no doubt of the necessity of our owning and controlling the ships on which our prosperity rests.

The way to begin the restoration of our merchant marine is by inaugurating a trans-Atlantic service for passengers, express cargoes, and mail. Thus it has always been in the long history of every change of transportation. Faster means of conveyance have always been given first to passengers and mail, later to freight. The establishment on the North Atlantic of such a service as we here propose will give an impulse to the reestablishment of our entire merchant marine on every sea. Ships such as those we have designed, I venture to say, may revolutionize ocean service.

During the war we built 8,000,000 tons of commercial ships. Since then we have built none for foreign service. But our competitors abroad since then have built also 8,000,000 tons of ships, faster and more economical than our war-emergency vessels. They have eclipsed us at sea.

But now a new era is opening. The development of fast, large ships by the navies is certain to be applied to ships of commerce. High speed is here already. Until now it has been used exclusively for ships of war. We propose to use it for commerce.

Aircraft and ships have been already combined in the navies. They fit together and serve each other naturally. The commercial ships of the future are bound to make use of this new service.

The successful operation of a passenger service at a 33-knot speed well may be followed by a 25-knot service for freight. We are the leaders of the world in mechanical skill and ingenuity. The development by American designers of cargo ships able to load and discharge bulk freight with great rapidity should not be long delayed.

We propose now, however, to limit our beginning to a passenger, express cargo, and mail service across the North Atlantic.

That this is an essential route appears to us obvious. Excluding traffic to and from Canada, more than 70 per cent of the total passenger traffic between our country and all foreign ports crosses the North Atlantic. We find that of the total volume of United States mail to all foreign ports approximately 76,000,000 pounds, 38,000,000, or 50 per cent, is carried on the North Atlantic.

Of the total exported and imported manufactured foodstuffs and semi and finished manufactures of all kinds more than one-half are carried to or from European countries. Of this very large volume by far the greatest percentage represents western European traffic. In other words, taking into account all the classifications served by this proposed line, more than half of the entire traffic between the United States and the markets of the world is carried in the North Atlantic trade. This proves conclusively the essential character of this proposed route.

Our board of directors is being formed. When constituted the names of its members will be announced. I am able to say, however, at this time that they will be men of national reputation in their respective fields.

This proposal is the result of more than two years of careful preparation. Within our own organization and with the help of qualified authorities in other fields, we conducted our study of the problem confronting the American merchant marine and worked out the proposal which we now offer as its solution—ships of high speed incorporating airplane service, frequent sailings, and short periods of rest in port.

The specifications and design of the new ships have been submitted to an expert committee of naval architects and marine engineers. Their report approving the design will be presented to you at this hearing by the chairman, Prof. Herbert C. Sadler, of the University of Michigan.

The report of the committee on propulsion will be presented to you by J. W. Metten, president of the Marine Engineering Corporation, of Philadelphia.

The analysis of the business conditions under which these ships must be operated will also be presented here by Dr. Simon Litman, professor of economics and transportation at the University of Illinois, the chairman of our committee which studied this phase of our project.

The report of the committee on operation will be presented by J. Howland Gardner, vice president of the New England Steamship Co. In addition, we have had as consultants Sir Charles Parsons and E. H. B. Anderson, of the Parsons Marine Steam Turbine Co., and Messrs. Blache and Hollings, of the Burmeister & Wayne Co., all of whom are recognized authority on turbine and Diesel propulsion.

The committee reports do not, for obvious reasons, include their estimates and findings as to revenues and expenses. I can, however, say that their conclusions indicate beyond question that this undertaking will be so economically sound as to make certain, if our requests are met, the creation and permanence of this service.

We approached the problem of faster, better, and more frequent ocean operation, with the advantage of a highly trained technical personnel in our organization and with the experience of considerable work of first importance accomplished by our company, the American Brown Boveri Electric Corporation. We are the builders of a new turbine generator now being installed by the United Electric Light & Power Co., of New York City, in its Hell Gate station. This turbine is twice as large as any electric unit in the world. It produces 252,000 horsepower in a single unit and by itself alone is great enough to carry the entire electric load of Manhattan, including the operation of elevators, lights, surface lines, and subways. There are also running on the tracks of the Pennsylvania Railroad seven of the largest electric passenger locomotives in the world, which come from our workshop.

It may be of interest to note that we are also the producers of the magneto used by Lindbergh, Chamberlain, and other aviators, which are standard equipment in the Army and Navy airplanes and on the Wright whirlwind motor.

We are especially proud of the airplane carrier Saratoga, recently delivered from our Camden yard to the Navy and assigned to the Pacific Fleet. She was the first of her type to be built, and we worked out in every detail with the Navy the design of that ship. Such ships we now propose.

In building ships we must look beyond to-day or to-morrow. The life of a ship is 25 years. Chamberlain's flight from the Leviathan, commercial experiences in the Mediterranean, the announcement of plans to fit the Isle de France for airplane service, and the established practice of the navies, all point to the inevitable joint operation of aircraft and ships.

Our new commercial ships, designed with this abundant experience behind us, are airplane carriers.

No foreign navy in the world owns or is building anything like them. They can maintain 33 knots for 7,000 sea miles and can go around the world at fleet speed without refueling. Their normal complement in commercial use will be 24 airplanes. In national emergency they can be quickly changed to carry almost 100 airplanes, each ready to fly. Their very high speed, their unequaled radius of action, and their striking power in the air will make them the finest naval vessels afloat in the time of emergency.

The disarmament conference of 1922 does not affect them. They are ships built for commerce. Airplanes and airports are not military units, whether ashore or afloat.

To-day we are unable to protect our Pacific possessions or to aid an ally in far eastern waters because we have no naval stations west of Hawaii. Ships which can sail around the world at fleet speed or race for 7,000 miles at 35 knots without refueling do not need naval bases. No merchant ship has ever been designed that more perfectly meets the requirements both of the merchant marine and the Navy.

We plan to keep these ships moving on their commercial routes, as our packet boats and clipper ships were driven hard a century or less ago. Fast ships, frequent sailing, and short periods in port made our merchant marine the greatest in the world from 1816 to the Civil War. The same principles applied to our industries built up our great country. The same principles again brought success to our railroads, even as recently as in the past five years, when they increased their net operating incomes by approximately 30 per cent under a wage scale greater even than the war-time rates and in a period when their freight income increased by less than 10 per cent and their passenger traffic actually diminished.

There is another factor now available—our greater mechanical efficiency. American public utilities have cut their fuel costs more than in half and increased their production of power by new and better equipment. By fuel economy alone our railroads saved $50,000,000 in the last five years.

Intensive use of equipment on the sea requires a harbor which can be entered and left without delay. Arrangements to use the French port of Le Havre have been completed and in England the port of call will be either Southampton or Plymouth. Satisfactory cooperation from the necessary railroads of both countries is assured.

The selection of a terminal in the United States is still an open question. It will be either on Long Island or somewhere along the coast of New England, within easy reach of New York City, and served by trunk railroads. On both sides of the Atlantic special trains will be operated to ship side for convenience of passengers.

We will gather together an operating personnel of American citizens experienced in transportation on our railroads and in our shipping, coastwise and foreign. The advice and help which we have already received from such men reveals their substantial interest in this plan.

We are prepared with careful thought, approved designs, and sufficient private capital to make a sincere, forward-looking effort to solve the problem of the American merchant marine, with cooperation of the Government but without expense to it, by building ships as much better than those of our foreign rivals as theirs are better than ours to-day, and by operating them in the way our packet boats and clipper ships, our great industries and our railroads have been operated with substantial success.

We propose nothing new. Every element that enters into our ship design and plan of operation has been tested and proved by use elsewhere. We propose only to bring these well-tried factors together into a ship in ocean service.

We are confident that in this way a start can be made to reestablish an adequate self-supporting American merchant marine strong enough to compete with the merchant marine of the world, numerous enough to assure us transportation to our foreign markets, loyal enough to protect our exporters against discriminating rates and able to meet the needs of the Nation, both in periods of normal trade and in times of national peril.

In 1816 the initiative of two Americans launched a merchant marine second to none. We propose to fly the American flag at the masthead of a fleet of merchant ships which by every test of fitness will command the united support of every loyal American.

Mr. JONES. I ask the Senator from New York if he will not yield just a moment so that we may adopt the amendment presented by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. KING. I want to object to that.

Mr. WATSON. What does the amendment provide?

Mr. JONES. It puts the minor officials under the civil service.

Mr. WILLIS. Does the Senator from Utah object?

Mr. KING. I object.

Mr. JONES. It is pending.

Mr. KING. We will discuss it on Monday.

Mr. JONES. I had hoped that the Senator would be able to get it adopted, and that if the House should strike it out, or anything of that kind, it could go to conference and be worked out.

Mr. KING. I think the Senate will reject it. I want to discuss it a little.

Mr. JONES. I do not think the Senate will reject it at all.

Mr. KING. Let us give them a chance, when there are more Senators present.

Mr. JONES. The Senator from Maryland would possibly prefer to discuss it on Monday.

Mr. BRUCE. I would like to say just a few words about the amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. I will yield to the Senator from Maryland for that purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, if there is going to be a contest over his amendment there will probably be a roll call. I would suggest, inasmuch as it is 5 o'clock now, that the Senator take it up on Monday.

Mr. BRUCE. I am perfectly willing to have it go over until Monday.

Mr. JONES. Does the Senator from New York desire to say anything further to-night?

Mr. COPELAND. Just another word and then I shall conclude for this evening.

I want Senators to bear in mind what I believe to be a fact, that the pending bill, which the country has been led to believe is a bill which will give us an American merchant marine, has not one single thing of substance in it. The country has asked for bread and has been tendered a stone. There is nothing in it which will change the situation and the board will still be unable to sell any ships.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. JONES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. McMASTER. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry resolutions adopted by the board of directors of the South Dakota Wheat Growers' Association in reference to the equalization-fee principle of the McNary-Haugen bill.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the principles of the McNary-Haugen bill will afford agriculture the benefits of a part of our protective policy and will aid cooperatives, while the principles of the substitutes will hinder the cooperatives and their aid to agriculture at best will be doubtful: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the board of directors of the South Dakota Wheat Growers' Association in regular meeting assembled, That the equalization-fee principle is essential to the success of farm relief legislation; that it appears after careful study and public discussion that substitutes not embodying the equalization principle can not be accepted in justice to agriculture; and be it further

Resolved, That, in our opinion, unless legislation is enacted embodying these vital working parts agriculture will feel that it has been betrayed.

C. W. CROES, President.
B. M. DICKINSON, Secretary.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas presented a letter in the nature of a memorial from O. B. Robinson, 625–627 Center Market, Washington, D. C., remonstrating against the passage of legislation proposing to abolish the Center Market in the District of Columbia on January 21, 1929, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. KING presented resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Ogden, Utah, favoring the making of such annual appropriations as that the forest roads and trails systems can be completed within a period of 20 years, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. COPELAND presented memorials of sundry citizens of Albany, N. Y., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Brookhart bill relative to the distribution of motion pictures in the various motion-picture zones of the country, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. BINGHAM presented resolutions adopted by Stonington Council, No. 5, of Stonington; Washington Council, No. 7, of Noank; and Roosevelt Council, No. 8, of New London, all of the Junior Order United American Mechanics, in the State of Connecticut, protesting against the repeal of the national origin provisions of the existing immigration law, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a resolution adopted at the annual meeting of the Connecticut Farm Bureau Federation at Hartford, Conn., favoring the making of additional appropriations for agricultural education through the extension service and county farm bureaus, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

RESOLUTIONS OF TENNESSEE FARM BUREAU FEDERATION

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry resolutions adopted at the annual farm bureau convention at Nashville, Tenn., January 11, 1928.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED AT THE ANNUAL FARM BUREAU CONVENTION, NASHVILLE, JANUARY 11, 1928

The Tennessee Farm Bureau Federation assembled in annual convention at Nashville January 10 and 11, 1928, hereby expresses its approval of the conduct and management of the organization, and commends its capable president, Joe F. Porter, and his efficient coworkers for their faithful and loyal service in making the Tennessee Farm Bureau the outstanding farmers' organization in our State for the advancement of the great agricultural industry of Tennessee, and one of the strongest State farm bureau federations in the South.

The splendid condition of the finances of the organization, as exhibited by the report of the secretary, is highly gratifying and indicates very clearly the care and good judgment exercised in the handling of same.

The success of the Tennessee Supplies Association in furnishing the various county bureaus desiring it commercial fertilizers, insecticides, commercial feeding stuffs, etc., thus providing the members an opportunity for the cooperative purchasing of these materials is commendable, and the county bureaus are urged to take advantage of this service.

We desire also to express our appreciation of the valuable service rendered the organization by the Farm Bureau News. This service supplies the members, in an interesting and readable manner, needed information relative to the organization which is helpful and valuable; and its editorials are timely and inspiring.

We affirm our faith in the National Farm Bureau Federation and we unhesitatingly express our approval of the principles and policies as set forth in the resolutions adopted at its annual meeting held in Chicago December 5, 6, and 7 last. We especially indorse its commendation of the action of the Sixty-ninth Congress in passing the farm relief bill, which it had approved; and we stand squarely by its declaration that "Commodity marketing and surplus control are inseparable." And "That cooperative organizations, however, can not bear the load unaided."

We insist that legislation for the relief of agriculture shall be enacted embodying the principles contained in the McNary-Haugen bill, with such changes as further study and investigations may suggest will make the legislation more effectively accomplish the purposes contemplated in its enactment. We emphatically deny that legislation of this character applying to agriculture is more "economically unsound" or more "paternalistic" than our present high tariff, which through the radical restriction of the importation into this country of manufactured products, has placed industry upon its present high peak of prosperity, while contributing materially to the impoverished condition of the farmer in that, while he has been compelled to buy his supplies in a highly protected market, he has at the same time been forced to sell his products in a world-wide market.

We favor the immediate operation of the great power plant at Muscle Shoals, preferably by lease upon such terms as will adequately safeguard the public interests and guarantee the production of nitrate fertilizers as the primary purpose of the operation. If such lease can not be made, then we insist that the plant shall be operated by the Government for the purpose herein suggested.

We recognize the great value of electricity on the farm for light and power purposes. Therefore we earnestly urge the early development of the great water-power resources of our State and the distribution of a sufficient amount of this power throughout the rural sections as will adequately meet the needs of our farm and farm homes upon such terms as are economically possible for agriculture.

But in this direction we wish to direct the attention of the members of the farm bureau and all the people of Tennessee to the great value of our water-power resources and the importance of urging upon the governor and legislature that the rights of the public in these valuable resources be definitely ascertained, and that such action, legislative or otherwise, be taken as will properly and accurately protect and conserve these rights for all the people of the State.

Collective bargaining has become a well-recognized and established policy of industry and labor. Its stabilizing value is universally conceded. The necessity for its application in the marketing of farm products is unquestioned. In fact, its value has been thoroughly demonstrated in the hundreds of agricultural and livestock marketing associations in successful operation throughout the country. Therefore we stand unreservedly for the cooperative marketing of farm products and the cooperative purchase of such farm supplies as can be satisfactorily and profitably handled in this manner.

We recommend the appointment by the president of a legislative committee consisting of two members to act in conjunction with him in placing before the lawmaking bodies of our Nation and State the views and wishes of the Tennessee Farm Bureau Federation relative to proposed legislation affecting the interests of agriculture.

We recommend that each county farm bureau appoint a county chairman of home and community works within the next month, the name of said chairman to be forwarded to the president of the State farm bureau following the next county meeting.

Recognizing the importance of agricultural and home economics extension service as supported by the United States Department of Agriculture, we urge that adequate appropriations for this service be continued. Particularly at this time, since there is before Congress a bill known as the Capper-Ketchum bill, to provide additional funds for this service, we urge that our congressional delegation give their unqualified support to this proposal.

We strongly recommend that the extension service address itself most earnestly to further aiding in the solution of our problems of marketing and distribution.

We hereby approve and indorse the action of the State department of agriculture in raising, in conformity with the authority conferred by the law, the minimum plant-food standard for commercial fertilizers which may be sold in the State after June 1, 1928, from 14 to 16 per cent and requiring percentages of plant-food elements contained in such commercial fertilizers to be stated in terms of even units only. We regard this ruling as a distinct advance in the regulation of the fertilizer industry. It will undoubtedly go far toward eliminating confusion in terms, in reducing the opportunity for the use of "filler" or "make weight" in the manufacture of commercial fertilizers and in reducing the overhead of the manufacturer, thus affording the farmer the opportunity to secure the product at a lower cost per plant-food unit.

Finally, we urged upon our members the great importance of standing loyally by and actively cooperating with our farm bureau, national, State, and county. We should avail ourselves of the services offered by our county and State organizations.

We should lend our indorsement to the principles and policies promulgated by the American Farm Bureau Federation and encourage these loyal and devoted leaders who, as your representatives, compose that organization, by actively cooperating with and aiding them in putting into effect such policies as, in their wisdom, they may have determined will protect and promote the great basic industry of the Nation and will secure for it such recognition in the formulation of our national policies as the vast service it renders merits and the permanent welfare, happiness, and prosperity of all the people demands.

Whereas the Andrew Jackson Hotel has kindly furnished the use of this room in which to hold the annual convention of the Tennessee Farm Bureau Federation and has been untiring in its efforts to provide for the comfort of those attending same: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we hereby tender to the hotel management our sincere thanks for these and other courtesies extended during the sessions of the convention: Be it further

Resolved, That we extend to the speakers, and especially those coming from without the State, our sincere appreciation of their presence and the splendid addresses delivered by them: Be it further

Resolved, That we express to G. L. Herrington, Mrs. H. A. Porter, R. W. Moore, Ashley Sowell, and the Douglas Community Club our thanks for kindly directing the song services and entertainment throughout the session of the convention.

S. N. VARNELL,
CHARLEY KEY,
V. A. BRADLEY,
R. T. LEWIS,
C. O. BROWDER,

INCREASE IN NUMBER OF CADETS AND MIDSHIPMEN

Mr. FLETCHER introduced a bill (S. 2906) authorizing an increase in the number of cadets at the United States Military Academy and midshipmen at the United States Naval Academy, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the paragraph of act approved June 8, 1926, which the bill I have introduced proposes to amend, authorizes the number of cadets and midshipmen increased by 40 for each the Military and Naval Academy, to be appointed by the President from among the sons of officers, soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps who were killed in action or died prior to July 2, 1921, of wounds or injuries received or disease contracted in line of duty during the World War, and that the President shall appoint one-half of the number from among sons of officers and one-half from among sons of warrant officers, soldiers, sailors, and marines.

My proposed amendment would increase the number of cadets to 100 and the number of midshipmen to 100, and provide for their appointment irrespective of date fathers died; also remove the restriction that one-half of the number shall be from among sons of officers.

I have a number of applications on file from mothers of former service men—whose husbands died after July 2, 1921, of wounds or injuries received or disease contracted in line of duty—requesting that their sons be given an opportunity to qualify for appointment to one of the academies; but, as the law which it is proposed to amend provides that death shall have occurred prior to July 2, 1921, I am unable to be of assistance to them, and I dare say that other Members of Congress are faced with the same situation.

Mr. President, being convinced that this proposed amendment is meritorious, I hope it will receive early and favorable consideration in order that successful candidates may enter the academy of their choice during this summer or fall. The regular entrance examination for the Military Academy is to be held beginning on the first Tuesday in March, the 6th, and the last regular entrance examination for the Naval Academy is to be held beginning on the third Wednesday in April, the 18th. Successful candidates must, at date of admission to the Military Academy, be between the ages of 17 and 22 years, while those for admission to the Naval Academy must be not less than 16 nor more than 20 years of age on April 1. The mental and physical examinations are very rigid.

I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

PROPOSED CHANGES IN IMMIGRATION LAWS

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts introduced the following bills, which were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Immigration:

A bill (S. 2919) to amend the naturalization laws in respect of certificates of arrival;

A bill (S. 2920) to repeal the national origin provisions of the immigration act of 1924;

A bill (S. 2921) to amend the immigration act of 1924, as amended, in respect of nonquota immigrants;

A bill (S. 2922) to amend the immigration act of 1924, as amended, in respect of nonquota immigrants;

A bill (S. 2923) to amend the immigration act of 1924, as amended, in respect of nonquota immigrants;

A bill (S. 2924) to amend the immigration act of 1924, as amended, in respect of nonquota immigrants; and

A bill (S. 2925) to amend the immigration act of 1924, as amended, in respect of non-quota immigrants.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I have introduced several bills proposing certain amendments to the immigration act of 1924 and to "An act to establish a Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization and to provide for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States," approved June 29, 1906, as amended, tending to correct and remedy what I consider the unreasonable features of these laws.

I ask that a brief statement explaining these amendments, which are necessarily couched in technical language, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in the ordinary RECORD type.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

First. S. 2919. An amendment to the naturalization laws which will place within the discretion of the Commissioner General of Immigration the right to issue a certificate of arrival upon satisfactory proof of residence in the United States from the date of actually established lawful entry where the immigration records fail to show it.

Under the present law certificates of arrival are issued only to those whose record of immigration can be located at the port of entry.

Until comparatively recent years records of entry at the various ports of entry were kept in a rather slipshod manner and therefore were not very accurate. Also, no record of entry was kept of Canadians coming from across the border until a very few years ago; as a result of this condition we have many thousands of Canadians—estimated over 100,000—in this country who have been trying to become naturalized but can not because they are unable to procure certificates of arrival. These are absolute prerequisites to final citizenship. Of course, the injustice of this barrier is obvious.

Second. S. 2920. A bill to repeal the so-called national origins clause of the immigration act of 1924.

There is no workable basis on which this national-origins scheme can be carried out. The laborious efforts of Doctor Hill and his associates make this clear, and the President's advisers so declare in a letter to the President.

This proposal would relieve the present law of these irrelevant and arbitrary provisions, which, of course, may become effective March 1, 1928.

Third. S. 2921. An amendment to the immigration act of 1924 which will exempt from the quota restrictions and admit forthwith the brothers, sisters, and parents of World War veterans who are citizens of the United States.

Under the present law brothers and sisters of veterans receive none of the preferences or exemptions accorded certain other aliens. They must await their regular turn on the quota list, which in most instances has been exhausted for many years.

Parents of veterans who are American citizens are entitled to preference within the quota—not because they are parents of veterans, but because they are parents of citizens—but even this is of no material assistance, because in most countries the preference quota has been exhausted for many years to come.

Fourth. S. 2922. An amendment to the immigration act of 1924 exempting from the quota restrictions set forth in the act the wives and unmarried children under 18 years of age of aliens who have declared their intention of becoming American citizens.

Under the existing law applicants within this class are given no preference and must await their regular turn on the quota list, which means a wait of many years before their turn will be reached.

This amendment to the act will correct what is perhaps the most cruel feature of the present immigration law. It will enable the uniting of families forcibly separated by the sudden passage of the immigration act. The change in the immigration laws took place within two months' time—the Senate discussing the act during the months of May and June, and the law becoming operative on July 1, 1924.

This law resulted in reducing the quota of some countries from thousands to hundreds. The quota, for instance, from the country of Italy was reduced from 32,315 to approximately 3,000. The Polish and other quotas were similarly reduced. This discriminatory reduction of quotas exhausted the allotment of many countries for a number of years; many aliens who applied for immigration visas before July 1, 1924, have not yet been reached and may not for some time.

Fifth. S. 2923. An amendment to the immigration act of 1924 granting nonquota status to husbands of American citizens and in this way exempting them from quota restrictions. Under the present law husbands of citizens receive only a preference within the quota and must await their regular turn on the preference quota list.

The law now in force grants nonquota status to wives of American citizens, but does not grant a like status to husbands of American citizens. This amendment is merely a reciprocal clause, seeking to establish the same rights for husbands of citizens as those already allowed wives of citizens.

Sixth. S. 2924. A bill to amend the immigration act of 1924, which, if enacted, will place religious teachers and charitable workers in educational eleemosynary institutions within the same class of immigrant applicants as ministers and professors, and therefore entitle them to nonquota status.

Under the present law alien applicants falling within this class receive no preference or exemption and must await their regular turn on the quota list. To illustrate, all the eleemosynary institutions of Porto Rico are directed by Spanish subjects and are seriously handicapped because religious teachers and charity workers have grown old and their places can not be filled by young trained Spanish-speaking teachers. The Spanish quota is so very small (131) and the number of applicants against this quota is so much larger (2,500) that it will be about 20 years before religious teachers and charity workers now applying can be reached. Similar conditions exist in charitable institutions conducted for the benefit of certain foreign-born groups in this country.

Seventh. S. 2925. A bill to amend the immigration act of 1924 which will exempt from quota restrictions the unmarried children of American citizens between the ages of 18 and 21 years.

Under the law as it now exists, unmarried children of American citizens between the ages of 18 and 21 years are given only a preference within the quota of the country of their birth, which in some cases means they must wait as many as 10 years before their turn on the preference quota list will be reached.

Children of citizens coming within this class may enter without delay if this amendment is enacted into law.

AMENDMENT TO INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 9481, the independent offices appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

Insert at the end of the bill a new section, to read as follows:

"WATER BOUNDARY, UNITED STATES AND MEXICO

"For an additional amount for the water boundary, United States and Mexico, including personal services, procurement of technical and scientific equipment, camp outfits, and the purchase, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, and $1,200 for rent, $65,000, for the fiscal year 1929, to be immediately available (treaties of November 12, 1884, vol. 24, p. 1011; May 1, 1889, vol. 26, p. 1513, Art. II; act February 24, 1927, vol. 44, pt. 2, p. 1185), $65,000."

THE MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. BINGHAM submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to Senate bill 744, the merchant marine bill, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF PUBLIC-UTILITY TELEPHONE CORPORATIONS

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I submit a resolution, which I ask may be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 126) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five Members of the Senate be appointed by the President thereof and be hereby empowered and directed to inquire into and report upon (1) the growth of the capital assets and capital liabilities of public-utility corporations supplying telephone communications, however such telephone communications may be accomplished and/or produced, of corporations holding the stocks of such public-utility corporations, and of nonpublic-utility corporations owned or controlled by or affiliated with such holding companies; (2) the method of issuing, the price realized or value received, the commissions or bonuses paid or received, and other pertinent facts with respect to the various security issues of all classes of corporations herein named, including the bonds and other evidences of indebtedness thereof, as well as the stocks of the same; (3) the extent to which holding companies or their stockholders control or are financially interested in financial, engineering, construction, and/or management corporations, and the relation, one to the other, of the classes of corporations last named, the holding companies, and the public-utility corporations; (4) the services furnished to public-utility corporations by holding companies and/or their associated, affiliated, and/or subsidiary companies, the fees, commissions, bonuses, or other charges made therefor, and the earnings and expenses of such holding companies and their associated, affiliated, and/or subsidiary companies; and (5) the value or detriment to the public of holding companies owning the stock or otherwise controlling such public-utility corporations immediately or remotely, with the extent of such ownership or control, and particularly what legislation, if any, should be enacted by Congress to correct any abuses that may exist in the organization or operation of such holding companies.

The committee is further empowered and directed to inquire and report whether, and to what extent, such corporations or any of the officers thereof or anyone in their behalf or in behalf of any organization of which any such corporation may be a member, through the expenditure of money or through the control of the avenues of publicity, have made any and what effort to influence or control public opinion on account of municipal or public ownership of the means by which telephone communication is accomplished and/or produced, or to influence or control elections.

That the said committee is hereby authorized to sit and perform its duties at such times and places as it deems necessary or proper and to require the attendance of witnesses by subpœnas or otherwise; to require the production of books, papers, and documents; and to employ counsel, experts, and other assistants, and stenographers, at a cost not exceeding $1.25 per printed page. The chairman of the committee, or any member thereof, may administer oaths to witnesses and sign subpœnas for witnesses; and every person duly summoned before said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, who refuses or fails to obey the process of said committee, or appears and refuses to answer questions pertinent to said investigation, shall be punished as prescribed by law. The expenses of said investigation shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers of the committee or subcommittee, signed by the chairman and approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The committee or any subcommittee thereof is authorized to sit during the sessions or the recesses of the Senate, and until otherwise ordered by the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to state the purport of the resolution in about 100 words.

I offer this resolution on behalf of the cities of the State of California, and particularly of the cities of San Francisco and Oakland. Telephone rate cases are now before the Railroad Commission of California, the regulatory body of that State, and the increases demanded by the telephone companies are of the highest importance to every municipality, not only of California but of the entire Pacific coast. The increases our cities assert are exorbitant and they stand ready to prove these increases are without justification. Their foundation is in the peculiar jugglery of the relations of the telephone company with interrelated corporations. Only the Congress by appropriate investigation can develop the facts; and the resolution seeks by senatorial investigation that the truth may be revealed.

I present with the resolution a communication from Mr. Dion R. Holm, representing the city of San Francisco, and a resolution unanimously passed by the Board of Supervisors of the City and County of San Francisco, approved by Mayor James Rolph, jr. Both I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

Hereafter, because the importance of the subject warrants it and the interests of our people demand it, I shall speak in detail upon the resolution. In the meantime I bespeak the usual attentive consideration of the Interstate Commerce Committee, to which I ask that the resolution and accompanying papers may be referred.

The resolution and accompanying papers were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and the accompanying papers were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, January 20, 1928.

Hon. HIRAM W. JOHNSON,
United States Senator, Senate Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR JOHNSON: Inclosed is a copy of resolution No. 28206 (new series), passed by the Board of Supervisors of the City and County of San Francisco. In accordance with the direction contained in the resolution I am sending the same to you.

Within a few days you may expect from us a copy of a bill to be introduced whereby either Congress or the Interstate Commerce Commission will be asked to conduct an examination of the affairs of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., the Western Electric Co., and all their subsidiaries. I believe it proper that this matter should be presented to you as the senior Senator, and would appreciate your creating an interest among all of California's Representatives in Congress to aid in the passage of the bill.

The pending telephone rate case before the railroad commission is of the highest importance to San Francisco and all the cities about the bay and, in fact, all California.

It seems to be the policy of the telephone company that as soon as they have been successful in obtaining increased rates in one section of the State, they very shortly move to another and begin similar proceedings, and it probably will be but a short time before all large cities in California will be confronted with a suit to increase telephone rates.

If the request made by the telephone company is granted by the railroad commission, the bay district will be paying annually $7,000,000 additional to what is now paid for telephone service.

We sincerely trust that we will have your able assistance in causing a nation-wide investigation of the affairs of the American Telephone & Telegraph and Western Electric Co., as we are firmly of the belief if the facts are made known concerning the relations of these companies with the local telephone company and all other companies controlled or subsidiary to the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. that many expenditures made by the local company will be curtailed and the people consequently benefited by a decrease in telephone rates instead of an increase as asked for.

With kindest personal regards, I remain,

Yours truly,

DION R. HOLM,
Special Counsel Rate Litigation.

CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO,
BOARD OF SUPERVISORS, CLERK'S OFFICE,
San Francisco, January 3, 1928.

The following resolution was unanimously adopted by the Board of Supervisors of San Francisco and approved by his honor, the mayor:

Resolution No. 28206 (new series)

Whereas the Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co. has petitioned the Railroad Commission of the State of California to increase the telephone rates in San Francisco, Oakland, Berkeley, Alameda, Piedmont, and other communities about San Francisco Bay; and

Whereas this board of supervisors is advised by the city attorney that the rates asked by the said Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co. are believed to be unfair and exorbitant, and that the rates paid in the communities referred to should be decreased instead of increased, and could be decreased and allow the Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co. to make a fair return on the capital it has invested, if the said Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co. operated its business without paying to the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. of New York any percentage of its gross income yearly and be relieved of the necessity of purchasing all their supplies from the Western Electric Co. (Inc.) of the State of New York; and

Whereas the Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co. operate and do business in the States of California, Washington, Oregon, Idaho, and

Nevada, and this board is advised by the city attorney in the States of Washington and Oregon have caused the people to pay excessive rates for telephone service, and will, if not restrained, seek to impose unjust, discriminatory, and unfair telephone rates in all communities where they are engaged in business: Now therefore be it

Resolved—

SECTION 1. That Congress cause a Federal investigation to be conducted of the affairs of the Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co., the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., and the Western Electric Co. for the purpose of ascertaining if the relations between these companies constitute a monopoly in the selling of telephone service throughout the States of California, Washington, Oregon, Idaho, and Nevada, and if they do so constitute a monopoly that action be taken by Congress to initiate a proper proceeding to terminate the relations between the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., Western Electric Co., and the Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co.

SEC. 2. The city attorney is hereby directed to forward a copy of this resolution to United States Senators HIRAM W. JOHNSON and SAMUEL M. SHORTRIDGE, and all Members of the House of Representatives from California, that they may take the necessary steps to cause the investigation hereby requested, and that the city attorney is further directed to send copies of this resolution to all large cities in the States of California, Washington, Oregon, Idaho, and Nevada, with the request that those cities pass resolutions by their boards of supervisors, councilmen, trustees, or other governing boards, and that such resolutions be forwarded to their representatives in Congress.

Adopted. Board of supervisors, San Francisco, December 19, 1927.

J. S. DUNNIGAN, Clerk.

Approved. San Francisco, December 30, 1927.

INVESTIGATION OF COAL FIELDS OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that to-morrow, as soon as it is possible to obtain recognition, I shall speak on the resolution now pending before the Interstate Commerce Committee providing for an investigation of the coal fields of Pennsylvania and contiguous territory.

PENSION FUNDS FOR INTERSTATE RAILROAD EMPLOYEES

Mr. COPELAND submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 127), which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission is directed (1) to report to the Senate the opinion of the commission in respect of the feasibility of requiring each railroad which is subject to the interstate commerce act, as amended, to establish a pension fund for its employees, and (2) to include in such report, if in the opinion of the commission such project is feasible, a statement of the plan for establishing such fund which the commission deems most suitable.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that on January 26, 1928, the President approved and signed the act (S. 672) for the purpose of rehabilitating farm lands in the flood areas.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8269) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes; requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and that Mr. SHREVE, Mr. TINKHAM, Mr. ACKERMAN, Mr. OLIVER of Alabama, and Mr. GRIFFIN were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE DEPARTMENTS OF STATE AND JUSTICE, ETC.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EDGE in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8269) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. JONES. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. JONES, Mr. WARREN, Mr. SMOOT, Mr. BORAH, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. HARRIS conferees on the part of the Senate.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] is entitled to the floor on the unfinished business.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, it was understood on Friday that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] would have the floor at this time, and I yield to him for the purpose of making a statement.

PROHIBITION QUESTIONNAIRE FOR REPUBLICAN PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, for many years I have greatly admired the profound wisdom, the moving eloquence, the lofty courage, and the extraordinary statesmanship of the illustrious senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. For this great man of stainless character and spotless reputation I have long entertained the most genuine affection. Therefore, with unfeigned regret I find myself impelled by duty to proclaim that the Senator has in a single instance sadly disappointed my expectations and grieviously blighted my hopes. The source of my disappointment and the cause of my complaint are clearly revealed by the matters of record to which the attention of the Senate is invited.

In a recent colloquy, in which the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], and I participated, I asked the Senator from Idaho the following question, which appears on page 1314 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the 11th day of January, 1928:

Mr. NEELY. For instance, if the very dearly beloved Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], or if Mr. Hoover should become the Republican nominee for President, and the Senator should receive an answer to his inquiry about such nominee's position on the eighteenth amendment, will he not be good enough also to ask the candidate if, in the event of his election, he purposes to appoint an ex-distiller or an ex-brewer Secretary of the Treasury to supervise the enforcement of the prohibition amendment?

The Senator from Idaho answered this question as follows:

Mr. BORAH. That will be a very pertinent question, and I am glad the Senator from West Virginia has suggested it; I shall remember it.

I believed this reply to be equivalent to a promise by the Senator that in catechizing Republican presidential candidates about their stand on the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act he would adorn his questionnaire and enrich his inquiry with an interrogatory to the following effect:

If you should be elected President, will you appoint an ex-distiller, an ex-brewer, or an ex-brewery owner Secretary of the Treasury to supervise the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act?

While I was in this happy state of blissful belief the Senator from Idaho made public the fearsome questionnaire, which he has very appropriately, patriotically, and with due solemnity nailed to the desk of his Republican colleague the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. No bull of excommunication, heralded from housetop or flaunted from cathedral door, ever created greater consternation among heretics than the Senator's questionary has occasioned among the very numerous but not conspicuously courageous throng of ambitious candidates who had hoped to gum shoe, soft pedal, side-step, pussy foot, and polly fox their way to the presidential chair.

In vain have I searched this questionnaire from alpha to omega again and again for an inquiry concerning the qualifications of the supervisor of the prohibition law whom Senator CURTIS would appoint in the event of his being elected President.

Since it is generally known that the Senator from Idaho never intentionally dodges an issue I am compelled to believe that he has forgotten that he concurred expressly in the pertinency, and inferentially in the propriety of the inquiry that I proposed on the 11th day of January. If the Senator has forgotten this very important matter, he has thereby indicated that he has a more unretentive memory than any other high official in the country excepting Mr. Herbert Hoover, who can not remember who married him, how many political parties he has joined in a decade, nor even the name of the country of which he has been a resident for the last 14 years.

Let me digress to observe that it is fortunate for the great elegiac poet, Thomas Gray, that he wrote his famous elegy in a country churchyard and died before Mr. Hoover lived and had his notorious attack of acute amnesia. Otherwise the world would have lost from that matchless poem the four beautiful lines:

For who, to dumb forgetfulness a prey
This pleasing anxious being o'er resigned,
Left the warm precincts of the cheerful day,
Nor cast one longing, lingering look behind?

My reason for urging the Senator from Idaho to propound to the Republican candidates the inquiry in question lies in the fact that I believe it to be impossible for anyone who is financially interested in the liquor business to enforce strictly or satisfactorily the prohibition amendment.

We have learned by distressing experience that regardless of the real or the imaginary attitude of a candidate toward or the revealed or the concealed position of a President on the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act, that a thought, a hope, or a dream of satisfactory enforcement of prohibition with Harry Daugherty, Jesse Smith, and Gaston B. Means operating the Attorney General's office, and Mr. Mellon holding the position of Secretary of the Treasury is—

As idle as a painted ship
Upon a painted ocean.

A sense of fairness impels me to say that I believe that Mr. Mellon is one of the greatest financiers this country or the world has ever produced. But because of his formerly having had untold millions of dollars invested in distilleries and breweries I am unable to believe that he ever has been or that he ever will be in sympathy with prohibition legislation or become enthusiastic about its strict enforcement.

But it is not too late for the Senator from Idaho to amend and supplement his questionnaire. Therefore, let me urge him to add to it, in his own choice language, the substance of the inquiry I have proposed.

Let no one be deceived. Obviously, a thief will never enforce the law against larceny; a pyromaniac will never enforce the law against arson; a distiller or brewer will never enforce the Volstead Act. Consequently, the friends of temperance are just as anxious to know the attitude of the next Secretary of the Treasury toward prohibition enforcement as they are to learn where the next President stands on this important question.

If some uncharitable one should suggest that a questionnaire similar to that under discussion be submitted to the Democratic candidates for the nomination for President, I reply that the suggestion is superfluous, because for the last four years we have been constantly subjecting our candidates to the most searching inquest ever held over the bodies of the living or the remains of the dead since that memorable day on which the sorely afflicted man of Uz was asked, to his confusion as well as his contrition, if he could bring forth Mazzaroth in his season, bind the sweet influences of Pleiades, bore the jaw of leviathan with a thorn, or put a fishhook in the snout of a whale. A number of postgraduate Democratic inquisitors have for a long time been asking our presidential candidates not only where they stand on every question of public concern but what they think and what they intend to do about every private matter that may conceivably arise between the first of earth's cradles and the last of her graves. Our Democratic inquisitors are insisting upon knowing not only where our presidential candidates are now but also where their progenitors came from and where their posterity are going.

In brief, the public may be assured that under the Democratic roof tree every plan will be published, every purpose will be explained, and every hidden thing will be brought forth into the light of the noonday sun.

Therefore let us urge the Senator from Idaho to renew his inquiry and enlarge its purpose, to the end that the Republican household may also be put in order. Let him persist in his highly meritorious quest for information until widespread "pitiless publicity" shall have been given to the attitude of every Republican presidential candidate toward prohibition legislation and the enforcement of prohibition law. The Senator will, by accomplishing what he has so courageously and patriotically undertaken in this matter, purify the candidates of his party, render a great service to his country, and again earn an everlasting place in the gratitude and affection of the American people.

Lord God of Hosts, be with him yet,
Lest he forget, lest he forget.

THE MERCHANT MARINE

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 744) to further develop an American merchant marine, to assure its permanence in the transportation of the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, on Friday I introduced into the RECORD a statement of Mr. Lawrence R. Wilder. This was his proposal to the Shipping Board for a certificate of necessity and approval of the plans which his group is perfecting for the building of an American merchant marine. In that proposal is a challenge to the Senate.

Mr. Wilder outlined the conditions which he regards as necessary to the building up of an American merchant marine under private auspices. I want to call attention to a portion of his statement, which is found on page 2145 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Friday, January 27. In this proposal it is stated that the Wilder concern will contribute fifty or sixty million dollars of their money, provided the Government will change certain conditions which are enumerated here and which I desire to make specific.

First, Mr. Wilder says that his company wishes to have the Shipping Board declare that the proposed establishment is an essential service. That action is required under section 7 of the merchant marine act of 1920. That, I assume, the Shipping Board will do if in its judgment it finds that it really is an essential service; so we do not need to concern ourselves with that matter.

The second condition is this:

A revision of the loan provisions of the merchant marine act so as to make possible the use of Government credit facilities in the form of a construction loan of three-fourths the cost of building ships, at the Government's current rate of interest.

The law at present permits the Shipping Board to loan 66⅔ per cent, two-thirds the value of the ship's construction cost; and I think the rate of interest provided—the Senator from Washington will correct me on this—is 4½ per cent.

Mr. JONES. I think it is 4¼ or 4½ per cent for overseas and foreign commerce, and 5 per cent for coastwise commerce.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes. So the law at present permits the loaning of 66⅔ per cent of the construction cost at a rate of interest of 4½ per cent. Mr. Wilder in his proposal wants to have the proportion of cost increased to 75 per cent, and the rate of interest to be charged to be the current rate, whatever the Government is paying at the time for money borrowed. I think that is now about 3⅛ or 3¼ per cent.

That is the second proposal.

The third is this:

We request, third, revision of the mail carrying act to establish rates not as a subsidy but commensurate with the new speed and frequency of the service, its cost, and its utility. Authority would be given to the Post Office Department to enter into ocean mail-carrying contracts for periods not shorter than 5 years nor longer than 10 years.

That provides for a modification of the ocean mail act of 1891. That I desire to comment upon in a moment.

The fourth and last suggestion is:

Fourth, and last, because approved insurance whether here or abroad is limited on any single ship to $9,000,000, we request protection in case of total loss in the form of cancellation of the loan against that ship to the extent not covered by amortization and insurance.

Of course, I assume that is a matter wholly in the hands of the Shipping Board.

So this concern has issued a challenge to the American people if we will be more generous in the lending of money—lending a larger sum at a lower rate of interest—under conditions which would entirely and completely protect the Government. As against the loan of $94,500,000 which is requested—because they are proposing to build six ships at a cost of $21,000,000 each, and three-quarters of that sum would be $94,500,000—the Government would be amply protected, because here would be these six fine ships; and then, in addition, the $50,000,000 which they will advance to make the company a going concern.

Mr. President, I send forward to the desk an amendment to this bill permitting the lending of money to any concern, whether the Wilder concern or any other, on the more liberal terms suggested in Mr. Wilder's proposal to the Shipping Board. I ask the clerk to read the suggested amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON in the chair). May the Chair say to the Senator from New York that he is advised that the Senator from Maryland has an amendment pending to the bill, and this amendment probably would not be in order at the present time.

Mr. COPELAND. I understand that we will not be able to act upon it now; but I ask that the amendment be read, in order that it may be used as the basis of some remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Very well; the Secretary will read the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the proper place in the bill:

That section 870 of the shipping act, as found in the Code of Laws of the United States, shall be amended to permit the loan of 75 per cent of the constructional cost of the ships for a period of 20 years, and at the rate of interest which is paid by the Government at the time upon money borrowed.

Mr. COPELAND. This provides a change in the amount from 66 per cent to 75 per cent, increases the period of payment of the loan from 15 years to 20 years, and decreases the rate of interest from 4½ per cent to the current rate, whatever it may be—now about 3¼ per cent.

In a moment I shall present another amendment which provides for a change in the ocean mail act. This is a measure I introduced last session and in line with what is suggested in Mr. Wilder's proposal to the Shipping Board.

On Thursday there was some discussion in the Senate; and I ask the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to what I am about to say, if he will be good enough to listen.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator has my attention.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator.

On Thursday in the discussion the Senator from Massachusetts—found on page 2059 of the RECORD of that day—raised the question as to whether or not this proposal made by the Transoceanic Co. was only a scheme to defer action on the pending bill. He was fearful that it was an eleventh-hour proposal to delay action. He was sitting opposite the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], and asked him across the aisle if he had ever heard about this proposal; and then the Senator from Massachusetts said:

I will say to the Senator—

Referring to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM]— that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. JONES], who sits right here, who has studied this question more than any man in this country, says he first heard rumors about what the Senator is talking of a few weeks ago.

It is only fair, Mr. President, to say that this concern requested a hearing before the Senate Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator state when?

Mr. COPELAND. On the 8th of January a telegram was sent to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, saying:

As citizens deeply and substantially interested in the American merchant marine, my associates and myself respectfully request a hearing before your honorable Senate committee regarding Senate bills 743 and 744, which we understand are at present under consideration by the Senate committee of which you are chairman. We are prepared to offer our views on these pending acts of legislation at your committee's earliest convenience.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator will agree that that was only a few weeks ago.

Mr. COPELAND. It was only a few weeks ago; that is true. So far as the Senator from Massachusetts is concerned, in spite of all newspaper comments to the contrary, there is never any row between the Senator from Massachusetts and myself, and rarely any disagreement on public questions.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I concur in that statement.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator. The situation is an amazing one.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, may I suggest that that did not call attention to any proposition that they had to submit. If the Senator will permit me, the chairman of the committee notified these gentlemen that the committee itself would determine whether or not it would proceed with the consideration of the measure looking toward a subsidy, or whether it would decide to report a bill similar to the one reported at the close of the last session of Congress; and, if the committee decided the latter, no hearings would be necessary.

Mr. COPELAND. In order that the RECORD may be complete, I assume that the Senator from Washington has no objection to having his reply put in the RECORD?

Mr. JONES. Not at all.

Mr. COPELAND. I will read this, then, so that we may know what it is, and then I will ask that it be included in the RECORD:

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE,
January 9, 1928.

Mr. LAURENCE R. WILDER,
Hotel Carlton, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. WILDER: Your telegram of January 8 at hand. The committee meets this morning to determine the policy that it will follow. If it decides that a bill for Government construction is the wisest course to follow, I do not think that hearings are necessary. If the committee should decide that it will give serious consideration to a subsidy bill, then hearings will be had.

I assume that you would oppose the passage of S. 744, but if the committee decides that the wisest policy is embodied in that bill, we will act upon it without further delay.

Sincerely yours,

W. L. JONES.

That was sent on the morning of the 9th of January, and later the same day the bill was ordered reported.

I wish to say something about that, because I do not want the country to believe that a matter so serious as the fate of the American merchant marine could possibly be determined in the course of a few minutes' meeting of the Committee on Commerce.

We had a meeting of the Committee on Commerce in the middle of December. At that time we discussed very briefly what we were going to do about these various bills. It was suggested to me that I withdraw the bill which I had presented, proposing an amendment to the ocean mail act, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and have it referred to the Committee on Commerce in order that it might receive the attention of the committee. I understood that there was to be full and free discussion of this matter after the holidays.

My record book shows that we were to begin these hearings on the 10th of January. As a matter of fact, a meeting was called for the 9th of January, at a time in the morning when I could not be there. When I arrived at 11 o'clock, an hour after the stated time for the meeting, the meeting had adjourned, and the committee had reported this bill. You will recall that that afternoon the bill was reported to the Senate, when I protested on the floor of the Senate, and received the assurance of the Senator from Washington, the chairman of the committee, that there would be another meeting of the Commerce Committee when this matter might be considered; and that meeting was held, and it was very briefly considered.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. COPELAND. I do.

Mr. JONES. I do not think the Senator desires to misrepresent the chairman or the committee either by inference or otherwise.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not.

Mr. JONES. The chairman set the time of the meeting of the committee and supposed that everybody could be there at that time; and the chairman remembers that the committee delayed quite a while, waiting for Senators to come there, and especially waiting for the Senator from New York. We finally came to the conclusion that the Senator could not be there for some reason, and the committee acted. I know that the chairman, and I think the committee, wanted to be perfectly fair to everybody in the matter, and we certainly tried to be. We were not seeking to take snap judgment on anybody, and I know there was no thought of anything of the kind.

Mr. COPELAND. I accept in good faith what the Senator has said; but I do say that this matter should be considered at length and in detail by somebody from the United States Senate. This is a matter on which we should hear the Secretary of the Navy to get his views as to what we need to do with an American merchant marine in order to guarantee this second line of defense to the country. We need to hear from the Secretary of Commerce; we need to hear from the Postmaster General, in order that we may get his views as to whether or not the ocean mail act might be amended for the benefit of the country. My contention is, without criticizing any individual or any committee, that the Senate has not given any study to such a proposal as Mr. Wilder makes, or to the general principle involved in that proposal.

I am not interested in his proposal. I am not prepared to say whether he can carry out that proposal or not, but do say that what he proposes is in harmony with the testimony of every shipping man who has ever appeared before the Senate Committee on Commerce since I have been a member of that committee.

Last year we had extended hearings before the Committee on Commerce regarding the proposed sale of certain ships by the United States Shipping Board. That was the United States Line, and two proposals had been made for the purchase of that line.

As Senators will see from the record, we had extensive hearings, and there was no disagreement among witnesses that if we were to have an effective privately owned American merchant marine there must be some legislation to make possible the operation of such a merchant marine, or it could not be put into private hands.

There is no doubt that there is a marked difference of opinion in the Senate as to what is the duty of the country. There are Senators here who have frankly said during the past week that they have burned the bridges and are committed to a policy of Government ownership and operation. That is the sentiment they express. I may be wrong, but I think some Senators are supporting the pending bill on the theory that it will help to give such a permanently owned and Government-operated merchant marine. I am sorry that there are not more Senators here to hear this discussion, but I hope the country will learn of it. I believe that when the country does learn the true inwardness of its significance there will be resentment of this proposal.

This bill provides, by indirection, for continued operation by the Government. The only thing in this bill that is new is the proviso that no ship shall be sold hereafter except by unanimous consent of the board. It is almost impossible to conceive that the board would ever agree unanimously to the sale of a ship. This board, as I pointed out, is a regional board. Two members come from the Pacific, two from the Atlantic, one from the Great Lakes, one from the interior, and one from the Gulf States. Is it conceivable that there could be unanimity of opinion in a board so constituted, when the interests of a given section might be involved in what was proposed in the way of sale?

On Friday I pointed out that 116 ships, almost half of the ships now operated by the Shipping Board, go out of Gulf ports. Eighty-nine of them sail from New Orleans. I am glad those ships operate. I am willing to vote money to operate them. I do not believe the time is coming in a generation when the Shipping Board will be a body unnecessary in our Government. But half the losses of the Shipping Board, Mr. President, come from the operation of those Gulf ships. Over $5,000,000 is lost to the Government in the operation of those ships. Every time a ship sails out of one of our ports with a cargo, the Government of the United States pays $1.48 a ton on the freight. The loss in carrying the freight is $1.48 a ton. In spite of what the shippers pay, in spite of all the receipts of the board, the loss to the Government every time it carries a ton of freight is $1.48.

Yet, returning again for a moment to the Gulf lines and services, they are necessary, and I am willing to have them operate. But if there came a time when the Shipping Board in its wisdom determined that those ships should be sold, do Senators think that the Gulf man would vote to sell them?

I am not seeking to reflect upon him in the least; I honor him for the position he would take. If I lived in New Orleans, or came from the Gulf section, I would vote exactly in the way he would vote.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question in this connection? Has the amount of the losses in connection with the ships sailing from New Orleans been increasing or decreasing each year?

Mr. COPELAND. They are about the same. There is no gain, there is no improvement. The loss is about the same.

Mr. SMITH. Has that been true from the inception of the Shipping Board to the present?

Mr. COPELAND. During the past five or six years. I may say to the Senator from South Carolina that there was a period immediately after the war, when the shipping of the world had been swept off the seas by the submarines and by the vicissitudes of war, when our Shipping-Board-built ships made money; but that time has passed. The merchant ships of the world have been restored. Eight million tons have been built by foreign nations, and now, of course, we are on our own bottom, so to speak, and that is a very proper term when we speak about the merchant marine.

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator has analyzed the figures, will he tell to what particular feature this loss is attributable?

Mr. COPELAND. One feature is that we have to pay about $2,000,000 a year to the agents who operate the lines. That is one loss. In the next place, of course, there is a loss on the bulk of business, about $1.48 for every ton of freight carried because of high costs.

Mr. SMITH. I asked the first question, in reference to whether this loss was increasing or decreasing, because my attention had been called to the fact that the lines of shipment for so many years have been to other ports, rather than the Gulf or the South Atlantic ports, that it would take a period of years to inspire confidence on the part of the shipping public sufficient to cause them to route their shipments from the interior by these Gulf and South Atlantic ports, and unless the schedules were dependable it was said they would not take the chances, and that there would necessarily be a loss on the vessels operating for the purpose of building up those routes because of carrying less than full capacity loads. I thought perhaps that in the course of four or five years, if these schedules had been maintained, the losses would diminish rather than increase.

Mr. COPELAND. I think the Senator is right about that. I think he has raised a point that is a perfectly reasonable one. Those who are in favor of this bill contend that there has been so much uncertainty upon the part of the Government as to whether these lines were to be operated and whether they were going to continue their operation that shippers have not been eager to use our ships. I agree fully that it is time for us to determine what our policy is to be.

Mr. SMITH. I have a case in point at the port of Charleston. We had a line established there, but some complications arose and shippers who were booking freight wanted to know exactly what time a ship would sail, or what room they would have. There was an element of uncertainty on account of certain complications as to getting the full cargo, which made it almost impossible to handle the business under those conditions. If they had been assurred of full cargo or half cargo the vessel would have gone, and they would have been able to do twice the business they did.

Mr. COPELAND. What was that—the American Premier Line or the Palmetto Line?

Mr. SMITH. It was the Carolina Line, I think, the Palmetto.

Mr. COPELAND. The Palmetto Line to the United Kingdom and Continental Europe.

Mr. SMITH. The element of uncertainty as to cargoes made it impossible for those who were trying to operate that line definitely to state when a ship would sail, and it was not a fair test. It seems to me that at New Orleans, where they have definite schedules arranged, there is a fair test as to whether the Government can engage to do this work.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator from South Carolina. He has added to the interest of the debate and has stated a thing which must be considered seriously by the Senate.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Will the Senator permit me to give the exact figures with respect to the losses suffered by the Government from the operating of ships out of Gulf ports? For the 11 months of the last year the loss was $5,163,307.19, for 11 months, not the full year. Of that sum there was paid to the agents of the Shipping Board the sum of $1,694,727.90. I would like to have that appear in the RECORD.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is already in the RECORD, at page 2139.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I want it there again, so that all may remember it.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator. In my remarks on Friday I put into the the RECORD a full report of the Gulf ships and showed a loss of $5,163,307.19 for the period of 11 months, as has been stated by the Senator from California.

Mr. FLETCHER. That includes an item of $949,260, including inactive vessel expense. I do not know what that means, but it does not mean operation.

Mr. COPELAND. This is what it means, that there had been assigned to that service more ships than can be used all the time there, so that part of the time some of those ships are tied up, but of course while they are tied up fires are kept under the boilers and the ships have to be maintained. So it is a perfectly legitimate charge against the service. But even subtracting that amount the loss is still considerably over $4,000,000.

Mr. President, I regret that the ardent advocates of perpetual Government ownership and operation do not appear to be in the Chamber. However, for the RECORD, we can go on just the same. Of course, I exclude from what I have just said the distinguished Senator who now occupies the chair [Mr. JOHNSON].

We must decide what we are going to do with this law. I do not refer to the pending bill, which does not amount to anything because it will add nothing to our merchant marine. It never would result in the building of a ship by the Government. Its only effect would be to discourage private operators from making any effort to build an American merchant marine.

There is a law on the statute books, and I want to refer to the first section of that law. Senators who advocate permanent Government ownership and operation and think that somehow or other they are going to get it by any feature of the pending bill fail to read what the law provides.

I heard the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] on Friday ask the question:

> Is it good business to sell a line of ships when it has in it some hope of making money?

He criticizes the Shipping Board for selling. When a line of ships appears to be prosperous, it attracts the attention of private operators and then the Shipping Board proceeds to sell the ships.

I have the greatest respect for my friend the junior Senator from Nebraska. What he did in operating publicly owned public utilities in his State entitles him to the respect of his countrymen, and also that experience entitles him to speak as to what might be done by the permanent operation of these ships under Government ownership. I agree to that. If it is the business of the Government to continue to operate the ships, it is bad business policy to sell them when we begin to have hopes of earning beyond their expenses.

But let me point out that that is the law; that is what the Jones Act of 1920 contemplates. In order that Senators who may be interested may know exactly what it says I want to quote from the law, the law which some of us appear to be seeking to set aside by this indirect method, by the passage of the proposed bill. What does the law say—not the bill but the law? Section 1 of the merchant marine act of 1920 provides:

> That it is necessary for the national defense and for the proper security of the foreign and domestic commerce that the United States shall have a merchant marine of the best-equipped and most suitable types of vessels, sufficient to carry the greater portion of its commerce and serve as a naval or military auxiliary in time of war or of national emergency.

Now, we all agree to that, but we have not any such ships. It would take 65 high-grade ships to serve the Navy in time of war and we could not muster more than 40 to save our lives. The law goes on then to provide that the ships shall—> ultimately be owned and operated privately by citizens of the United States.

It never was contemplated by the Jones Act of 1920 that those ships were to continue in public hands. There was an emergency created by the war. Thousands of those ships were built. It cost us $3,000,000,000 to build them. But it never was contemplated or intended that the Government should go permanently into the ship-operation business. That was not thought of by anybody. It is specifically stated in the first section of the act that those ships should ultimately go into private hands.

Section 5 of the law provides—and, of course, I know exactly what my friend from Nebraska will say with reference to this:

> That in order to accomplish the declared purposes of this act and to carry out the policy declared in section 1 hereof—

And included in that policy is an intention to ultimately put all those ships in private hands—> the board is authorized and directed to sell, as soon as practicable—

And here is where the Senator from Nebraska gets ready to answer me—> consistent with good business methods and the objects and purposes to be attained by this act, at public or private competitive sale.

The difference between us is this: The Senator from Nebraska contends, of course, that to sell the ships is not good business. When, then, are the ships to be sold? They are going to wear out after awhile. When are they to be sold? Must we wait until they are worn out? We could not get anybody to buy the Gulf ships unless they were authorized to take them all and reorganize the service in the hope that it might be made profitable.

The law as it stands to-day contemplates that those ships shall be turned over to private owners at the earliest possible moment consistent with the best interests of the country and the maintenance of the national defense. But if we are to change our policy, if we are now to determine that instead of a temporary operation of those ships we are going to reverse our policy and have perpetual Government ownership and operation, let us stand up like men and declare to the country that that is our purpose. Let us not seek by indirection to write into the law as it is now some words which seem to indicate that we are going to perpetuate Government ownership and operation without frankly and manfully declaring to the country that that is our intention.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. KING. I think no one can controvert the proposition that the board deliberately violated the law, because they could have sold all the ships that were seaworthy in 1920, 1921, and 1922 at from $100 to $150 per ton. They refused to sell, insisting in many instances upon $250 per ton. There was a spirit prompting some members of the board which led them to favor Government ownership, and they felt that by refusing to sell, ultimately we would have a large number of ships upon our hands and the Government then could use, as an argument for continuing the operation, that they could not sell them.

Lord Inchcape, we all know, in Great Britain promptly sold hundreds of the British ships at a reasonable profit, but we held on to them, and even now, when we have had an opportunity to sell, the board has insisted upon a 10-year guaranty, which, of course, the purchaser could not offer in view of the uncertain conditions and the uncertainty of what the Government is going to do. The board has deliberately violated the law over and over again, and many men in public life have connived at that violation, hoping that ultimately we would be forced to have Government ownership. I am amazed that Democrats and strict constructionists upon the other side, who have inveighed constantly against the Government going into business and Government ownership and socialism and paternalism, should give their support to measures which tend to rivet Government ownership and operation upon the country.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. I will yield to the Senator from Nebraska in just a moment.

I think the Senator from Utah has expressed in quite clear terms the entire truth. I recall a dinner address which I made in New York a short time ago to the naval architects. On that occasion, in as polite terms as I could, I gave it as my conviction that it seemed to me that when the Shipping Board, in the proposed sale of its ships, elevates the standard so high and makes the requirement so severe they are open to the charge suggested by the Senator. It creates the suspicion that they are doing it in order that they may perpetuate the Shipping Board, in order that they will continue for ever and ever to operate the ships under the existing arrangement.

Of course, the Senator from Utah and I are not in full agreement about this matter because I do not think he feels, as I do, that there is going to be use for the Shipping Board for a long time. When there is a chance to sell these ships and put them in private hands, into the hands of American citizens, to be operated under the American flag and the country is relieved of the necessity of making replacements and reconditioning, it strikes me that good business sense would say "Let us sell them."

The only act of the Shipping Board in the matter of selling these ships that I could not understand was the one suggested the other day by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] with reference to the sale of the Los Angeles. That certainly caught in the crop of the American people. We had about $2,000,000 invested in that ship, if I am not mistaken, and then a couple of years later sold it for $100,000. Is not that right, may I ask the Senator from Florida?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that it seems to me it ought to have lodged in the crop of the American people as he suggested, but it did not seem to do that very much. I delivered a speech in the Senate on December 12, 1924, in which I set out the facts in reference to the City of Los Angeles, and since then have been relying on my memory very much about it. Here are the facts.

There was a boat built in Germany at a cost estimated to be $1,861,000. In 1920 the Shipping Board had her reconditioned at a cost of $2,686,077. After June, 1922, the board expended for renewing passenger quarters and reconditioning her the sum of $47,948; for material and hotel equipment the further sum of $60,000; and in addition for extras $21,976 was expended. This made the vessel cost, most of it in three years, $4,077,001. This ship was sold in August of 1923 for $100,000. That is the record. If the Senator will turn to the Senate proceedings of February 13, 1924, he will find the facts given in a communication from the Shipping Board. That actually took place.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I want to say, if the Senator will allow me, with reference to the observation made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], before we pass from that matter, that it is not quite fair to the Shipping Board to talk about what they could have done, that they could have disposed of these ships at high prices and all that sort of thing, because the fact is that they did sell ships at something like $100 a ton. They sold every ship they had the opportunity to sell, and in most cases, perhaps all, they had to take them back. The parties did not carry out their contracts and the board had to take back the ships. They have been making every effort to sell the ships all the while, and in recent years and for some years past they have been announcing that they want to go out of business and will sell the ships, that anybody who wants a ship or a line can buy, and they do not stand on prices. That has been the record. They did sell at high prices, but they had to take the ships back.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator from Florida. If the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] will bear with me for a moment longer I will yield to him then gladly. I want to speak just a little bit further about the sale of the City of Los Angeles.

While there have been in times past bickerings and differences in the board that I could not sympathize with, I have been able to understand their mental processes in the sale of vessels. What I am saying is not with reference to the particular board now in existence, but to past boards. I think this board is doing very well. I think the members are working together in a harmonious way and serving the country in a patriotic manner.

Now, however, I wish once more to refer to the Los Angeles. As I have said, this sale was one act I could not understand. There is not any doubt at all that the Shipping Board—I do not seek to fix the responsibility; I do not know anything about what members were then on the board or who was to blame for what was done—used very poor judgment not in selling that ship ultimately for $100,000 but in spending $2,600,000 on her in the first place.

That ship was not suited for any such expenditure of money. Then, after the work was all finished, they found the ship was not any good because her engines were not right. They had gone ahead and built a Rolls Royce body and apparently had an engine outfit suitable for a Ford flivver. So they advertised her for sale and did sell her. The value placed upon her by the most enthusiastic experts three years after the reconditioning spoken of by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] was $200,000. They found somebody who would buy her for $100,000. It was sold on condition that the defects which had not been remedied by the expenditure of two and a half million dollars should be remedied by the purchaser to make her a decent boat. So the pepole who bought her, may I say to the Senator from Florida, expended a million and a half dollars more on that boat before she was of any real value.

As I understand it, the mistake that the Shipping Board made was at the time—which must have been about 1920—when they spent two and a half million dollars on a boat that was not fit to have money spent upon her. Let us take warning from that before we spend $12,000,000 in reconditioning the Agamemnon and the Mount Vernon. Let us think about the mistake the Shipping Board made in 1920, when it expended two and a half million dollars on this boat which was not worth the expenditure.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. COPELAND. For a question.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Is our experience with that particular boat given as evidence of the efficiency of the Shipping Board?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. Let not the Senator from Nebraska be discouraged. I am going to get to him in a minute. I want to give him a chance; he has a right to reply; but I do want to finish this Los Angeles matter, to get it out of the way, because the country misunderstands the real facts relating to this unwise performance.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York permit me to interrupt him for just a moment? I may be out of the Chamber when the Senator concludes his argument. I have an engagement that will take me out of the Chamber, and I should like to withdraw the amendment I have offered to the pending bill and offer a substitute amendment therefor.

Mr. COPELAND. May I ask the Senator from Maryland if he would like to have action on the amendment at this time?

Mr. BRUCE. No; I am afraid there will be some discussion of the amendment; otherwise I should be very glad to do so. I thank the Senator from New York, but I do not feel justified in asking him just now to yield for the consideration of the amendment. Later on I may do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland wish to have the amendment read at this time?

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; the amendment might be read. I will say, Mr. President, that the amendment was drafted at my request by the United States Civil Service Commission, so it is in proper form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the amendment heretofore proposed by the Senator from Maryland will be considered as having been withdrawn and the amendment he now offers substituted therefor. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to insert, on page 3, line 9, after the word "authorized," in lieu of the amendment heretofore offered by Mr. BRUCE, the following:

Provided, That all officers and employees under the United States Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation, except one clerk to each of the commissioners and mere laborers or servants, shall be appointed in accordance with the civil service act and unless exempted by the President.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Maryland if the words "unless exempted by the President" in the amendment are not intended for the purpose of legislating into office those who are already there?

Mr. BRUCE. I desire those who are already there to be retained. The operation of the amendment is prospective only. I have no idea of ousting anybody who is now there. The amendment, if adopted, would bring under the civil-service system only future appointees.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I notice that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] has left the Chamber. I desire to say, and I hope that the RECORD will show, that I did not want to be discourteous to him in not yielding. I first wanted to finish the Los Angeles discussion. I hope the Senator will come into the Chamber later and make the reply which he considers appropriate to what I said a few moments ago.

As to the sale of ships, I think I have indicated what certainly is my conviction, that the mistake about the sale of the Los Angeles was not in her sale for $100,000; that is not where the mistake was; the mistake about the Los Angeles was in the bad judgment shown in the first place in spending money upon a ship which was unsuited for such repairs.

In these sales of any shipping ship to private interests we have to take into consideration the higher standard of wages and sustenance of the crew and also the larger personnel required by law on American ships as compared to similar requirements on foreign ships. So the higher costs which are involved in the operation of American ships in competition with foreign ships is made up to some extent by the decreased capital charges incident to the sale to private parties of ships at a lower figure than their original cost or their cost of reproduction. So the higher costs have been offset in some of the so-called essential service ships sold by the Shipping Board through reduction in capital cost, fixed charges, insurance, depreciation, and so forth. This has been simply a means of meeting the differentials and affording temporary relief for a situation which will continue to be permanent unless we enact legislation of some kind to correct it.

Mr. President, I have presented an amendment providing for higher loans. Now I wish to present an amendment which contemplates a cure for the disease. I send the amendment forward to the clerk's desk and in a moment will ask to have it read. Before doing that, however, let me call attention to the imperative necessity of the United States taking some effective steps to provide capital ships.

We have in the United States Lines, as I pointed out the other day, the Leviathan, which is the only high-grade ship of the first class in our ownership, either private or Government. We have running with her the President Harding, the President Roosevelt, the George Washington, and the Republic. These ships, with the exception of the Leviathan, are in no sense whatever competitors with the capital ships of the Cunard and the White Star Lines, the North German Lloyd, the Hamburg-American, and even the Cosulich Line, running from Trieste.

Let me call attention, for the sake of the record, to what is being done abroad. The White Star Line is building a new ship of 60,000 tons. She will be the largest ship afloat, greater by a thousand tons than our Leviathan, which is now the largest. That ship is to replace the Homeric and will run with the Majestic and the Olympic in the White Star service. She will have a speed of 26 knots, equal to the speed of the Mauretania, which is the fastest ship on the ocean, and considerably better than the speed of our own Leviathan.

This, however, is not all. The Cunard Line has placed a contract with shipbuilders on the Clyde for the building of a ship at a price of $30,000,000. In speed this new Cunarder will be about equal to the new White Star ship which I have just described, and it is to replace the Mauretania.

Think of that! Here we are, Mr. President, talking about rebuilding the Mount Vernon and the Agamemnon. I went to New York to live 20 years ago, and an old Ann Arbor friend of mine came on to New York because he was sailing on the Kron Prinzessin Cecile. So I inquired about that boat. I do not remember whether she is the ship which subsequently became the Agamemnon or the Mount Vernon. I will ask the Senator from Florida if he remembers as to that.

Mr. FLETCHER. She is now the Agamemnon.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well. Twenty years ago this ship was an old ship. The Agamemnon was built in 1902 or 1903. Think of it! Now we are asked to spend a vast amount of money to recondition that old hulk. Her sister ship is the Hensa. Senators will remember that the Agamemnon and the Mount Vernon were German ships and were in New York Harbor at the time we went into the war, and we took them over; but a sister ship, the Hensa, was in Germany and was preserved to Germany. After the war they reconditioned her, but she lasted only two years; that is all; and then was withdrawn from service.

I have told the Senate about the Cunard Line spending $30,000,000 to build a ship to replace the Mauretania, although the Mauretania at this moment is the fastest ship on the ocean. The Cunard owners, however, see that she is too old; she can not stand the North Atlantic storms, and so in their wisdom they are building a $30,000,000 vessel to replace her. Yet we are so short-sighted and assume such a dog-in-the-manger attitude that we are not even building any such ships or letting the people of our country do it. I speak now of the Shipping Board, which is not empowered to build any such ships; neither do we permit private enterprise to do it.

That is not all. The Germans are building two fine ships, and in order to build them they borrowed $20,000,000 in New York City.

And then here is an account I cut out of a newspaper a couple of days ago stating that the Cosulich Line is building the Saturnia and Vulcania, the two fastest motor ships ever constructed. I was in Trieste shortly after the war. At that time cobwebs were growing on the docks at Trieste, but they have so far recovered that they are now launching the two fastest motor ships upon the ocean; and yet the United States does nothing either through the Shipping Board or by encouragement of private enterprise. We ought to be ashamed of ourselves. Why are we not doing anything even in the face of subventions and contributions in France last year of $4,200,000; of assistance by Italy to her citizens to the amount of $3,000,000, and of tremendous subventions paid by the British Government to British ships and then liberal contracts made for carrying the mail?

Mr. President, we have had a challenge from this Wilder concern. It is the same challenge that has been made to the United States by every private shipbuilder in this country during the past 5 years and perhaps 10 years. How are we going to meet that challenge?

What is it that is proposed? An amendment to the ocean mail act of 1891; and I will ask the clerk to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the amendment. The Senator understands, however, that the pending amendment is the one offered by the Senator from Maryland. The amendment of the Senator from New York will be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator so understands, and he understands also that a moment ago he offered another amendment; but I ask that this one be read for the benefit of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

At the proper place in the bill, insert the following new sections:

"SEC. —. That the ocean mail act of March 3, 1891, be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"'That the Postmaster General, under such rules and regulations as the Shipping Board and the Postmaster General may prescribe, is hereby authorized and empowered to enter into contracts, for a term of not less than 5 nor more than 10 years' duration, with American citizens for carrying the mails on American steam and motor ships between ports of the United States and ports in foreign countries, the Dominion of Canada excepted, as in his judgment will best subserve and promote the postal and commercial interests of the United States.

"'SEC. 2. Before making any contracts for carrying ocean mails in accordance with this act the Postmaster General shall give public notice by advertising once a week, for three months, in such daily papers as he shall select in each of the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, New Orleans, St. Louis, Charleston, Norfolk, Savannah, Galveston, Houston, and Mobile, and when the proposed service is to be on the Pacific Ocean, then in Los Angeles, San Francisco, Portland, and Seattle. Such notice shall describe the route, the time when such contract will be made, the duration of the same, the size of the steam or motor ships to be used, the number of trips a year, the times of sailing, and the time when the service shall commence, which shall not be more than three years after the contract shall be let. The details of the mode of advertising and letting such contracts shall be conducted in the manner prescribed in chapter 8 of Title XLVI (p. 3941–3963) of the Revised Statutes for the letting of inland mail contracts so far as the same shall be applicable to the ocean mail service.

"'SEC. 3. The vessels employed in the mail service under the provisions of this section shall be American-built steam or motor ships, or steam or motor ships registered under the laws of the United States not later than January 1, 1928, or which were actually ordered and under construction for the account of American citizens previous to that date, owned and officered by American citizens, in conformity with existing law, and upon each departure from the United States, except in the steward's and commissary department, three-quarters of the crew shall be citizens of the United States, and said vessels shall be constructed after the latest and most approved types, and shall be so maintained during the period of the contract, with all the modern improvements and appliances for ocean steam or motor ships.

"'They shall be divided into five classes. The first shall be steel screw steam or motor ships, capable of maintaining a speed of 23 knots an hour at sea in ordinary weather, and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 20,000 tons. The second class shall be steel steam or motor ships, capable of maintaining a speed of 19 knots an hour at sea in ordinary weather, and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 10,000 tons. The third class shall be steel steam or motor ships, capable of maintaining a speed of 16 knots an hour at sea in ordinary weather, and of a gross tonnage of not less than 8,000 tons. The fourth class shall be steel steam or motor ships, capable of maintaining a speed of 13 knots an hour at sea in ordinary weather, and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 4,000 tons. The fifth class shall be steel steam or motor ships, capable of maintaining a speed of 9½ knots an hour at sea in ordinary weather, and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 2,000 tons. It shall be stipulated in the contract or contracts to be entered into for the said mail service that said vessels may carry passengers with their baggage in addition to said mails and may do all ordinary freight or other business done by steam or motor ships.

"'SEC. 4. All steam or motor ships of the first, second, and third classes employed as above and hereafter built shall be constructed of sufficient strength and stability to carry and sustain the working and operation of at least four effective rifled cannon of a caliber of not less than 6 inches, and shall be of the highest rating known to maritime commerce. And all vessels of said three classes heretofore built and so employed shall, before they are accepted for the mail service herein provided for, be thoroughly inspected by a competent naval officer or constructor detailed for that service by the Secretary of the Navy; and such officer shall report, in writing, to the Secretary of the Navy, who shall transmit said report to the Postmaster General, and no such vessel not approved by the Secretary of the Navy as suitable for the service required shall be employed by the Postmaster General as provided for in this section.

"'SEC. 5. The rate of compensation to be paid for such ocean mail service of the said first-class ships shall not exceed the sum of $12 a mile, for the second-class ships $8 a mile, for the third-class ships $4 a mile, for the fourth-class ships $2.50 a mile, and for the fifth-class ships $1.32 a mile for the actual number of miles required by the Post Office Department to be traveled on each outward voyage: Provided, That if the Postmaster General shall determine that it is necessary on any route to have ships of a greater speed than 23 knots per hour, he may allow $1 per mile additional for each knot per hour of speed in excess of 23 knots per hour for ships of the first class: Provided further, That when a vessel of one class is engaged in a particular trade where the draft or tonnage of such vessel is limited by harbor conditions but possesses the speed of vessels of the next higher class, the Postmaster General may, if in his opinion the needs of the trade require such service, pay to such vessel or vessels the rate of compensation allowed vessels of the next higher class: Provided further, That in the case of failure from any cause to perform the regular voyage stipulated for in said contracts, or any of them, a pro rata deduction shall be made from the compensation on account of such omitted voyage or voyages; and that suitable fines and penalties may be imposed for delays or irregularities in the due performance of service according to the contract, to be determined by the Postmaster General.

"'SEC. 6. Upon each of said vessels the United States shall be entitled to have transported free of charge a mail messenger, or messengers, whose duty it shall be to receive, sort, take in charge, and deliver the mails to and from the United States, and who shall be provided with suitable room for the accommodation of himself and the mails.

"'SEC. 7. Such steam or motor ships may be taken in case of national emergency and used by the United States as transports or cruisers, upon payment to the owners of the fair actual value of the same at the time of the taking, and if there shall be a disagreement as to the fair actual value between the United States and the owners, then the same shall be determined by two impartial appraisers, one to be appointed by each of said parties, they at the same time selecting a third, who shall act in said appraisement in case the two shall fail to agree; in case of their failure to agree, the United States Federal Court in the home port of the ship shall decide the value.'"

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EDGE in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. RANSDELL. I notice in the RECORD of the 27th, at page 2139, that the Senator from New York stated that there are 89 ships running out of New Orleans at a total loss of over $5,000,000. That statement was repeated by the Senator in two other places, I believe, during the debate.

I have carefully inquired from the Shipping Board the exact facts about the operations out of New Orleans. I find that during the fiscal year 1927 Shipping-Board-built lines out of Gulf ports operated 106 ships, at a cost above receipts of $5,249,172.23. That is substantially the amount which the Senator stated was lost out of New Orleans. Out of the port of New Orleans proper, included in the above 106 ships were 69 ships which were operated at a cost above receipts of $1,400,000.

I also find that out of north Atlantic ports 129 ships were operated, at a cost above receipts of $6,742,568.72.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. COPELAND. Does my friend desire to make a speech?

Mr. WILLIS. I desire simply to call attention to some telegrams. I will not make a speech in the Senator's time, if he will be courteous enough to yield to me.

I have in my possession here a letter which has just come to me from the offices of the National Grange, embodying a resolution adopted by the Ohio State Grange at its last annual session in Cleveland, Ohio, last November, expressing approval of this pending bill. I also have a telegram from the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, likewise expressing approval.

I have a telegram from the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce and the Dayton Chamber of Commerce expressing disapproval of this bill.

I desire that these telegrams be printed in the RECORD at this point without reading. They all bear upon this question.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, since it is a 50-50 proposition I am sure the Senator is entirely safe in his own State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the communications were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NATIONAL GRANGE,
Washington, D. C., January 28, 1928.

DEAR SENATOR: We note that the Jones bill amending the merchant marine act is approaching a vote in the Senate and wish to apprise you of the attitude of the National Grange, as expressed in the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted at our last annual session, held at Cleveland, Ohio, November 16–25, 1927:

"Whereas an adequate American merchant marine is vital to our prosperity and security as a nation; and

"Whereas private enterprise under prevailing conditions can not fully supply the need in transoceanic service: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the National Grange favors continued ownership and operation of merchant ships by the Government through the agency of the United States Shipping Board as necessity demands; and be it further

"Resolved, That we favor appropriations by Congress to keep our merchant fleet modern and efficient."

It is probably true that some of the ships of our war-time fleet should be disposed of in the most advantageous way that may be open. But we do not approve of disposing of the better class of ships for such an inadequate return as a mere five-year guaranty of operation.

We are strongly of the opinion that the time has arrived when this country must adopt definite and constructive measures to put our merchant fleet on a sound and continuing basis, unless we are to witness a painful repetition of the experiences of 1914.

We favor the Jones bill and hope you may see your way clear to support it.

Yours respectfully,

FRED. BRENCKMAN,
Washington Representative.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, January 30, 1928.

Senator FRANK B. WILLIS,
United States Senate:

The Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce favors the maintenance of the Shipping Board services with adequate provision for reconditioning and replacements in order to bring these services to their highest point of efficiency. It is our opinion that the trade routes and services established by the Shipping Board have rendered very valuable service to the commerce of the United States, and that these trade routes should be maintained until such time as they can be properly turned over to private companies which will give adequate guaranties for permanent operation and replacements with American vessels. Your support of these views is greatly appreciated.

CINCINNATI CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
W. C. CULKINS,
Executive Vice President.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, January 30, 1928.

Hon. FRANK B. WILLIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

This organization is opposed to Government ownership of merchant ships and favors the speediest possible return of ships to private ownership and operation.

THE CLEVELAND CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

DAYTON, OHIO, January 30, 1928.

Hon. FRANK B. WILLIS,
United States Senate:

We agree with stand of national chamber as opposed to Jones bill, which extends governmental ownership and operation. We favor measure which will give a private merchant marine without governmental subsidies.

DAYTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I have no question that the figures given by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] are entirely correct. He and other Senators interested will find on page 2139 a table which I had inserted on Friday, giving in detail the items named by the Senator this morning. Undoubtedly I did not speak correctly when I referred to New Orleans ships as having lost that much. It is the vessels under the Gulf operators which have lost in the 11 months $5,163,000, and that includes other lines besides those out of New Orleans.

I would not for the world have anything in the RECORD appear to indicate any unfriendliness on my part toward New Orleans, because if there is one city in the world that I love beyond my own it is the city of New Orleans.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator for those kind words.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that there was some reason, evidently, for picking out the Gulf as showing a loss and omitting any reference to the North Atlantic. The North Atlantic losses exceeded the losses from the Gulf. The most profitable lines we have now, I think, are the Gulf lines. There is less loss there than elsewhere.

We admit there is a loss sustained in the operation of Shipping Board vessels, but we say that the benefits in keeping down the rates and in the service to our commerce overseas exceed many, many times the losses. That is the position we take about it.

As far as the losses from the Gulf are concerned, I think they are less than the losses from the North Atlantic.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I fear that the Senator from Florida entirely misapprehended the purpose I had in mind in speaking about the Gulf. I am not seeking to bring about any invidious discriminations or distinctions. In the operation of Shipping Board ships there are no profits anywhere. Any time the United States Shipping Board sends out a ship with a cargo, I do not care whether it is from a Gulf port or from the port of New York, at the end of the year, when we take the difference between the earnings and the cost of operation, the record shows that for every ton carried the Government of the United States loses $1.48.

I am not here pleading that the North Atlantic lines are profitable and the Gulf lines unprofitable. They are all unprofitable. My purpose in referring to the Gulf vessels at all was to bring out this fact, that in the arrangement of the Shipping Board the members are chosen by regions, and the law prescribes that one must come from a State touching on the Gulf of Mexico. What I intended to make clear—and I hope I did so, but if I did not, then I want to make it clear now—was that in my judgment no man who is a member of this board coming from New Orleans, if he is true to his city and his State, as I believe every New Orleans appointee would be, will ever vote to dispose of the Gulf ships if he can avoid doing so.

The point is that in a regional board, of necessity the men are put upon the board to represent their respective communities and their respective regions. We have before us a bill which proposes to make it impossible to sell a ship unless there is a unanimous vote of the board, the affirmative vote of every member of the board. What I was saying about the Gulf lines, and what I repeat, is that no man representing the Gulf section will ever vote to sell those ships if he believes that his region is going to suffer by reason of it. Every other man on the board might be convinced that all the other regions in the United States would be benefited by the sale of those ships; but that man, true to his State and true to his community and true to his convictions, would do exactly what I would do if I were a member of the board; I would take care of my home port first.

Mr. President, when we are making corrections, I want to make one. There is a man out west named J. F. Hickey, the president of the Tacoma Chamber of Commerce. Tacoma is in the State of Washington. I do not know Mr. Hickey; his name means nothing to me, so there is nothing personal in what I have to say. I have no doubt that he is a charming citizen and a fine man, and I hope that if he is displeased by what I say now he will forgive me, because I do not mean to be disagreeable. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] put a lot of material in the RECORD, and among other things the following telegram, authorized by the Tacoma Chamber of Commerce, was sent to Hon. Jefferson Myers by J. F. Hickey, president of the chamber, in which he said:

> The recent action of board apparently made by you reversing earlier order convinces us that you do not understand situation, otherwise you would not have favored clause allowing a diversion of California ships—

And so forth.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, the telegrams to which the Senator from New York is referring are part of a statement made by the mayor of Tacoma which I placed in the RECORD.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from Nevada can have it his own way. I do not care how he put it into the RECORD. It is in the RECORD, is it not? This same man, J. F. Hickey, writes:

> Further, this chamber believes that it would be unfair and unwise to demand or stipulate for a guarantee of operation longer than five years.

Senators have made it appear that those men out there do not want anything for a shorter period than 5 years; that it must be 10 years or something else. Mr. Hickey says:

> It would be * * * unwise to demand or stipulate for a guarantee of operation longer than five years. This, as we understand, has been the period exacted so far in all sales made by the board for lines most desirable, and we can see no reason for exacting a longer period on these Pacific lines.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly.

Mr. ODDIE. Does the Senator know the business connections of Mr. Hickey?

Mr. COPELAND. I do not know him from the man in the moon. I have no idea who he is except that he is president of the chamber of commerce, but I do want to show that one time he said one way and another time he said the other way.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. I want to say that I know Mr. Hickey, and he is one of the very best citizens of Tacoma as well as one of the very best business men there.

Mr. ODDIE. I want to say to the Senator from New York that if he will analyze what he has read he will find there is not anything really inconsistent in what Mr. Hickey said. I think if he will study it he will find there are two different propositions involved.

Mr. COPELAND. I will do that. The Senator from Nevada can analyze this and see how he likes it from Mr. Hickey:

> Another provision we desire to urge is greater freedom of ports on both shores of the Pacific. These vessels should be allowed the entire range of ports in the Orient, and also allowed to compete at all Pacific ports on the American side. We urge this because foreign lines, with which we must compete, enjoy that privilege, and if these lines are not to be made to pay they should be given every leeway to that end.

Let the Senator from Nevada analyze that at his convenience.

Now, to go on with the discussion, I have sent forward a plan for an amendment of the ocean mail act, the law of 1891. I am very sorry that the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] is not present at the moment, because he was quite disturbed about this provision of my proposed amendment providing that the ships are to be classified according to speed and tonnage. I think he was under the impression that we have never done that and that we should not do it now. I want to call attention to the law. I have before me the code of laws and call attention to section 659, page 1275, which is the law to-day. I ask unanimous consent that at this point I may have inserted in the RECORD, without reading, section 659, to which I have referred, and also section 657.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The sections referred to are as follows:

> 659. Same; ownership of vessels; classification: The vessels employed in the mail service under sections 657 to 665 of this title shall be American-built steamships, owned and officered by American citizens, in conformity with law, or so owned and officered and registered according to law, and upon each departure from the United States the following proportion of the crew shall be citizens of the United States, to wit: During the first two years of such contract for carrying the mails, one-fourth thereof; during the next three succeeding years, one-third thereof; and during the remaining time of the continuance of such contract at least one-half thereof; and shall be constructed after the latest and most approved types, with all the modern improvements and appliances for ocean steamers. They shall be divided into four classes. The first class shall be iron or steel screw steamships, capable of maintaining a speed of 20 knots an hour at sea in ordinary weather, and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 8,000 tons. No vessel except of said first class shall be accepted for said mail service under the provisions of sections 657 to 665 between the United States and Great Britain. The second class shall be iron or steel steamships, capable of maintaining a speed of 16 knots an hour at sea in ordinary weather, and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 5,000 tons. The third class shall be iron or steel steamships, capable of maintaining a speed of 14 knots an hour at sea in ordinary weather, and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 2,500 tons. The fourth class shall be iron or steel or wooden steamships, capable of maintaining a speed of 12 knots an hour at sea in ordinary weather, and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 1,500 tons. It shall be stipulated in the contract or contracts to be entered into for the said mail service that said vessels may carry passengers with their baggage in addition to said mails and may do all ordinary business done by steamships. (March 3, 1891, c. 519, sec. 3, 26 Stat. 831; March 3, 1917, c. 162, sec. 1, 39 Stat. 1066.)
> 657. Ocean mail service on American vessels; contracts: The Postmaster General is authorized and empowered to enter into contracts for a term not less than 5 nor more than 10 years in duration, with American citizens, for the carrying of mails on American steamships, between ports of the United States and such ports in foreign countries, the Dominion of Canada excepted, as in his judgment will best subserve and promote the postal and commercial interests of the United States, the mail service on such lines to be equitably distributed among the Atlantic, Mexican Gulf, and Pacific ports. Said contracts shall be made with the lowest responsible bidder for the performance of said service on each route, and the Postmaster General shall have the right to reject all bids not in his opinion reasonable for the attaining of the purposes named. (March 3, 1891, c. 519, sec. 1, 26 Stat. 830.)
> 658. Same; advertisements for proposals: Before making any contract for carrying ocean mails in accordance with sections 657 to 665 of this title the Postmaster General shall give public notice by advertising once a week, for three months, in such daily papers as he shall select in each of the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, New Orleans, St. Louis, Charleston, Norfolk, Savannah, Galveston, and Mobile, and when the proposed service is to be on the Pacific Ocean, then in San Francisco, Tacoma, and Portland. Such notice shall describe the route, the time when such contract will be made, the duration of the same, the size of the steamers to be used, the number of trips a year, the times of sailing, and the time when the service shall commence, which shall not be more than three years after the contract shall be let. The details of the mode of advertising and letting such contracts shall be conducted in the manner prescribed in chapter 12 of this title so far as the same shall be applicable to the ocean mail service. (March 3, 1891, c. 519, sec. 2, 26 Stat. 831.)

Mr. COPELAND. Here is the point. It is the law of to-day that the Postmaster General may classify the ships according to the speed and tonnage, and that contracts may be made for a period of 5 or 10 years on the basis of this classification. So when I propose an amendment to the law providing for ocean-mail contracts, I am not asking for anything new. I am asking for what is the law of to-day. It would be in operation to-day except for what I think was a very serious mistake last year. Last year an amendment was put upon the Post Office Department appropriation bill prohibiting the use of any of the funds for contracts already made and limiting the use of the funds to the period for which the appropriation was made. It can be readily seen that any arrangement which can only be made from year to year would be impossible, because the only way we can encourage private shipping is to say to the line, "If you will carry our mail regularly by regular schedule, we will make contracts with you for 5 years or 10 years."

I see now present on the floor of the Senate a distinguished Member of the House, Congressman WAINWRIGHT, who has introduced in the House a very laudable bill, I think, which shows that he has the vision that if we are to maintain our supremacy upon the seas we must have ships of high speed which can compete with foreign ships. He proposes that we should appropriate the money to build the ships and aid private shipbuilders who would do this work, and have them run them, and if they will not do it, then the Government shall proceed with its own work of developing a first-class merchant marine.

As the result of the law of 1891, to which I have referred and which I am asking to amend, we did build up a lot of ships to serve us. Some of those might be referred to if we had more time; for instance, the Munson Line, which provides a bimonthly service to Brazil and Argentina, reaching Buenos Aires in 17 days. Prior to that time there was a sailing vessel only once a month, but when the Munson Line was built and was able to have this mail contract, the result was that they established and have been maintaining a fine service to the benefit of American commerce and American mails and American enterprise.

Then we have the Grace Line to the west coast of South America, which was established where there was no regular passenger and mail service previously to Chile and Peru. We then had to change ships two or three times. Now the Grace Line is sailing two or three times a month to those countries. The Dollar Round-the-World Line gives a service hitherto unknown. These were made possible by payments under the ocean mail service act.

We have a proposition pending before the Shipping Board, a challenge to the American Government. It says if we will meet certain conditions these ships will be built. What kind of ships? Six ships that will give us a service from port to port, America to Europe, in four days, ships capable of carrying 100 airplanes each. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] placed a picture of one of those ships on the wall the other day, to which I am pointing at this time, a ship made to receive airplanes, a ship with the stacks at one side of the deck instead of in the middle, so the airplanes can be received. It is a ship identical almost in form and shape and size with the Saratoga, just built by the same firm, that magnificent ship with reference to which we were all thrilled a few days ago when the Los Angeles, that great airship of ours, settled down on her deck.

There is a rumor about the Halls now that another submarine has been sunk, another tragedy like the S–4. Would it not be a wonderful thing if we could so develop the ships of this Nation, the ships of the Navy and the ships of our peace Navy, that disasters like this would be less frequent? If we had a 33-knot ship capable of carrying the eyes of the Navy, the airplanes, a ship that could outsail any warship upon the water, a ship that could go to every port of the world, that could have planes sent out from her decks to reconnoiter and determine the presence of hostile ships, including submarines which come to the surface for their own purposes of observation, what a fine thing it would be.

Here we have in our hands the opportunity to do this—ships which can operate airplanes from the decks, which a day before they land in Europe can send out an airplane to take the mails there, and to the deck of which, the day after they leave our shores, could be sent a plane carrying mail from here. Then from Chicago a letter could be sent to Paris in three days, from Minneapolis to Paris in four days, from Detroit to Paris in three days. Of all the romance of the seas, no dream has been equal to this, and I am assured by men competent to judge that this is a dream which can be realized. But whether it is or not there can be no effective privately owned American merchant marine unless this Government in its wisdom finds some way to encourage it. We are now spending $1,500,000 to carry mail upon British ships, subsidizing the British second line of defense, helping a government which we pray to God may never be an enemy.

But, Mr. President, why do we not in our wisdom expend the money to have ships in our own country the equal of those sent out from any other country in the world? We can have such ships if we follow the example, in some way at least, of these foreign countries. I am not asking for a subsidy. Not a dollar of money beyond the receipts of the service will be expended if my amendment shall be adopted. If the ocean mail act is amended to permit the making of long-term contracts under the terms contemplated in the amendment, it will not take a dollar from the Treasury of the United States. It is not a subsidy. It is not a subvention. It is a proposal to pay for service rendered.

I have consumed too much of the time of the Senate, but I have been anxious, as I know you have been, Mr. President, to have the country know what is going on. Here we have pending a bill which has in it no promise in the world for the construction of any ships. It is not going to aid Government-owned merchant marine one particle. It is going to defeat the placing in private hands of ships of the Shipping Board because it proposes that they shall be sold only by unanimous vote of the board.

While we have a law, the so-called Jones Act of 1920, declaring it to be our policy to develop an American merchant marine which shall ultimately be in private hands, while we have been seeking to encourage private enterprise to build and operate ships, we now have before us what? A bill that in effect says, "Stop, look, listen!" to every private citizen who has had it in mind to build a ship, to aid the American Nation, to aid in the development of an American merchant marine. Here is a notice to every such citizen, "We are not interested in you or in any proposal that you may make."

Mr. President, this bill should be recommitted. It is not right that we should hand out to the citizens of this country who are eager to build an American merchant marine such a slap in the face as is this bill. Our people are hungry for bread and we are proposing to give them a stone. Changing the figure of speech, this bill is a millstone about the necks of the private American merchant marine.

I wish the Senate might realize how ineffective is this proposed bill, how disastrous if it is enacted will it be to our progress as a nation. Unless it shall be amended in the particulars proposed by the amendments which I have sent to the desk, one to permit larger loans at the current rate of interest and the other to amend the ocean mail act so that we may have long-term contracts at a sum commensurate with the service rendered, I sincerely hope that the bill may be defeated. If the bill may be amended in the way I suggest, there will be an encouragement of private investment, and, in my judgment, within five years we shall control the seas; great ships, finer than any now afloat, will be built and put in operation, and we shall give America the first place in a peace Navy which I believe to be the desire of every citizen in this great Republic.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE obtained the floor.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HALE. I have a very short speech which I desire to deliver on the pending measure.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I thought the Senator desired me to yield for some matter of legislation, but, if his remarks will not take long, I will yield.

Mr. HALE. My remarks will consume only about 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California yields to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the bill which is now before the Senate is one of vast importance to the whole country.

Our commercial needs for a merchant marine have been set forth very fully by the able Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and by other Senators. I shall not deal with that phase of the situation at all to-day.

I simply want to point out, as a member of the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate, the paramount necessity, if we are to keep up an adequate national defense, to keep up an adequate merchant marine as well.

The Navy, as has often been said, is the first line of defense of the country; it must first meet the enemy in case of war and hold him off until the Army, the second line of defense, can mobilize and get ready for action.

The Navy must at all times be kept up in a state of preparedness for instant action.

We have a powerful fleet of battleships and a powerful force of ships other than battleships, though in some respects not an adequate force. With one exception, we are impervious to attack from any single foreign power in our own home waters; that is to say, that our country can not be invaded.

I have spoken of one exception. In all probability, considering the great advantage to the fleet that operates in its own home waters over an attacking fleet far away from its base, it would be safe to say that we are impervious to attack at home from any single foreign power.

Unfortunately, to win a war it is not sufficient to have an impregnable home defense. A war might be carried on for years without any attempt at invasion, and the nation that depended entirely upon home defense might very well have its commerce driven off the seas and be forced to disadvantageous peace, though no foreign foot ever invaded its soil.

The function of the Navy is not alone to defend its own territory; it must go out as well and drive the enemy off the seas before it in turn can bring about an advantageous peace.

While our Navy may be quite sufficient to prevent other countries from invading us, and while in case of war it might carry on in home waters with its own colliers, oilers, transports, ammunition ships, and other ships of the train, yet in case of hostilities and the necessity of moving far from its home base to come to grips with an enemy it will need to draw very heavily on the merchant marine of the country for support.

In 1914, before we entered the Great War, we had less than 1,200,000 tons of American overseas shipping, exclusive of the shipping on the Great Lakes, less than one-quarter of the tonnage needed and used by us to transport our troops and to keep up our line of communication with our troops and our fleet on the other side. We were able to secure this great tonnage of merchant vessels in large part because our allies had them and because it was of vital importance to our allies to have the benefit of our armed forces. Had we not had this allied support we could not have transported our men or used our fleet effectively.

It has been estimated that should we get into hostilities with a nation situated across the seas, either in the Eastern or the Western Hemisphere, and it should become necessary to dispatch our full Battle Fleet into the home territory of the enemy and put forth our maximum military effort, it would require 6,000,000 tons of merchant shipping adequately to keep up a line of communication with the fleet and the land forces accompanying it.

We have not 6,000,000 tons of merchant tonnage adapted to such service.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator intend to print in the RECORD the number of ships in the aggregate of 6,000,000 tons which he said would be needed?

Mr. HALE. I am merely speaking of tonnage.

Mr. COPELAND. Will the Senator let me give the figures as to the number of vessels and their classes in this connection?

Mr. HALE. I should be happy to have the Senator do so.

Mr. COPELAND. In case of war, in case we needed auxiliaries to accompany our Navy we would need 65 passenger ships of 16 knots and more, 35 freight and passenger ships of smaller size, 10 refrigerator ships, 50 colliers, 125 tankers, 30 freighters, and 25 yachts, a total of 340 vessels.

Mr. HALE. I think, Mr. President, those are the figures given by the New York Chamber of Commerce, are they not?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. HALE. I thank the Senator.

Neither, except under the advantageous conditions in which we went into the Great War, could we hope for any appreciable outside assistance in providing merchant tonnage.

Our present available tonnage is estimated at 10,400,000 tons; our present tonnage actually in use is placed at 7,430,000 tons and of this 3,580,000 tons is coastwise; much of it therefore is not adapted for overseas service.

We have practically but 3,850,000 tons on which the Navy could call in time of war, and nearly that amount would be required to keep up a line of communication with the fleet itself across the seas and no land forces accompanying it.

This small available tonnage that we now have, therefore, would not take care of our naval needs, and to take it away from the work that it is now doing, as we should in all probability have to take it, would mean the prompt winding up of our foreign trade.

Our country, which is dependent on other countries for its rubber, its tungsten, its manganese, its tin, and a dozen or more other products vital not only to our commercial manufacturing interests but to our military necessities as well, would have to get along as best it might without them. We might live, as we are a self-supporting nation, but in our crippled condition we would win no war.

It is vital, therefore, from a military standpoint alone that we have a merchant marine that we can call on in time of war; a merchant marine large enough when the Navy shall have taken the tonnage that it actually needs for military effectiveness to keep up our foreign trade and to bring to this country at the very least the actual essentials upon which depend its military efficiency.

I do not believe in Government ownership and operation of the merchant marine.

I am not in sympathy with this bill, but I regard it as absolutely essential that something be done, and done at this session, to build up American shipping.

If it can be done through a subsidy I should like to see it done. If in no other way can it be done than through Government ownership and operation, I say that it should be done in that way rather than not at all; but I do not believe that we have yet come to that pass.

The House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, I understand, is working out a plan for a privately owned and operated merchant marine. If that bill comes over to us—as I believe it will come during this session—I am hopeful that some plan for private ownership and operation can be worked out.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HALE. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. I should like to ask the Senator what is the plan proposed by the House committee?

Mr. HALE. I think they are trying to work out some plan for private ownership that will possibly be based on a subsidy of some kind.

I thank the Senator from California for his courtesy in yielding to me.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, if Senators will permit me to proceed without interruption I promise that I shall not unduly long detain the Senate.

All agree, Mr. President, that we should have and should maintain an up-to-date, well-managed, profitable merchant marine; that is to say, a fleet of cargo and passenger ships capable of playing a large part in international commerce and be assistant to the Navy in the event of war—a Navy in the event of war, which, please God, may never come, but which if it shall come be assistant in defense of the United States of America.

All agree that we should have such a merchant marine, peaceful vessels in days of peace, but capable of being assistant to the Navy in days of war. Wherefore I do not purpose multiplying words and detaining the Senate by an attempt to prove what is universally admitted.

All agree that, having due regard for our national resources and our world-wide, world-extended commercial interests, we have no such merchant marine to-day, either Government owned or privately owned.

All agree that we should endeavor to be great on the sea as we are great on the land; and if we have not become decadent, if we are not impotent descendants of brave men and courageous women, we can and should develop such a merchant marine as the commercial interests of the Nation and as, perhaps, the very independent sovereignty of the Nation demand.

To compress what I have said, this is the situation:

We need such a fleet of cargo and passenger type. We have no such fleet; and we, charged with the performance of duty, are called upon to consider how we can acquire such a fleet, the manifest need for which need not be further discussed. And so, to the chairman of the committee who reported this bill, I address the words of the great dramatist:

> The nature of the sickness found, Ulysses,
> What is the remedy?

We admit the condition; we deplore it; we almost wet the floor of the Senate with our tears over the sad condition of the American merchant marine; but what does this bill propose to cure us of the malady, of the sickness which we suffer? In a word, nothing.

We are here supposed to consider the bill before the Senate, which, of course, will be immortal in history as "S. 744." What is its purpose? What is the use to attempt to conceal, to hide, its easily perceived purpose? Its purpose is to commit this Nation to the Government ownership and control of American ships, of American cargo ships, of American passenger ships—the American merchant marine.

I fancy, Mr. President, that in some minds there is a sort of confusion as to what "merchant marine" means; but, as used, it simply means American ships to carry freight and passengers. The purpose of this bill is to commit this Nation to the ownership and the control of all American-owned, managed, and navigated ships; for, if the purpose of this bill be ever carried out, there never will be any privately owned American ships; no citizen will be able to compete with this mighty Government. It necessarily follows that those who favor this bill think that the foreign commerce of this mighty Nation should be placed in the absolute control and under the sole management of the Federal Government.

I confess amazement at the attitude of certain Senators. Talk about centralization! Talk about bureaucracy! Talk about State rights—if there be any State rights left—even the right, once thought valuable, of electing their own Senators to this body! Where are the descendants of Jackson, Breckenridge, and Calhoun, and the great original Whig, Alexander Stephens? Where are the Morgans, the Thurmans, the Bacons? Where are the descendants, the successors, of those great men who stood up for what were called, and properly called, State rights—the rights of a sovereign State under the canopy of the Federal Government, but sovereign within its own sphere? Where are they? How art the mighty fallen! Where are the great policies they once supported? Where are the great principles they once defended?

I have said on other occasions, I say now, that there are certain reserved rights of the State which are of vital importance, which never were delegated to the Federal Government, and which should be ever reserved, possessed, and enjoyed by the several States; and yet here is a proposition before us which seeks to commit to the Federal Government complete control, absolute control, over the foreign commerce of the Nation, and in effect deprive a State and the citizen of a State of the right or the opportunity to engage in foreign commerce or to own and manage ships engaged in foreign commerce.

To those thoughtful men who do me the honor to listen, and to those others elsewhere who may hear, I wish to put this question: Where is the power lodged in the Federal Government to own, possess, manage, and control the foreign commerce of the Nation?

I will return to that thought, put in that form, in a moment. I threw out the thought now lest in haste I may forget to do so later.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The Senator will recall that Senator Knox, an eminent Republican, a great lawyer and statesman, propounded a similar question several years ago during a discussion as to the authority of the Government to own and operate railroads, and his question indicated that he did not believe there was any authority in the Federal Government to own and operate a merchant marine. The then junior Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. Lenroot, replying, stated that the only authority was to be found in the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, and I recall that statements were made then that the commerce clause was invoked to cover a multitude of sins and transgressions and to invade the rights of the States and destroy their very sovereignty.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I thank the Senator for his remarks. I recall that that was the position taken by the great Senator from Pennsylvania, who was a profound lawyer, and reverenced the Constitution, and respected our dual form of government—the indestructible States making an indestructible Union. You can not destroy the one without causing the other to perish; and in all these matters with which I am concerned I bear in mind the State and the Union, the State government and the Federal Government, which are as two stars in heaven guiding us if we will but see.

When I inquire what has become of those who once stood up as against centralization of power, as against bureaucracy and its abuses, it is not done in any offensive sense. I fear because of a tendency to put temporary expediency above permanent principles. I fear because there is a disposition growing in this country to lose faith in man and to turn to government for everything, even as in decadent Rome the people demanded of government corn and games and gladiators.

I have not lost faith in man, in the American citizen, in his genius, his energy, his courage, his ability. I do not think the time has come when we must turn to State or to Federal Government as wet nurse every time we have a pain.

The proposition running all through this bill is to turn to the Federal Government in the hope that the Government may do that which it is claimed the citizen is unable to do; to do that which it is admitted the Government has failed to do!

For reasons briefly to be stated, I am unalterably opposed to any such doctrine or any such theory or to any such bill; and I shall never agree to it until and unless we are forced to admit that we are a decadent and an utterly incapable people—we, the people of the United States!

When gentlemen ask us, however, to turn all the commerce over to the Government's management, they forget the lamentable, the ghastly failure of the Federal Government in respect to that matter.

The Government has failed, they tell us. When will it succeed? One thing is certain: I venture to tell gentlemen who advocate this bill or other like measures that the fatal results of Government ownership and control of American commerce will be, first, the destruction of any privately owned merchant marine. If I were disposed to consume time I think I could demonstrate that when the great, mighty, powerful Nation should come to own all the merchant ships it could buy and navigate there could be no such thing as a successful, profitable, privately owned American ship; certainly not when the great resources of the Treasury of the United States were back of the Government-owned vessels; and if I were disposed to consume further time I think I could demonstrate not only a destruction of privately owned but a failure of Government-owned American ships, cargo as well as passenger ships.

Have we learned nothing by experience? Have we forgotten yesterday? Have we learned nothing from our puerile attempt to run and manage the railroads of America?

There may be those who look upon Government ownership or management of railroads with a certain degree of pride, but I have yet to meet any thoughtful man, or more thoughtful woman, who looks back with any rejoicing or any pride upon the manner in which the railroads of our country were managed and operated under Government control. Far better had it been if the laws had been so amended as to permit the railroads to cooperate and carry on during the war rather than to turn them over to the management of one unaccustomed to that business, with the results we now know.

Have we learned nothing? I undertake to say that the management of the railroads of this country by this Government were an easy task compared with the management and the operation of a national merchant marine; and if that Shipping Board is to be made up of the type of members that now appear to control it, what would be the result if they had complete control of the merchant marine of a nation of 115,000,000 or 120,000,000 now, and to be vastly greater in the years very soon to come?

I pause to remark that if I had the power there would be few less members of that board as it is now constituted. They would not stay upon the order of their going. I might request their resignations, but if they were not speedily tendered I would exercise the power which the President of the United States now has, without assigning any reason, to give them their walking papers.

Mr. KING. For the good of the service.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes. The President has the power, without assigning a reason, to dismiss any member of that board. That proposition was questioned, but the power was finally decided to be in the President, and so decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in a celebrated case that came up from the splendid State of Oregon, represented here in this Chamber by two of the finest Senators who ever were enrolled in this body. That remark drives from the Chamber the modest senior Senator from Oregon, but inasmuch as I once lived in the town of Salem, Oreg., and was janitor in the public school there, I know something about Senator McNary, and I know something about his brother also, who is now one of our Federal judges, and with occasional aberration, with temporary forgetfulness, Senator McNary is generally a 100 per cent Republican; therefore I am for him, as I am for a 100 per cent Democrat—however frequently he goes wrong.

But when I say that I wish to add that I am not a fanatical Republican. Some of the noblest men and some of the most splendid women of California are Democrats.

Mr. WATSON. Did they vote for the Senator?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Of course, all of them voted for me. [Laughter.] I am not a fanatical Republican. I am not one who believes that heaven is occupied entirely by Republicans. I think there are many Democrats there, and sometimes, Mr. President, I wish they were all up there. [Laughter.] Certainly nobody can take offense if I wish that he were in heaven. Pardon this levity, Mr. President; we are not here to laugh but to consider things that "bear a weighty and a serious brow."

I lay down as a proposition by which I am guided that the Federal Government is not designed to engage in foreign commerce. I lay down the proposition for thoughtful men to consider—if not immediately to answer, at least to consider—that there is no power delegated to the Federal Government to engage in the foreign commerce of the people of this Nation, to acquire, own, and operate a merchant marine in time of peace.

I hasten to suggest what may arise in the minds of others, that the Nation may acquire vessels, may operate vessels, at certain times. Under the so-called war power the Nation may do anything necessary to the successful carrying on of war; I might qualify or modify that phrase somewhat. But this Federal Government has certain specified, expressed, delegated powers. It has certain necessarily implied powers, but unless you can find in the Constitution the delegated power, or by necessary interpretation can find the impliedly delegated power, the power does not exist in the Federal Government.

Under the so-called war power the Congress may do many things. Why? We have the power to declare war. That is all that the Constitution says, but it has been held, and held properly, that having the power to declare war, impliedly we have the power to carry on war, impliedly we have the power to do whatever is necessary to the carrying on of war. And so it is that, having found ourselves in war with a European empire, a state of war existing and recognized, the war powers of this Government, under the section we all have in mind, authorized Congress to buy ships, to build ships, to manage ships, all for the avowed purpose of aiding the Nation in the carrying on to success, if God so willed, of war which Congress authoritatively declared to exist. Now, while it may not avail anything for me to say it, still I conceive it to be my duty this day to say that I question the constitutional power of the Congress, in times of peace, to engage generally in the foreign commerce of the Nation.

The same thought may be developed by putting it in this form: What was the design of the fathers who framed the Constitution of the United States? Was it to engage in commerce? No, no. Was it to buy ships and sail ships? Far from it. Those great men who sat yonder in Philadelphia and framed the Constitution under which we live never had in contemplation the carrying on of commercial enterprises, pure and simple, by the Federal Government.

Did Virginia think so? Did old North Carolina advance any such notion? Did Georgia, which so quickly and unanimously ratified the Constitution? Did any one of the 13 States, as represented by their delegates in conventions assembled, ever advance the notion or entertain the idea, that the Federal Government was organized, that this "more perfect union" was to be formed, in order that the Federal Government might, as a government, carry on and control the commerce of the United States of America?

Wherefore on constitutional grounds I oppose this bill, and all like measures, because I do not find in the Constitution of our country, as it was designed, as it was adopted by the people, as it has been interpreted, as it is, any power given to the Federal Government in times of peace to buy, own, manage, control, monopolize, the foreign commerce of America.

Mr. President, more than a question of economic policy is involved in this proposed legislation; a vital principle of our Federal Government is at stake. I wish all Senators were familiar with the historic case of Chisholm against Georgia, decided in 1793 and reported in Second Dallas Reports, at pages 419, and following; I wish the people at large were acquainted with the opinion of Mr. Justice Wilson, of Pennsylvania, rendered in that case. He speaks of the origin and dignity of man and of the origin and dignity of a state; he dwells on the rights of man and on the functions of a state.

In noble words he points out that, useful as the state is, it is the creature, not the creator:

> Man, fearfully and wonderfully made, is the workmanship of his all-perfect Creator: A state, useful and valuable as the contrivance is, is the inferior contrivance of man; and from his native dignity derives all its acquired importance. When I speak of a state as an inferior contrivance, I mean that it is a contrivance inferior only to that which is divine. Of all human contrivances, it is certainly most transcendently excellent. It is concerning this contrivance that Cicero says so sublimely: "Nothing, which is exhibited upon our globe, is more acceptable to that divinity, which governs the whole universe, that those communities and assemblages of men which, lawfully associated, are denominated states."

Now, the Federal Government was created by the people, by the people of the thirteen original States; it was created for certain defined purposes and endowed with certain powers, expressly or impliedly delegated. I deny that the Federal Government was endowed with the power to engage in and control the commerce of the people of this Nation in times of peace. Let me not be misunderstood; under the so-called "war power" the Government may take over and control the commerce of the Nation, but neither by express nor implied delegation of power has the Government the power of engaging in and controlling the commerce of the people of the United States in times of peace.

The state is the creature; man creates the state. Yet gentlemen here and elsewhere who call themselves progressive are advocating doctrines which would make the state the creator and man the creature, would put sovereignty in the government instead of retaining it in the people, and if these false doctrines prevail we shall come to walk under the state's huge legs—to paraphrase—to find ourselves dishonorable graves.

I repeat that the state is the creature, man the creator of the state. It is so with our State governments. It is manifestly so with the Federal Government. The powers of the Federal Government are delegated powers, expressly or necessarily impliedly delegated, as the great John Marshall so powerfully stated and so conclusively justified.

Gentlemen are proposing a step to-day in harmony with other steps they would take to set the state above the man. Perhaps they will yet go to the point of claiming that all sovereignty rests in the Congress, as it was once held that all sovereignty rested in the Parliament, regardless of the men and women making up the Nation.

We have a different theory. Sovereignty is in the people. We are sovereign, "We, the people." We are the creators of the state, and I do not wish to see the time come when the state will be regarded as all wise and all powerful and manage and control the affairs of the men and women of America, including all the foreign and domestic commerce of the people of the United States.

Wherein does sovereignty lie? Listen not to me but to the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking in the words of Mr. Justice Wilson:

> To the Constitution of the United States the term "sovereign" is totally unknown. There is but one place where it could have been used with propriety. But even in that place it would not, perhaps, have comported with the delicacy of those who ordained and established that Constitution. They might have announced themselves "sovereign" people of the United States. But, serenely conscious of the fact, they avoided the ostentatious declaration.

Mr. President, it may be thought that I am indulging in mere platitudes. They may fall upon unresponsive ears, but these platitudes express vital principles of free government, principles which our fathers proclaimed and defended with their blood.

Perhaps I repeat myself, but I wish the Senate to know, I wish the people to know, that I have not lost faith in the ability of American citizens to carry on commerce if properly, legitimately, and intelligently encouraged and aided by our Federal Government. I have said enough to show that I am unalterably opposed to turning over all this commerce—for it will come to that, Mr. President—into the hands of the Federal Government, which necessarily must be in the hands of a commission or a board made up of a very limited number of men. Talk about autocracy! Talk about centralized power! If and when all the foreign commerce of the United States shall be placed under the control of the Federal Government, and that commerce immediately in the control of a limited number of men, what may become of New Orleans or Charleston or San Francisco or Boston or New York? I do not say that any commission or board as now constituted or hereafter to be constituted would prefer the one city or the other or seek to advance the commercial interests of one section over the commercial interests of another. I am suggesting that such a program for the future is pregnant with great danger, is charged with the possible destruction of cities, ports, whole sections of our country.

Even this day we have heard upon this floor comments which, to my mind, were very unpleasant—alarming, if true. It was suggested that because a member of the present Shipping Board comes from Louisiana, I believe, or the southern section of our country, therefore he has favored and would favor continuing the operation of ships from that section because of local interests, even though operated at a great loss. I do not say that that gentleman, or any official, would be so controlled. It is deplorable if it were so. I am suggesting, however, that if all the commerce of America is placed entirely under the control of a limited number of men they will have the power to build up or to wreck one city or another, to enrich or impoverish one section or another. It is vesting in the Federal Government a power to be so exercised, a power and a control which I do not think should be so vested and which, to repeat, I do not think the Federal Government under our system is competent or has the constitutional right to accept or undertake, to exercise.

What is the situation? The Government has title to many ships, some built by ourselves, some acquired during and as a result of the war. Those built by ourselves, of course, were built in great haste for war purposes, not for commercial purposes. Congress had the power to appropriate money for the building of those ships in aid of the carrying on of war under the so-called "war powers," a phrase misleading to many, not to us here, perhaps, but misleading to a great many otherwise intelligent citizens. There is no specific mention of "war powers" in the Constitution. It is an implied power springing out of our power to declare war, as I have stated a moment ago. But the ships which were built for war purposes, hastily built, in the hurry and excitement and in the atmosphere of war, were slow moving, unadapted for modern trade, and certainly not built to compete with the modern up-to-date, greater cargo capacity, fast-going, motor-propelled, Dieselized-engine ship of to-day.

The ships which we thus built, slow-going ships, unadapted to commerce, but avowedly designed for war purposes only, have been for some years and now are under the control of the Shipping Board. The foreign ships since built are faster. Fully 50 per cent of them, we are told, have been Dieselized, both the cargo ships and the passenger ships. Here we have on our hands these remaining old, slow-going, inferior ships. I restrain myself lest I be unparliamentary, but we have in this bill a proposition that no one of those old, slow-going, antiquated, obsolete ships, though rotting at the wharves or being propped up on the surface from sinking, may not be sold without the affirmative unanimous vote of the present Shipping Board. I can imagine that there might be some member of that board, and I think I could name him, who would object to the selling of any one of such ships. He would probably say: "Keep them and put them in some museum." Of course, we can not rival our competitors with this type of ships. They ought to be sold. It would be a good business proposition to give some of them away to any loyal, 100 per cent American citizen who would be willing to take them, or one of them, and undertake to engage in some sort of profitable trade under the American flag.

Yet we are told that none of these ships, good, bad, or indifferent, shall be sold without the unanimous affirmative vote of the board. It is proposed thus to commit the Government to the unwise and unconstitutional policy of permanent ownership, management, and control of the foreign commerce of America. It is not because I come from California, with her thousand miles of seacoast and looking out upon the earth's greatest ocean, that I make this statement. I would say the same if I came from any State in the Union, whether it be inland or seacoast. I protest against a proposition which looks to the Federal Government operating and controlling the commerce of America; and with respect, unfeigned respect—not pretended, but with unfeigned respect—for Senators who have in days gone by stood in this Chamber and argued and protested against centralization of power, against the encroachment of government, against lodging such great power in the Federal Government, I say that I thought weeks ago there would be a solid Democratic phalanx marching against this bill because of the purposes which are concealed within it.

I am speaking at this hour, perhaps all in vain, against a present and a persistent movement to take from the States their legitimately reserved powers and to lodge in the Federal Government power over all the people in the country in respect to a great subject matter, namely, the commerce of the Nation. If this bill should pass and if the program should be carried out, then farewell to the rights of the citizen of the United States to engage in international or overseas commerce and, as I can foresee, ultimately the coastwise trade or commerce of the country.

Mr. President, there are others who wish to speak and therefore I will ask at this point in my remarks to insert in the RECORD the names of the gentlemen who attended the conference here lately held by the Shipping Board, and also the reports which that conference made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLEASE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

MAJORITY REPORT

Whereas representatives of American steamship and trade associations and allied interests, in conference with officials of the United States Shipping Board, at Washington, D. C., this 11th day of January,

1928, desire to place on record the following brief analysis of conditions at present surrounding the American merchant marine,

We deem it to be an axiomatic truth, evidenced by Executive pronouncements, acts of Congress, and otherwise, that the people of the United States are desirous of possessing a merchant marine fully able to handle the greater portion of the country's water-borne commerce and also to serve as a naval auxiliary in time of national peril.

In order to appraise the present shipping situation it becomes necessary to consider the existing merchant fleet under its two grand divisions: First, that part engaged in the purely domestic coastwise and intercoastal trades; second, the overseas or strictly foreign services.

The coastwise and intercoastal trades are restricted by law to vessels built in the United States and owned and operated by citizens thereof. This being an exclusively American industry, protected from foreign competition by our beneficent coastwise laws, it shares in the general prosperity of the country and constitutes one of the largest and finest shipping services in the world.

In a different status is the overseas fleet, organized largely since the war and operated with war-built ships, most of them under the control of the Shipping Board. Exposed to competition with faster and more modern vessels launched during the past few years by our foreign shipping rivals, this portion of the American merchant marine operates at a great disadvantage when compared with the coastwise fleet. Practically all American vessels engaged in foreign trade were designed before the advent of the fast modern "motor ship," whereas the freight and passenger vessels which are being turned out so rapidly from the English, German, Italian, French, Scandinavian, and Japanese yards constitute the new and speedier type. It is well to note that fully 50 per cent of the vessels now under construction throughout the world are motor ships. This, of course, means that unless present conditions are changed American ships will handle a constantly decreasing share of our vast overseas trade and will lose all hope of securing the profitable freight and passenger business.

The original theory underlying our recent national shipping operations was that the Government should use its war-built merchantmen in establishing steamship service on routes essential to American commerce, and should then dispose of these services to private American capital. The advent of the motor ship, coupled with differentials in operating costs, due in great measure to different standards of living, has tended to make the purchase of the Government's lines so unattractive from an investment standpoint that of the 35 lines established by the Shipping Board only 10 have been sold. Although efforts are being made to remove some of the existing handicaps by converting a number of the Government's vessels into motor ships, the process is a slow and costly one and thus far has been applied to only a few ships. The net results of these operations may be summed up by saying that while the converted vessels show a gratifying decrease in operating costs, the gain in speed is negligible and in no sense offsets the fast service furnished by our foreign competitors with new ships of modern type designed for specific trade routes.

The present situation admits of no misinterpretation. Our overseas merchant fleet is being rendered obsolete by the rapid march of science and invention, which has completely revolutionized the manner of vessel propulsion since our ships were built. In the absence of a replacement and reconditioning program, early transfer of a substantial part of the remaining ships to private ownership, with reasonable assurance of continued operation, is unlikely.

In these circumstances but two alternatives present themselves. One is to modernize the fleet. The other is to retire from the seas. The most vital national interests are involved, to say nothing of an annual ocean freight bill exceeding $700,000,000.

We believe that the Shipping Board, in the face of serious obstacles, has done its best to carry out the merchant marine act of 1920. But we further believe that a crisis has been reached and that the future of the American merchant marine now depends upon prompt constructive action by Congress. This action should look toward reconditioning some of the present fleet, and should otherwise provide inducements having in view its early transfer to private ownership under conditions assuring continuance of operation. Whatever Congress may do along this line will be unavailing unless it provides a way by which private American citizens will be enabled to own and operate modern ships in the ocean carrying trade of the world in competition with citizens of the other great maritime nations:

Now, therefore, with due regard to the exigencies of the shipping situation as above set forth, be it

Resolved, That this conference indorses the general principles and policies embodied in the bills at present pending in Congress, known as the Wood bill (H. R. 2) and the Copeland bill (S. 2036); and

Resolved further, That we recommend that the principles and policies contained in the main provisions of the above-mentioned bills be enacted into law, and to that end, that the United States Shipping Board furnish such information to Congress and make such reasonable effort to procure amendments and modifications as may be necessary to provide such adequate aid as will assure the United States having a successful, permanent American merchant marine under private ownership; and

Further resolved, That we recommend that the United States Shipping Board lay before Congress full information concerning the character and number of new ships which in its judgment should be constructed in American shipyards to modernize the services now operated by the board.

MINORITY REPORT

Resolved, That we recommend that the principles and policies contained in the main provisions of the Wood bill and the Copeland bill be consolidated in a composite bill and be enacted into law, and that the United States Shipping Board procure such amendments and modifications as may be necessary, including the change of the Jones bill so that sales of vessels therein referred to might be made upon the concurrence of five commissioners, and also that section 4 of the bill have a proviso that it shall be suspended for a period of one year from the date of the enactment of the composite legislation contained in all three bills mentioned above, with a view of ascertaining to what extent citizens might build vessels under the provisions of the Wood bill, and contemplating that, if private capital furnish necessary replacements to the American merchant marine, no building under the Jones bill would then be necessary, and provided that nothing in the Jones bill shall be construed as a commitment to permanent Government operation and ownership, and provided further that section 4 of the Jones bill be amended so as to read, after the word required, "to replace vessels in operation on the trade routes being maintained by the Shipping Board."

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, a great deal has been said about the sales which have been made. What is the use of wasting our time in discussing that matter unless it be to avoid similar mistakes, if mistake was made, in the future? We can not call back yesterday. We can not call back the spent arrow or the past life or the lost opportunity. I shall not waste my time or the time of the Senate in going into a curious or detailed examination as to whether a given boat was sold at an inadequate price or not. They have been sold. One thing, however, is true. While in the possession and ownership of the Government they were a daily loss to the Government, and in a sense the Government was relieved from a continuing expense—an expense incurred whether the given boat was anchored or tied to a wharf or was being navigated across the ocean. Whether in port or en route, each vessel was a constant loss to the Government, and perhaps it was wise to dispose of it; to give it away.

It may be observed, however, that when it came to the sale of the ships there were such conditions imposed upon the contract of purchase as made it unwise, unprofitable for American citizens to meet those provisions and to purchase the given ships. I had intended to point out specifically the various provisions or conditions which were imposed upon the proposed sales. I have them in typewritten form which, with the permission of the Senate, I will ask to incorporate in the RECORD at this point rather than read them and take up the time of Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

* * * * * * *

The first effort to sell the tonnage owned by the United States Shipping Board to private owners was on June 17, 1919. The prices made by the Shipping Board were from $210 to $225 per dead-weight ton, on terms of 25 per cent cash and an installment plan for the remainder. This price was from $10 to $25 per ton above the cost of the ships to the Government of the United States and from $30 to $50 over reproduction costs in private American yards, and $75 per ton above the costs of production in British yards. With these ridiculous prices fixed by the United States Shipping Board for the sale of ships constructed during the war and for war purposes, the ships, of course, were not sold, as private purchasers were not foolish enough to pay $10 to $25 above the cost of the ships to the Government and from $30 to $50 above the cost of reproduction in American yards. The charge that the United States Shipping Board was working in the interest of private parties in the sale of these ships is not borne out by the facts. * * * And inasmuch as in 1919 the sentiment for public ownership had begun to make itself felt, it is very probable that the United States Shipping Board had no desire to sell the ships, or else they would not have asked the price that they did ask.

On February 10, 1920, the board allowed a 10 per cent reduction for a ship 1 year old and an additional 1 per cent for each additional year of the vessel's life for the following five years, and 5 per cent each year thereafter. These prices reduced the vessels from $180–$203 per ton, and two-year boats from $178–$208 per ton. These prices were no more attractive than the prices above; and later in 1920 the bareboat charter plan, with an option to purchase, was adopted, with 2½ per cent cash and monthly payments of $8.80 per ton until 50 per cent of the total was paid, and the remainder to be in equal installments within five years of the date of sale. This scheme did not work, and the rate was again reduced to $5 per ton a month. The sale plans of the United States Shipping Board were changed five times in 1920. * * * The board again reduced the cost of the ships to $160–$175 per dead-weight ton for coal burners and $175–$185 per dead-weight ton for oil burners, with a 10 per cent discount; but as private shipbuilders were selling the same kind of ships a week before for $144 per dead-weight ton, no one was quite foolish enough to pay the higher cost to purchase the tonnage of the United States Shipping Board. Had the Shipping Board taken advantage of shipping conditions in 1919 and fixed a lower rate, many possible purchasers might have been secured; but because they did not sell and held onto the tonnage until foreign nations constructed new, fast, large, motor-operated ships, no one was willing to attempt to compete in the foreign trade with these old ships. A prerequisite of sale by the Shipping Board was the construction of new tonnage in American yards to replace this tonnage after it had been in the foreign trade for a period of five years, and as a consequence the ships were left in the hands of the United States Shipping Board, where they still are; and only 10 lines have been sold. Twenty-three lines still remain in the hands of the Shipping Board, and the rest of its tonnage is rotting in various parts of the United States and is a dead loss to the Government.

* * * * * * *

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. So, I repeat, the past is gone, and many of us wish we could recall it; but it is gone, and we should consider it only for the light it gives us. The only reason why we should remember unhappy experience is that it may cause us to avoid errors and assist us in our onward march; and yet, Mr. President, while we waste our time in going over the past and criticising and deploring and weeping over mistakes there are those in the Senate, and perhaps elsewhere, who would continue in control, with vastly greater power, a board which they tell us has, either through incompetency—let us hope it was only incompetency—or for some other cause, sacrificed the rights and the property of the United States Government. I do not charge them with other than proper motives; I am far from imputing wrong or wicked or corrupt motives.

I am not adversely criticizing, for I suppose we can favorably criticize as well as adversely criticize. Some persons think that when one says he is criticizing a man therefore he is adversely criticizing him. I am neither adversely nor favorably criticizing. I am merely saying that Senators here on the floor who inveigh against and adversely criticize the acts of these gentlemen and comment on them almost ad infinitum still wish to continue them or a like board in control of the commerce—of what? Not of a little city, not of a village, not of a State, but of a Nation of one hundred and twenty-odd million people. Notwithstanding all this experience, notwithstanding the fact that we have been a lamentable failure, notwithstanding the fact that this fleet has cost us millions and hundreds of millions of dollars, notwithstanding that we are now running the ships at a loss, notwithstanding that we have through a series of years proved that we can not operate at other than a loss, it is proposed to continue right on. No matter what rocks lie ahead, no matter what sunken reefs, we are to go right ahead like a drunken sailor, trusting to some power to save us.

We are told that these ships must be sold because they can not keep up with the foreign ships. They can not. Seven or eight or nine or ten knot ships can not, of course, compete with 15, 16, 17, or 18 knot cargo ships. In a sense they are out of date. It would be better to sell them to-morrow, to give them away, as any intelligent gentleman would; if he had a ship which was incurring a daily loss, he would give it away to some friend, begging pardon of the friend.

Oh, it is said we have got to "recondition them." Again I wish to be parliamentary, remembering the inquiry of a former Senator from Kentucky one day as to what would be parliamentary and what would not. I wish to speak with decorum, with proper regard for the proprieties, and with due respect for those who father this bill. But when I remember what "reconditioning" by the Shipping Board has cost the Government and am told that it is proposed to "recondition" the rest of our obsolete fleet I find it difficult to speak with Chesterfieldian restraint.

For it is proposed by the learned Thebans that we shall spend hundreds of millions of dollars in rejuvenating—"reconditioning" is the big, high-sounding word—in "reconditioning" these out-of-date, rotting, almost sinking hulks. Some of them of course, are not so far gone, but they are on the way. Such is the argument advanced in support of the proposition that none of them shall be sold without the unanimous consent of this extraordinary board. I know, as every other Senator knows, that there is a proposition to dispose of a number of the cargo ships now out on the Pacific shores. Bids have been called for and are to be opened on the 10th of next month. The other day when I said I did not like to see this bill "rushed through," I meant to say, and I now say, that I think the bill was introduced and that it has been urged forward in the hope that it would pass the Senate and pass the House of Representatives and—which let no man suppose—be signed by the President before the 10th of next month, in order to prevent the sale of those ships lying out there on the Pacific shore, no matter what the offers of purchase might be.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the Senator from California does not think that I had any such hope as that, does he?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Well, Mr. President—

> Hope springs eternal in the human breast:
> Man never is, but always to be blest.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator from California will remember that substantially the same bill as that now pending was reported favorably at the last session by the Commerce Committee.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. But it died last session, and let us hope that the demise of the pending bill is approaching. [Laughter.] Of course it died, and it should have died. When the pending measure shall be dead, I will join Senators in a eulogy, for I had rather pronounce a eulogy than deliver a philippic.

However, we are told that we must keep these ships and that we must recondition them—that is a favorite word in the nomenclature of the Shipping Board—"recondition" these Teredo-eaten, barnacled ships lying at some far-away wharf, a great many of them out on the Pacific coast. They must be "reconditioned," Mr. President, no matter what the cost, no matter how foolish to do so, lest the American flag disappear from the ocean, and John Bull capture America!

I come now, Mr. President, to the significant fact that the advocates of this bill confess Government failure. I wish those words could be written large across the pages of this bill. They confess failure; wherefore it is not necessary for me to prove their failure. I remember a case where a group of lawyers were inquiring whether a certain gentleman was a great lawyer. An argument was started, whereupon a friend remarked that they need not prove it, that the gentleman in question would admit it. It is not necessary for me to prove failure, for they admit failure on the part of the Federal Government to manage and control successfully the merchant fleet, a fleet never designed for commercial purposes, and a Government never designed to carry on commercial enterprises. This Government was set up to preserve the life and liberty of man; it was set up to carry out the immortal principles enunciated in the Declaration of Independence that man was entitled to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Our Government was never designed as a commercial enterprise, and I question the power of Congress in times of peace to purchase, hold, and control and monopolize the commerce of the American people.

While some of the ships have been sold, others have not been sold, and why not? We have but to consider the type of the ships to which I have referred and the conditions of sale imposed by the Shipping Board, and we shall see why these ships have not been sold. The naked truth is, the Shipping Board has been opposed, is opposed, to selling them. It is to be remembered that these ships are more than 10 years old; that the average effective life of a cargo ship is about 20 years. Private owners have purchased some of them for no other reason than that they were able to secure them at a very low cost, thereby placing themselves on a parity, in so far as value is concerned, with their foreign competitors, whose ships of corresponding age have been written down to similar values. While these ships have some value at the present time, by reason of their low cost, in one or two years more no private owner would buy them if he were compelled to continue them for any great term in the foreign trade, by reason of the competition that he will meet from fast, economical, Dieselized ships.

Thus we are brought to this situation: Slow-going ships as against fast-moving ships, old, out-of-date types of ships as against new, modern, up-to-date types, and our Government has the one type and our foreign rivals have the other. We can not as a Government compete as of now, and we can not in the future as a Government compete, with this type of ships. We can, as is proposed, undertake to recondition these old ships, which is a naval architectural impossibility and an almost criminal folly, costing vast sums, or we can scrap or dispose of them and undertake to build new ones of a type equal, if not superior to, those of our rivals. The latter program will cost this Nation untold money and ultimately be a failure.

Why have we lost our rank on the seas, Mr. President? I shall not undertake to display a knowledge of history by tracing the development of shipping. We all recall the Phoenicians; we recall when the Mediterranean was the great theater of the world's commerce. Then the Atlantic Ocean became, and may still be, the great highway, God's unfranchised highway, across which man travels; but the time is fast approaching when the Pacific Ocean will be the theater of the greatest commerce of the world, international, around-the-world commerce. While the thought of that great ocean is in our minds, I would have this Nation remember that we need a Navy, not for war and aggressive purposes on our part but for peaceful preparedness.

We need a Navy, and the Constitution in effect commands us "to provide and maintain a Navy," not for conquest but for defense. We need a merchant marine of peaceful vessels assistant to the Navy in time of danger, not because we are threatening, not because we are envying, not because we design attack upon any nation on the earth, whether it fronts on the Pacific or any other of the seven seas. This Nation is smitten with a love of peace. We are not conspiring, here in the Senate or elsewhere, against any nation; and there is no foreign diplomat in Washington, there is no capital in Europe or Asia, that is justified in having even a suspicion that America is designing attack upon any people or any nation in the world. But we have a right to prepare to defend ourselves if attacked; and unless we are unworthy of our ancestors we shall always be ready and able to defend ourselves when attacked. As for me, I think we should be able at all times to protect the Nation here at home, and to protect any American citizen who travels abroad on a lawful errand.

I want the spirit of another day to live to-day and to-morrow—the spirit in America which insists upon the rights of American citizens being respected, wherever those rights are involved. When we speak of the Pacific Ocean we think of a Navy, not with a latent spirit of hostility, a hidden design or purpose of hostility toward Japan or toward Korea or China or Java or Siam or any of the oriental peoples or nations. We want trade, and we want our ships that sail from San Francisco or Portland or Seattle or Los Angeles or from Gulf or Atlantic ports to be able to proceed on around the world and not be cut off by any nation that might be hostile to us. And if there shall ever develop any disposition to cut us off in our trade around the world, we should have a navy capable of asserting our rights.

Perhaps I have said too much on that point; but it is in my thoughts as bearing upon the proposition that this Government shall take over all the commerce of the Republic, place the maritime interests of a Nation in the hands of a half dozen partisan politicians.

It is admitted that Government management has failed. There is no reason to believe or to hope that Government management can succeed. But what could we have done to assist our merchant marine? Under the act of 1920 we could have done a great deal. We have done practically nothing. We have done nothing to aid the private shipowners. We could have done many things. We could have given, and we should give, more advantageous mail contracts to our citizens. We could have applied the rail export rate provision of the act of 1920. We could, on certain conditions, have reduced the duty on ship repairs made in foreign ports. We could have extended the coastwise laws, even unto the Philippines, giving us, if you please, a monopoly over the trade between the Philippines and our country. These are very important propositions. They could have been carried into effect, and, if carried into effect, would have been and will be highly helpful to the American shipowner or company operating American ships.

I happen to know a little something about the matter of contracts for the carrying of mail, and I look back with a feeling almost of indignation toward certain Government officials here in Washington who seemed perfectly willing to allow the Oceanic Steamship Co., the American line, to be driven off the sea, giving the mail contract to the English company—perfectly willing to do that because the English company wisely on its part offered to carry the mails a little cheaper than the American line could afford to carry them. I took occasion to point out to that gentleman, who seemed to think more of Downing Street than of Washington, that if that steamship line running from San Francisco to Australia, which had carried the American flag across the Equator for over 40 years, many times at great losses to the company and its stockholders, was driven off the sea and the mail contract given to the English company, we, America, would be dependent upon the English company for our mail and our necessary supplies for our establishment at Samoa. That official appeared to think more of John Bull than of Uncle Sam.

In other words, there are those in this country who talk loudly but perform very feebly in favor of building up and sustaining an American merchant marine. In that case, I repeat, they seemed to be perfectly willing to give the contract to carry the United States mails to the English company, even though it meant the loss or the destruction of our own American line, and making us at Samoa dependent entirely for supplies as well as mail upon the English company. That company, as I understand, has been acquired by others and is being operated. But how long will the privately owned shipping company be able to live if the Federal Government undertakes to monopolize, as it will monopolize, the shipping business of America?

I repeat, Mr. President, that under the shipping act of 1920 we could have done many things to aid American shipping, but we have done nothing. Members of the Shipping Board have quarreled like children in any alley, have paid extravagant attorney fees, have made speeches and drawn their salaries promptly, and some of them are now bent on holding on forever. Having failed to do anything, why not do something?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator speaks of the failure to do anything on the part of Congress. The Senator knows the reason why the coastwise privilege was not extended.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly I do, sir. It is not the fault of Congress; certainly not.

Whose fault it is, we may know. The Shipping Board has done nothing; the Interstate Commerce Commission has done nothing; nobody has done anything under the act of 1920 in aid of the American citizen in his foreign commercial enterprises; but what can we do? I am not concerned to-day with Pompeii or Herculaneum. I am concerned with the United States of America; and may I say, not claiming to be broader minded than others, I am not thinking of my own great imperial State of California alone, although I would be justified in dwelling somewhat upon California's interest in this great problem, because we are no longer the back yard of the Nation. I do not say we are the front yard. Let me say there are two yards to this Nation, but assuredly we are not the back yard of the Nation. I repeat that California has a thousand miles of coast line and four and a half to four and three-fourths millions of people. We look out upon that great ocean. We take a lively interest in Alaska, in Hawaii, in Samoa, in the Philippines. We do not get seasick when we look upon the rolling waves. We are not afraid of the ocean. I pause to say that I hope to see that great ocean forever pacific in fact as it is in name. I want to see it plowed and furrowed by the keels of peaceful vessels. I never want to see its waters reddened with the blood of man. I want it to be a peaceful ocean, a great highway of commerce, carrying the products of our factories and farms and forests to foreign markets, and bringing hither such products as we can not advantageously produce, or produce at all. I want peaceful commerce over the Pacific Ocean, as over all the oceans of the earth; but I want to see that commerce carried on by the men of California, the men of South Carolina, the men of Georgia, the men of Florida, the men of Maine, the men of New York—the men of America—rather than by the Federal Government; carried on by men and women interested in the problem, rather than by incompetent politicians sitting here in Washington or traveling hither and yonder across this country, meanwhile costing the people hundreds of millions of dollars. I want the rights of man preserved, the rights of the citizen, rather than to see the Federal Government swallow up, so to speak, the men and the women and the interests of America.

What can we do to rival Great Britain? Since when were we unable to meet Great Britain on land or sea? Perhaps we have not always been able to meet her in diplomatic councils. I regret to be obliged to admit that we have sometimes lamentably failed to meet her clever, far-seeing statesmen. Whatever may be said of Great Britain, this is true:

Whether it be Tudor or Plantagenet, Liberal or Conservative, Gladstone or Disraeli, Lloyd-George or Baldwin, they exalt England; they enthrone England in their hearts, and, proud of England as "a precious stone set in the silver sea," they have ever sought to extend her power and expand her commerce, not unwilling to see the fleets of every nation sink, providing that of Great Britain floats. My pride and love do not mislead me when I add that we have statesmen in America. Our misfortune is that they get panic-stricken, forget fundamental principles of our Government, and in the supposed interest of partisanship do what their better judgment fails to approve, and this they do out of a mistaken notion that they are benefiting their party. They now seem to have forgotten the wise words of a former President: "He serves his party best who serves his country best."

All I am asking in respect of this bill and others of like character is that the Nation's representatives in House and Senate shall not forget some of the fundamental, elemental principles of this Government, shall not forget that the Federal Government has only those powers which are specifically delegated to it or which, by necessary implication, are impliedly delegated to it; and that, instead of despairing, instead of admitting our defeat, we set about here in America to rival Great Britain, to rival France, or Germany, or Italy, or any of the maritime peoples of the Old World.

We can do it. Why not? We, the people, can do it, but no bickering Shipping Board can do it and no Federal Government operated necessarily by a limited number of men can do it. The Government can not do it, but the people of this country, if given proper and legitimate governmental assistance and encouragement, can rival any maritime people on earth.

What can we do legitimately to aid American shipping?

We can learn something from Great Britain, for example. How did Great Britain build up her great maritime power? Those familiar with the subject know how she did it. There was a time when she became the great workshop of the world. There was a surplus in the products of her factories, and she sought markets. Her statesmen looked to Madagascar or to South Africa or to Australia, to farther India, where there were peoples willing to buy, but the goods had to be delivered there. Ships had to be built and communication established. They gave long mail contracts to a company if it would set up a line and maintain a line from England to the remote market. They did that with the clear understanding that there would be a deficit in the post office department, that it would cost the Government something to carry out this mail contract, but that by the time the mail contract expired they would develop a great and profitable trade with that distant country and the company would be well established and able to maintain itself. We, on the contrary, have practically limited mail contracts to one year.

What can we do to encourage American shipping? We can enter into long-time, legitimate, advantageous mail contracts with American companies to carry the mail, which will be an aid to American shipping interests and advantageous directly and indirectly to every American industry, including agriculture.

What else can we do? We can extend our coastwise laws to our overseas possessions. I assume that all Senators know exactly what that means. Our coastwise trade is an American monopoly. We could extend our coastwise laws to the Philippines; and if we did, that would give us a practical monopoly of trade between the United States and that archipelago.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, of course the Senator is correct in that we could do it if we passed legislation authorizing it to be done, but nearly 10 years have passed away and nothing has been done in that direction.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Exactly; I thank the Senator. I remarked a moment ago that we had done nothing we could have done under existing law. I did not pause to discuss why we had not, or to criticize those responsible for not doing it, but the fact is that we have not exercised the power which the law has vested in certain officials.

I say that we could extend our coastwise shipping laws, and in so doing we would be doing what other nations have done; what Great Britain, guided by great statesmen, has done; what she is doing to-day, avowedly unafraid and unashamed. I sometimes think we have become so cowardly as to be afraid almost to speak the words "Uncle Sam" and to assert the rights of Uncle Sam on this rolling earth.

As a third thing we could do we could relieve American companies from the payment of duty on repairs made in foreign ports, under conditions and regulations which would aid rather than harm American shipyards. We could do that. I do not carry in my mind the exact figures, but I think we have paid duty on repairs made in foreign ports during the last year to the extent of over $200,000. Whether we shall relieve entirely the payment of duty on repairs made in foreign ports, without imposing certain conditions, is at least debatable; but I am sure the law could be so adjusted as not to affect the revenues, as not to injure home shipyards, but so as to give relief to the shipowner, the navigator of the ship, who bought the material and made his repairs in foreign ports.

There is another way by which we could aid American ship companies owning American ships. There is possible a reduction in the income and other taxes on shipping property. We have exempted from the payment of revenue practically all the American people. There was by the last revenue law an exemption of an additional two and a half million people, so that to-day practically all the American people are exempted from the payment of any income tax. If we set about it, we could assist the shipping industry by relieving from taxation the incomes of companies derived from that industry.

We could aid them, of course, by making loans to American companies to build and maintain ships on such terms as would be highly helpful to them, and not hurtful to the Government, without the loss of a dollar in principal or in interest. That proposition has been explained here again and again, Mr. President, and I will not pause to enlarge upon it.

How else could we aid American shipping? We could give preferential tariff rates on imports brought in American ships. Turn back to the first tariff act, Mr. President, signed by George Washington on July 4, 1789, the second measure that ever passed the Congress, and it will be seen that that wise man, and the 26 wise Senators who were here then (we are 96 in number now but perhaps not as wise) encouraged and aided the American marine by giving preference to goods that were brought hither in American ships. Thus, the act of July 4, 1789, provided:

> On all teas imported from China or India, in ships built in the United States and belonging to a citizen or citizens thereof, or in ships or vessels built in foreign countries, and on the 16th day of May last wholly the property of a citizen or citizens of the United States, and so continuing until the time of importation, as follows:
> On bohea tea, per pound, 6 cents.
>
> On all souchong, or other black teas, per pound, 10 cents.
>
> On all hyson teas, per pound, 20 cents.
> On all other green teas, per pounds, 12 cents.
> On all teas imported from Europe in ships or vessels built in the United States and belonging wholly to a citizen or citizens thereof, or in ships or vessels built in foreign countries, and on the 16th day of May last wholly the property of a citizen or citizens of the United States, and so continuing until the time of importation, as follows:
> On all bohea tea, per pound, 8 cents.
>
> On all souchong, and other black teas, per pound, 13 cents.
>
> On all hyson teas, per pound, 26 cents.
> On all other green teas, per pound, 16 cents.
>
> On all teas imported, in any other manner than as above mentioned, as follows:
>
> On bohea tea, per pound, 15 cents.
> On all souchong, or other black teas, per pound, 22 cents.
>
> On all hyson teas, per pound, 45 cents.
> On all other green teas, per pound, 27 cents.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I think the Senator is aware of the fact that we had a provision in the act of 1920 requesting the abrogation of the treaties which prevented us from passing such legislation, but three Presidents, irrespective of party, failed to put that provision of the law into effect.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am fully aware that the act of 1920 authorized the putting into effect of the provision that merchandise coming to America in American ships might be admitted at a different and a lower rate than when brought in foreign ships. I also know that it was considered that in order to enforce that provision it would be necessary to bring about the modification of certain existing treaties.

I am also aware of the fact that no one administration during this period has forced the issue, if I may use that expression. But I remarked before that I am standing here to-day, thinking of to-day and of to-morrow, and I am not ready to concede as a matter of law that it is necessary to modify any existing treaty in order for us to enforce that provision of the law. I do not wish to be thought dogmatic about it, but I am strongly of the belief that we have a perfect right and unrestrained power to provide as indicated, and that if we did so provide we would not be violating any existing treaty.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if the Senator will examine into that a little further, he will find that the Supreme Court has held that we must denounce those treaties before any act of Congress can be effective.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Then I would denounce the treaties. But I wish to observe to Senators that the Constitution provides that the Constitution, and the laws and treaties made in pursuance thereof, is the supreme law of the land. If a treaty is negotiated and ratified which is contrary to existing law, it modifies that law, it amends that law, or supersedes that law. Also if an act of Congress is passed in direct violation of a treaty it is nevertheless the supreme law of the land; the law in effect denounces the treaty. I am not saying that that should be done. I am not saying that it is always wise to do so. I would not wantonly offend another nation. But we did that precise thing with the Chinese nation.

There was a treaty with China, and yet the Congress passed an act which completely wiped out that treaty in so far as immigration was concerned, and it did not require the Supreme Court of the United States to tell some of us that the last act of Congress was the supreme law of the land, even though it was in violation of an existing treaty.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I call the Senator's attention to a recent incident which supports the views which he is now expressing. The so-called "gentleman's agreement" which was entered into by President Roosevelt and Japan many years ago, received the sanction of Congress later on, and possessed the validity of a treaty. When the recent immigration law was before the Senate the President of the United States, through the Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, challenged the attention of Congress to the fact that we were brushing aside what they conceived to be a treaty, by a legislative declaration, and asked that Congress refrain from enacting a law abrogating the gentleman's agreement treaty, at least until the State Department had an opportunity to take up the matter diplomatically with Japan with a view to having it abrogated.

On the other side of the Chamber there was great perturbation, and able Senators insisted that the treaty be abrogated by legislative declaration. This was done, but I stood by the Republican President and the Republican Secretary of State.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. But the "gentleman's agreement," so called, was not a treaty. No President has the right to make a treaty.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator that the President can only negotiate a treaty, he can not make a binding instrument or constitute it "the supreme law of the land." It is believed that President Roosevelt exceeded his authority when he entered into the gentleman's agreement and acted under it as though it were a valid treaty, but by lapse of time, by congressional ratification at least upon two occasions, the Senate ratified and validated it, and when Congress set it aside over the protest of the Secretary of State some persons thought that it was an unwise and impolite act, at least a discourteous act. I believe the Senator from California should have supported the Republican President and Republican Secretary of State.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. May I reply briefly in regard to the legislation referred to, that I contended that President Roosevelt never had any power to enter into the so-called gentleman's agreement——

Mr. KING. I have conceded that when he treated it as a treaty he exceeded his authority.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That it was not a treaty; and even if it were a treaty I would have argued, had the point been raised, that we could proceed to legislate in violation of it.

Mr. KING. Absolutely. I was supporting the Senator then. A treaty can be abrogated by act of Congress and the Supreme Court, in my opinion, will not hold a contrary view.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That is true. Therefore I come back to the point that if there are existing treaties said to stand in the way of the Congress enforcing that provision in the act referred to, namely, enforcing that provision which will admit goods at a different rate when carried in American bottoms—I do not concede that there is such a treaty standing in our way—we should, in the interest of United States shipping, enforce existing law. We would not violate the Constitution, but we would be acting for the benefit of America.

There are other provisions of existing law designed to aid American shipping which have not been put into force. I sometimes wonder whether certain members of the Shipping Board have ever read the act of 1920.

See what other nations do to aid their merchant marine. See what Australia is doing in the imposing of their customs duties, giving a preference in effect to goods which are carried in British bottoms. Why not legislate for America? When will the time come for America to exercise some of her rights to build up and maintain her merchant marine? The time is now. Government ownership and management of American shipping is a failure. Why continue? Why make private, citizen-owned American shipping impossible? Why forever be dependent on foreign nations for our ocean traffic?

Mr. President, I beg pardon for having taken so much time of the Senate. The people are weary of carrying the burdens of an admitted failure. I repeat, sir, the people are weary of carrying the burden of an admitted failure. The people are disgusted with the handling of the Government's business in the matter of our ships. The people are not in favor of Russianizing America. That way madness lies, Mr. President. I use that word Russianizing, and I mean to use it with all its hateful significance. We do not propose to Russianize America. So long as I can utter a word or put forth a feeble blow I propose to stand against Russianizing America, in exalting the state above the man, in making the state the master and the man the slave.

The people know that American capital and American labor can build and sail American ships if the Government will exercise a little sense and give to the shipping industry the aid it can give without injury to any other American industry. Far from injuring, the building up an American shipping industry would be beneficial to every farm and to every factory in the land.

The people of California are deeply interested in this question. They front the Pacific Ocean. They wish to see that ocean plowed, as I have suggested, and furrowed by the keels of peaceful vessels, pacific ships on the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. Boiled right down, it comes to this: Would the Senator rather see no merchant marine of any consequence under the American flag than to see the Government own and operate it?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. We are not brought to that alternative. Turn the American loose! Let our Government favor him as all foreign nations favor their citizens or subjects.

Mr. FLETCHER. Private enterprise has not been doing it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. For reasons which I have here fully suggested.

Mr. FLETCHER. Is it the Senator's idea that the cost of building ships in American yards exceeds the cost of building them in foreign yards?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It does; and that is a handicap. I admit it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Does the Senator know that an American can build a ship in any yard in the world and have that ship admitted to American registry to engage in foreign trade?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Be it so.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will ask the Senator if he thinks that is not possible now? In other words, the point that it costs us so much more to build a ship in America than in a foreign yard does not apply to the argument here now because the Senator knows, I presume, and will not contend to the contrary, that an American citizen can build a ship in a foreign yard and have it admitted to registry here to engage in foreign trade.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption at that point?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. May I reply in the Senator's time to the Senator from Florida? Within a year after the passage of that act more than 135 ships were purchased in foreign countries and placed under American registry. Within a short time thereafter some 20 or more ships were purchased by Americans and put under the American flag. More would have been purchased and more would be purchased now were it not for the suspended sword of Damocles consisting of the shipping act, which is a menace to privately owned and operated ships, to operate in foreign trade. It constitutes a threat of competition by the Government and deters individuals from building or buying or operating ships in ocean trade. If the Government will get out of the shipping business, we will have a merchant marine; we will beat the world in the operation of ships as we have beaten the world in railroad development. We have been more efficient in the construction and operation of railroads, notwithstanding the supposed handicap of higher wages, and we can beat the world in the building and operation of ships if the Government will get out of the way and give American genius and American initiative a free field and equal opportunity.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Splendidly uttered and true.

Mr. FLETCHER. I just want to call attention to this matter: We have been for seven or eight years trying to persuade American citizens and American corporations that they can build and own and operate ships, and can do a profitable business on the high seas. I do not believe that it is necessary to subsidize anybody to do that business. But they have not been willing to do it. Why they have not is another question. They have not done it. I know that American shipping under private ownership and operation is less willing to-day than it was in 1914, in spite of our having sold 1,140 ships owned by the Government.

What I have said about the right of American citizens to build ships in Belfast or anywhere else, and have them admitted to American registry in foreign trade disposes of any handicap so far as difference in cost in building in American yards and in other yards may be concerned.

In that connection I call attention to the fact that we are taking care of American shipyards in the pending bill. That is the only place where they are taken care of. We are providing in the bill that all vessels built for the board shall be built in the United States. That provision is in the bill, and it is a very important provision. Where are the shipyards going to get business? They can get it only under this bill. They are not going to get it anywhere else.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. So long as the Government was in the business, with the threat of taking over all the business, what wonder that American citizens' private capital has not engaged in the last seven or eight years in the industry? No American citizen or corporation, however powerful, from whatever State he or it comes, can compete with the great National Government of America. That is a sufficient answer, I think, to the Senator's query as to why American capital has not built ships during the last six or seven or eight years, or since the Great War.

But I must make an end. The mature and the enlightened judgment of California authorizes me to say, and I do say, that this measure is a poorly concealed attempt to commit the United States to Federal Government ownership and control of the shipping industry. I am authorized to say, and I do say, that this measure, which is an admission of failure of Government to successfully operate ships, should be defeated. Pass it if you will, pass it as you may, and it will go to the House. I trust it will die there. But if not, I am thankful that Calvin Coolidge is in the White House!

Mr. TYSON obtained the floor.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me?

Mr. TYSON. I yield.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I had intended to address the Senate in opposition to the pending bill. There are, however, so many features of it that are obnoxious to me, including the question of its constitutionality, that it would require more than the limited time before we are compelled to vote upon the measure for me adequately to express myself relative to it. I may, however, claim the attention of the Senate at a later time to discuss the bill.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, it is unnecessary to go into details with regard to the necessity and value of an American merchant marine, as that matter has already been so fully covered.

Every patriotic citizen in America who understands the situation is in favor of an adequate merchant marine. The report of the Shipping Board for June 30, 1927, states:

On July 3, 1926, the Senate passed a resolution (S. Res. 262), as follows:

"Resolved, That the United States Shipping Board be, and it is hereby, requested to prepare and submit to the Senate not later than January 1, 1927, comprehensive and concrete plans for building up and maintaining an adequate merchant marine for commerce and national security (1) through private capital and under private ownership, and (2) through construction, operation, and ownership by the Government.

"In response to this resolution, the Shipping Board, on January 11, 1927, submitted a report embodying certain plans for building up and maintaining an adequate merchant marine for commerce and national security. The board's report was made after hearings had been held in 33 cities in various sections of the United States. As a result of these hearings, supplemented by responses to 9,000 inquiries addressed by the board to representatives, organizations, and individuals throughout the country, sentiment of the general public was found to be as follows: (1) It was unanimously held that the United States should have an adequate merchant marine for national defense and for commerce. (2) With almost equal unanimity it was held that this merchant marine should be privately owned. (3) With equal unanimity it was held that until it is made possible for private interests to successfully own and operate the American merchant marine the Federal Government must continue to do so."

All Americans being united upon the proposition that an American merchant marine is absolutely necessary for the prosperity and future success and growth of our trade and of our country, it now rests upon us to determine the best methods to be pursued in securing an adequate American merchant marine to be permanently operated in the interest of the American people, whether publicly or privately owned, but with the idea that until an adequate merchant marine can be successfully owned and maintained by private parties we must continue whatever Government ownership and operation may be necessary to attain this end.

I shall address myself largely to what I consider to be the best practical plan to accomplish this result at this time.

It is the concensus of opinion that we should have a merchant marine that will be sufficient to transport at least 50 to 60 per cent of our exports and imports.

In the year 1830 we were carrying 89.9 per cent of our American exports and imports in American ships. This percentage gradually fell from that time down to the year 1910, when we were carrying only 8.7 per cent of our exports and imports in our own ships. In other words, we were carrying only one-sixth of our commerce that we should have been carrying. Up to 1916 all our merchant ships were owned and operated by private parties.

Then the World War came on, and through our building of ships for that great struggle we found ourselves at the close of the war carrying in the year 1920 42.7 per cent of our foreign commerce under Government operation, or five times as much as we were carrying under private ownership in 1910. In 1926 that percentage had decreased to 32.2 per cent.

The war gave us this great opportunity, and but for the necessity of building this vast number of ships for the war, it is more than probable that by 1920 our foreign shipping would have been practically wiped off the seas under private operation.

After the close of the war Congress, to its great credit, undertook to take advantage of the situation and passed an act which is destined to have a great influence on our country. I refer to what is known as the shipping act of 1920.

That act, in short, declared that it is necessary that the United States have a merchant marine of the best equipped and most suitable types of vessels sufficient to carry the greater portion of its commerce and serve as a naval or military auxiliary in time of war, ultimately to be owned and operated privately by citizens of the United States; that the policy of the United States is to do whatever may be necessary to develop and encourage the maintenance of such a merchant marine; that this purpose is the primary end to be attained; that in order to accomplish the declared purposes of this act and to carry out the policy declared, the board is authorized and directed to sell as soon as practicable, consistent with good business methods and the objects and purposes to be attained by this act, all of the vessels referred to in section 4 of this act or otherwise acquired by the board.

The Shipping Board had turned over to it by the United States the greatest fleet of merchant ships that ever has been under one management in the history of the world, a grand total of 2,536 vessels of all types, aggregating 14,706,217 deadweight tons.

The handling and disposition of this enormous fleet has proved a complicated problem, for while Congress has authorized the sale of these ships as soon as practicable, consistent with good business methods, at the same time it has directed that these ships shall be used at the discretion of the board in the establishment of strategic trade routes, these in turn to be disposed of ultimately to American citizens.

We have heard much criticism of the Shipping Board and, while I hold no brief for the Shipping Board, it is only fair to say that this board has established many trade routes, so that steamships flying the American flag are again seen in the principal ports of the world for the first time in 75 years; and the last annual report of the Shipping Board states that not a single one of them is in competition with privately owned American-flag vessels.

A country's greatness is really largely measured by her foreign commerce and a still further measure of her greatness is how much of that foreign commerce is carried in ships owned by the Nation itself.

From the very earliest time down to this good hour the greatest nations of the world have ever been those which had the greatest shipping. The Phœnicians, the Egyptians, the Carthaginians, the Romans, the Venetians, the Dutch, the Germans, the Swedes, the Norwegians, the British, the Spanish, the Portuguese may be cited in illustration of this fact. Many of these nations were and are comparatively small nations so far as the land areas are concerned, but the measure of their greatness has largely been their capacity to fly their flag upon the seas.

Our destiny is both on the land and on the sea. Our flag must float in every port of the earth and our commerce must be coextensive with the world. In the past our shipping has languished. We are not ship minded. We have not properly fostered and encouraged our shipping. We certainly have not done as much for it as have other nations, and we have found our shipping at times almost wiped off the seas.

By reason of the great fleet which we built during the World War, we have now the opportunity to maintain ourselves upon the seas and to extend our commerce and carry it in our own ships as we can never hope to do again if we fail to take advantage of the present opportunity.

It resolves itself into a question as to whether we shall hurriedly sell or give away to private interests the vast fleet which we now have, and take the chances that such private interests will be able to succeed in maintaining an adequate merchant marine not only for the present but for the future, or whether the Government shall take no chances but shall continue to operate a large part of our merchant ships until we have been able to build up trade routes that can be permanently and certainly maintained and then sell to private interests.

If we take example by the past, we certainly will not put too much confidence in private ownership of our shipping.

As I have said, from 1830, when we carried 90 per cent of our commerce in our own ships, privately owned, down to 1910, a period of 80 years, our shipping decreased at an average of 1 per cent a year, and, under the conditions which our ships must meet to-day, I have about lost hope that we can ever expect that private interests alone without adequate aid can carry and extend our commerce adequately upon the seas.

We are now in a position where we must make no mistake. If we trust our future in this respect to private interests alone, under the conditions as we now know them to exist, we are taking a very great risk, and at the end of from 10 to 20 years we may have no merchant fleet. While private interests may be able to accomplish the task of developing an American merchant marine, I doubt if it is possible owing to the unequal conditions they must meet.

I have studied this question carefully, and, while I am opposed on general principles to Government ownership and operation of almost anything, and would do anything in reason to prevent it, at the same time there are some functions that can be performed successfully at times only by the Government, and much as I may regret the necessity, at the same time, I feel that when the necessity arises to do a thing which is paramount to the security and future of our Nation, we should not hesitate to do it by any lawful means which are necessary to accomplish the desired result.

While the act of 1920 provides for private ownership ultimately, I have come to the conclusion that Government operation of our merchant ships is for the present—and perhaps for a considerable time to come; possibly for at least 10 years—the only sure mean of having and maintaining an adequate merchant marine. My reasons for this are the example of the past under private ownership, and the further fact that, while I believe American citizens to be as fine business men as are to be found in the world, at the same time, they can not accomplish the impossible.

Mr. President, we have two classes of shipping—coastwise shipping and foreign shipping. To show that our people are successful in the shipping business, whenever they have fair competition and can meet on equal terms, it is only necessary to point to the uniform success of our coastwise shipping under private ownership for 100 years and to point to the almost complete failure of our foreign shipping during the same period under private ownership. While coastwise shipping has been absolutely adequate and increasing to meet every demand, our foreign shipping has gone from bad to worse, until in 1910 it was practically wiped off the seas. No one will claim that shipping conditions are better to-day than in 1910.

Government ownership is criticized by a large number of people in this country, and properly so in most instances, but there are exceptions to all rules.

We have Government operation of the Post Office Department, and, while this might be more economical and more efficient under private operation, at the same time no one would consider placing the Post Office Department under private operation.

The Panama Canal would never have been built by private parties; it is under public operation, and it is as successful, perhaps, as it could be made under any sort of operation.

When the Cape Cod Canal was found to be utterly and hopelessly bankrupt and inefficient under private ownership, it was finally bought by the Government and placed under public operation, at the urgent insistence of those in this Congress who are now against the pending bill.

Whenever our Nation has found that there was a necessity for doing a thing, and no private persons could be found to do it successfully and continuously, the Nation has done it itself. It was necessary, as will be remembered, to build a railroad from Omaha to join the East with the Pacific coast. While this great railroad was not built actually by the Government, it was fostered and aided by the Government so as to make it possible.

When the State of Georgia found it necessary to build a railroad from its capital city, to join up with other sections of the country, it built and operated a railroad from Atlanta to Chattanooga. The State of North Carolina has built and operated its own railroads when the State found it could be done in no other way.

The junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] on Friday last cited the case of public operation of the Boston Elevated Railroad. Many other instances might be cited.

The State of New York built the Erie Canal. The State of Maryland and other States have built canals in the past.

In fact, as I have said before, whenever the State or Nation has found that there is a necessity for a thing or a service, and no other instrumentality could be found to supply this necessity, the State or the Government itself has done the thing which no one else could do.

Owing to the conditions under which we are living, the high-tariff wall which surrounds this country, the high standard of living which obtains in our country, the beneficent laws which have been passed in the interests of our sailors on the seas, and many other conditions, it is utterly and wholly impossible to operate an American ship as economically as a foreign ship can be operated.

It is admitted that it costs about 50 per cent more to build an American ship than it does to build a foreign ship. The interest on the investment, the insurance, the high cost of repairs, the high cost of replacement, and everything else that goes into the purchasing and operating of a ship, is so much higher in this country that it is utterly impossible for our ships to be operated as economically as foreign ships. Therefore we must either have higher rates for our freight or a very much greater business in order to overcome this inequality, or adequate Government aid.

Higher rates can not be had for our shipping, and even a fair share of business is difficult to secure. Our ships have to go out into the world and compete with the world markets, and they have to operate under the conditions of a highly protected market; and I say to you, Mr. President, that in my opinion to continue to compete without loss under such unequal conditions is most difficult if not impossible.

If all our ships were turned over to-day to private interests without charging a single dollar of purchase money and without direct and substantial aid from the Government of the United States, in my opinion, due to this inequality, our merchant marine would be wiped off the seas, and we would in a few years have no merchant marine worthy of the name engaged in foreign trade.

The only way that an adequate merchant marine can be maintained by private interests is by paying the difference between what it costs to own and operate a ship in this country and under our conditions and that obtaining in foreign countries, so that if we turn our merchant marine over to private interests we must provide a subsidy or subvention or some other means of making up this difference in the cost of ownership and operation.

The American people apparently are against subsidies and subventions, as has been so forcibly pointed out to you by the distinguished senior Senator from Washington, who is in charge of this bill. Although he is strong for a subsidy, he thinks there is no chance for one by this Congress; and as he wants an adequate merchant marine, he realizes that Government operation is the only chance. He has been here much longer than I have, but I agree with him that there is no chance to secure a subsidy from this Congress or to secure greater aid than is now provided by law.

It looks as if we must have Government ownership or nothing, and not only Government ownership now but in order to insure that the policy laid down in the act of 1920—which is to encourage and maintain an adequate merchant marine—Government operation is, I believe, the only method that will ever be successful on all routes now being operated by the Shipping Board as long as conditions obtain in this country as compared to other countries as we find them to-day.

It seems to me that the time has come when we should no longer quibble about this matter, but we should determine what steps to take to provide a service for our country which is as necessary as the Army or the Navy. It seems to me that the time has come for this Congress to stop debating, and to say to the country that we can only insure an adequate merchant marine by part Government operation and ownership at this time and until Congress is willing to give adequate aid.

They say that Government operation is a failure. But if Government operation is a failure, how much more of a failure has been the private operation of our merchant marine—a constant decrease in our shipping from 1830 of 90 per cent to 8⅞ per cent in 1910. Private owners have had the opportunity to buy the Government ships at their own price during the last seven years, and only 10 out of 35 trade routes have been bought.

The American business man is keen to make money. If he can successfully operate these ships, why does he not come forward and buy them? He never will buy them unless the United States practically insures him against loss; and the Congress does not appear willing to do that, and may never do so. In the meantime, the Government must operate these ships.

I confess that I believe it is going to cost this country a great deal of money. I doubt if we can ever operate a merchant marine in such a way as to make it profitable, or even in such a way that we will get enough out of its operation to pay expenses, replacements, and new construction. I do not believe that can be done by the Government, but I think it can be done much surer by the Government than in any other way at this time.

To-day we have the greatest foreign shipping service by our own ships that we have ever enjoyed. From every port of importance in this country—North, South, East, and West, on the Atlantic, on the Gulf, and on the Pacific—we have a fairly adequate service extending to every important port in the world, something which has never occurred before in our history.

Heretofore our ports on the North Atlantic have been built up at the expense of every port on the South Atlantic coast and on the Gulf; but now, for the first time, the southern ports and the Gulf ports have the same just, fair consideration as has been given to the ports of the North and East. We have to-day a national merchant marine not a sectional one.

The ports of Wilmington, Charleston, Savannah, Jacksonville, Mobile, New Orleans, and many minor ports are being given consideration, and our commerce is going out to the world as never before. We have now a fine connection with all the ports of South America on the east coast and on the west coast. No longer does a man in Argentina or Brazil who wants to buy in America have to go to Europe and then sail to America to buy goods. There was a time, only a few years ago, when we had no direct line from Argentina or Brazil to the United States.

When a Brazilian or Argentinian wanted to buy goods in the United States he had to go to Europe; and even if he thought of coming on to America the probabilities are that he stopped and bought his goods in Europe. Our trade in South America is increasing by leaps and bounds. It is the field for America in the future. It is the country which we should cultivate. It is our natural commercial alliance; and if we continue with the merchant marine as we have it now, our trade with South America will continue to increase. As for the west coast of the United States, it has also an adequate service at this time.

Mr. President, it has been said that the American merchant marine under the direction of the Shipping Board has lost an enormous amount of money—some $233,000,000—in the last seven years. That may be true; but, although there may have been waste and extravagance and bad judgment, it has been worth, perhaps, every dollar that it has cost.

But, Mr. President, there is now a much more efficient service. It takes time—sometimes a very long time—to build a business; and if the Shipping Board continues in the business I have no doubt the efficiency of the service will be better and better, and ultimately it may be able to run with comparatively little loss.

The losses have been decreased from $50,000,000 a year a few years ago to $12,000,000 the last year.

The Shipping Board took over all the ships and established 35 different trade routes from our ports to different ports of the world; and, acting under the directions laid down by the law of 1920, they have sold in seven years only 10 of these routes. Of course, they naturally sold the best routes, because they were the ones purchasers would naturally want to buy, and now we have some 25 routes left. Now, what can we do with these ships?

The President of the United States wants to sell them. His whole attitude has been to urge the Shipping Board to sell them. Every man interested in private shipping has wanted the Shipping Board to sell them. Pressure has been brought to bear on the board in every way to make it sell them.

Sections of the press of the country have been harassing them to get out of the shipping business. They have not been free agents. No one connected at any time with the American Shipping Board, no employee of the Shipping Board anywhere in the world, has had any idea of any permanency in his position. He has not been able to give that efficient service which he could have given if he had felt he had a long-time employment.

Everybody has looked upon Government operation as temporary. The Shipping Board has not been able to make long-time contracts. It has not been able to build up business with the certainty that it was going to stay in business. What would you think of a man in business who continually said he wanted to sell out and get out of business, who was not carrying the best stock of goods, who was constantly selling out the best things he had at any price he could get for them? Would you think he would ever be able to increase his trade or to get efficient service from those in his employ? Would he be able to build up any permanent business?

Suppose a man had property of any kind—dilapidated, worn-out property—and wanted to sell it. Would it not be the wise thing to put it in order, to repair it, to put it in the best of shape before he attempted to sell it?

Instead of that the Shipping Board has had no encouragement to rehabilitate its ships, has had no encouragement to improve its business, but has been constantly harassed with the cry "Get out of business," and with the order "Sell! Sell! Sell!" It has practically given away the lines that have been sold. Only eight-four millions has been received for ships that must have cost five to six hundred millions, perhaps a billion.

So, Mr. President, I believe that it will be utterly impossible to sell these ships to any private parties who can buy them and maintain the routes which are now established, and to increase the number of routes, unless we provide a great deal of Government aid.

We are up against a problem which, in my judgment, if we are going to carry out the provisions of the act of 1920, leaves us no alternative except to own and operate a merchant marine, certainly for the present, because there is no other instrumentality that will enable us to establish and maintain an adequate merchant marine.

In corroboration of what I have said, I wish to state that on the 10th of January, by the invitation of the Shipping Board, the great shipping interests of this country assembled here in the city of Washington. There was practically every line of steamship sailing under the American flag represented at that conference, and numerous addresses were made by those representatives. I wish to quote a few things that were said on that occasion to show the attitude of the private shipping interests toward the American merchant marine and what they think is necessary in order that we may be able to maintain an adequate merchant marine.

In the first place, they say that it costs 50 per cent more to build a ship in the United States than it does abroad. They further say that the wages paid in this country and the high standards of living enjoyed by the American people make very much higher costs than on foreign ships where there are lower standards of living, where wages are paid that prevail in other countries; and they say that—> these differentials in costs can be met only in one of two ways, (1) through the Government absorbing the difference, or (2) through increased earnings of American ships as compared with foreign ships.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that they state—> that the monthly cost of wages and sustenance on an oil-burning 9,000 dead-weight-ton American ship is $4,041, as compared with $2,690.42 on a substantially similar British ship, or $1,450 more; $1,581.99 on an Italian ship, or $2,459 more; $1,425.29 on a French ship, or $2,616 more; $1,371.58 on a Japanese ship, or $2,670 more.

How can our privately owned ships compete against such costs?

I wish, for the information of the Senate, and in order to show the great disparity between wages and costs of operation of an American ship and ships in other countries, to place in the RECORD some tables giving comparative statements of costs of operation of ships in this country and abroad. I ask unanimous consent to have these tables inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Compiled by the American Steamship Owners' Association from statements received from the United States Shipping Board Nov. 14 and 22, 1927.

Mr. TYSON. I wish to call the attention of the Senate in this connection to the fact that on an American ship the shipmaster is paid on an average $290 a month.

On a British ship in the same service he is paid $170 a month.

On an Italian ship he is paid $72.45 a month.

On a French ship he is paid $91.91 a month.

On a Japanese ship he is paid $98 a month—about one-third of what he is paid in America.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. TYSON. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. What solution, then, does the Senator propose? Certainly if the conditions outlined so well by the Senator prevail, somebody must make up the deficit. It has to be paid anyhow. If we do not help the private operators of these ships to maintain them, the country will certainly have to continue to make up the deficit, which amounts this year to $17,000,000, and the bill which will be before us in a short time provides for $13,000,000. There must be a contribution made. Does the Senator contend that it is better to make that contribution by the more or less defective operation of these ships in public hands than to make half that contribution or a quarter of it in a way that would encourage private interests to put these ships on the sea and to maintain them in an effective way, such as we would have ships carrying the American flag to be maintained?

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator that we have to grant Government aid if the ships are operated privately. The point I am making in my address is that the Congress of the United States is not willing, at this time at least, to give a subsidy or a subvention that is necessary in order that these ships may be privately operated, and as we want them operated, we must operate them by the Government itself, whatever the cost may be.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. TYSON. I will have to ask the Senator to defer his question until I get through, because I am near the end of my address. Then, if he will propound his question I shall be glad to answer.

It will be seen from an examination of the tables I have presented that it would appear impossible to overcome the great handicaps under which American shipowners must operate without substantial Government aid.

To give you a further idea of what the private shipowners of this country think about the problem of maintaining themselves, I will quote further from the recommendations of the American Steamship Owners' Association represented at their recent meeting.

They say:

These higher costs have already been offset in some of the so-called essential services sold by the Shipping Board, through reduction in capital costs, and thus in the fixed charges of insurance, depreciation, and interest. But this means of meeting the differentials is only temporary, and will offer no permanent relief in the operation of new ships which will hereafter replace the low-priced ships sold by the Government. To meet these excess costs of operation, aid should be given through mail contracts and appropriations for a naval reserve.

They further say:

If conditions generally are brought about in the shipping business so that the differentials in operating costs can be met, and replacements can be had at costs on a parity with the costs of building in foreign yards, then unquestionably a number, if not substantially all, of the services now being operated by the Shipping Board can be sold and the Government retired from the shipping business.

It will thus be seen, according to the statements made by these shipowners who are now in the shipping business in the United States, that unless the United States shall give substantial aid to meet the difference in cost of operation in this country and in foreign countries, it will be impossible to sell the ships which it now owns, and even then, that it will not be able to sell all of them, but only perhaps those which appear to give the greatest opportunity for profit.

They say in their resolutions passed while here:

That the present situation admits of no misinterpretation. Our overseas merchant fleet is being rendered obsolete by the rapid advance of science and invention which has completely revolutionized our vessel propulsion since our ships were bought.

They say further:

In the absence of a replacement and reconditioning program, early transfer of a substantial part of the remaining ships to private ownership with the assurance of continued operation is unlikely.

It will thus be seen that no matter what we do here, in the opinion of the American Steamship Owners' Association we can only hope to sell to private parties a part of the remaining ships we now have, unless we replace and recondition them. It is an idle dream to expect the United States Government to get out of the shipping business if we are going to have an adequate merchant marine, without passing this Jones bill or a similar bill or furnishing adequate Government aid.

They say further:

In these circumstances but two alternatives present themselves: One is to modernize the fleet, the other is to retire from the seas.

Here are men engaged in the business—private owners of ships—the very men who operate ships, and yet they consider that the only chance of ever selling our ships is to modernize the fleet, and failing that, we must retire from the seas. I do not blame them for refusing to buy ships they must operate at a loss.

There are those here to-day who are saying we should not spend any more money on the merchant marine, speaking in direct contradiction to the men to whom they are expecting to sell our ships and who ought to know most about the conditions obtaining in the shipping world.

Mr. President, it stands to reason that no set of men is going to buy these ships until they are reconditioned and put in order.

They further say that they believe that the Shipping Board has done its best to carry out the merchant marine act of 1920, but they further believe that a crisis has been reached and that the future of the American merchant marine depends on prompt constructive action by Congress.

They further say:

Whatever Congress may do along this line will be unavailing unless it provides a way whereby private American citizens will be able to own and operate modern ships on the ocean in competition with other citizens of maritime nations.

In other words, they are saying that unless we give them sufficient subsidy or aid to take care of an increased operating cost, an increased investment in this country over foreign countries, they will not be able to operate, and I am confident that they are right.

Now, the question is, How large a subsidy will they demand; and if we once put the ships in their hands, what guaranty is there that they will not demand more aid, more subsidy; and then, how would they guarantee an adequate and continuous service for a long time in the future?

They further recommend that the Shipping Board should lay before Congress full information as to the number of new ships which should be constructed in American shipyards to modernize the ships now operated by the board.

On Friday last the question was asked in this Chamber as to whether or not any of the lines sold to private owners were now making money. Of all those who appeared at the meeting called by Chairman O'Connor on the 10th of January, only one stated that he was making money. There may have been others. This man was representing the Export Steamshipping Corporation, sailing to Italy, Greece, Constantinople, Egypt, and North Africa; and to show that the small, slow boats can make money he stated that he had 21 vessels, totaling 109,496 gross tons and 184,172 dead-weight tons, and that the average speed of his vessels was 10½ knots, which is comparable with the majority of other flag tonnage now in existence.

He further stated that, "in his opinion, regularity of service is a greater factor than speed," but he said further, "that if we are to remain upon the seas, vessels of greater tonnage and speed are essential."

That is one of the reasons why the American merchant marine, as it is at present operated, is of such great value to this country, because they have ships going out of nearly all the ports of this country, and they have a regular service, so that when a man wants to ship an article from a particular port he knows he is going to have a ship there to take the article where he wants to send it.

The man to whom I referred also said:

I am not appearing here as opposed to Government operation, provided it is demonstrated that Government operation is necessary.

Here is the gist of the whole matter, however, when he says:

It is my intention to maintain this service of American-flag steamers with or without Government aid or encouragement as long as I am able to bear the financial load, but I am frank to say that no private American citizen can afford to finance out of his own funds an American-flag service in overseas trade without the assistance of the Government; and, failing Government assistance, the American merchant marine will have to be operated directly by the Government or, so far as private owners are concerned, be restricted to the coastwise trade, which is afforded protection comparable with the tariff under which our manufacturers are operating with a degree of unheard-of prosperity.

We thus see that every purchaser of the past and prospective purchasers of the future are demanding, as a condition to the successful operation of ships in foreign trade, greater aid than is now authorized by Congress, and we have been assured by the best of authorities that Congress will refuse to give it.

Mr. President, the United States is already providing aid for our foreign shipping. Section 24 of the shipping act provides that:

The Shipping Board and the Postmaster General, in aid of the development of a merchant marine adequate to provide for the maintenance and expansion of the foreign or coastwise trade of the United States and of a satisfactory postal service in connection therewith, shall from time to time determine the just and reasonable rate of compensation to be paid for such service, and the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to enter into contracts within the limits of appropriations made therefor by Congress to pay for the carrying of such mails in such vessels at such rate.

If our ships are not receiving enough aid it would appear to be partly, if not largely, due to the Shipping Board and the Postmaster General, as by this act they are expressly authorized to pay "just and reasonable compensation for services in aid of an adequate merchant marine."

Mr. President, so far as I am concerned I am willing to vote for all the aid that may be right and proper and necessary to maintain an adequate merchant marine, provided we pay for services rendered, and when those services are measured by a fair, just, and reasonable price and not paid as a lump sum without regard to work performed and service rendered.

It has been charged that requiring unanimous consent to sell ships will keep us from selling any ships. I do not think so. The bill as first amended in the committee provided that no ships should be sold without the consent of Congress, but this was changed by the committee to give authority for the board to sell by unanimous consent for the express purpose of permitting ships to be sold when a favorable offer was received, and not be delayed by having to come to Congress.

The President can change the complexion of the board, if he is not satisfied with it, by removals and appointments to meet his views, as he may have done in other commissions, and the only thing this provision does is to insure as far as possible that no contract for the sale of ships will be accepted unless it is favorable to the Government and insures as far as practicable the maintenance of an adequate merchant marine.

Mr. President, no more important bill for the welfare of our people has or will come before this Congress than the one we are now considering. This bill provides for a great program of reconditioning and reconstruction of our old ships and, when necessary, the building of new ones.

If these ships are conditioned and trade routes established and operated for a number of years and these routes are shown to be capable of being successfully operated, private interests will then know it and be ready to buy them. They do not appear to be ready to buy them now, and these lines must be operated by the Government until that time shall come.

The passage of this bill, or a similar one, offers at this time, as I see it, the only opportunity of establishing and maintaining an adequate merchant marine, ultimately to be privately owned.

This program will probably cost us twenty-five to thirty millions of dollars a year for the next 15 years. At the end of that time we ought to have something to sell that private parties can afford to buy and maintain.

At this time we are preparing to spend from five hundred millions to seven hundred and fifty millions on the control of the floods of the Mississippi River.

When we think of the fact that we are spending some two hundred and seventy-five millions of dollars yearly on the Navy, supposedly largely for the purpose of protecting our commerce, and with a great new program suggested by the Navy to spend some $800,000,000 more on warships in the next 5 or 10 years, does it not seem extraordinary that we should balk at the small amount proposed to maintain a merchant marine for this great Navy to protect?

Mr. President, there are many people who are constantly afraid of war. I do not believe we are going to have any war. I do not believe there is a single Senator in this Chamber who will live long enough to see the United States in another war of importance. I do not believe there is any nation in the world that wants war with us; and if there were, that nation would have too much sense to dare to tackle this great and powerful country.

Although I do not believe there is going to be any war, at the same time I believe we should at all times be prepared for war, and we must maintain an adequate Army and Navy. They both cost much money, but they are national necessities.

Flood control of the Mississippi River is a national necessity. So, too, is an adequate merchant marine a national necessity; and we must be willing to spend the necessary money to maintain such a merchant marine, even if it has to be owned and operated by the Government of the United States until such time as it can be owned and operated permanently and adequately by private interests.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I offer two amendments to the pending bill and ask to have them printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that when the bill is reported to the Senate I shall ask for another vote on the amendment I offered permitting a majority of the board to dispose of ship property.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, to-day I offered a substitute for the amendment I originally offered to the pending bill, which amendment was pending. I now withdraw the substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The substitute is withdrawn.

OUACHITA RIVER BRIDGE, LOUISIANA

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the desk three bridge bills, to which there is no objection, and I ask for immediate action on them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5725) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ouachita River at or near Monroe, La.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BLACK RIVER BRIDGE, LOUISIANA

The bill (H. R. 5726) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Black River at or near Jonesville, La., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BAYOU BARTHOLOMEW BRIDGE, LOUISIANA

The bill (H. R. 5728) granting the consent of Congress to the police jury of Morehouse Parish, La., or the State Highway Commission of Louisiana, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Bayou Bartholomew at or near Point Pleasant, La., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE WOMEN OF AMERICA VERSUS ALCOHOL AND WAR

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an address by Mrs. Edward Thurman Smith, of Missouri, at the first convention of the National Woman's Democratic Enforcement League, at the Mayflower Hotel, in Washington, on January 9, 1928, on the subject "The Women of America versus Alcohol and War."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Madam President and fellow Democrats, I am happy to meet here the Democratic women who are looking backward with horror and forward with assurance and determination. The significance of the National Woman's Democratic Law Enforcement League is that for eight years the Democratic political leaders have not been in touch with the majority of Democratic voters.

A noisy minority element has been instrumental in creating the impression that the Democratic Party is what is designated as the "wet" party.

The majority of the Democratic men and women resent this false position in which the party has been placed. They realize that while wet New York City is governed by a wet Democrat, wet Philadelphia's mayor is a Republican, and that a majority of the so-called wet big cities are governed by Republicans.

These men and women are justly proud of the Democratic Party and its great achievements, and resent with deep anger and humiliation this attempt to drag the party from its high estate.

The law-abiding, Constitution-loving men and women of this country are stirred with resentment which has almost reached the culminating point at the lax enforcement of all laws, but especially the Volstead law.

The women of the Democratic Law Enforcement League are attempting to convince the leaders of the Democratic Party that a wet candidate must not be nominated to be the standard bearer for the party, because the women would repudiate such a leader. The women know that it would mean certain defeat to nominate a wet or a man whose character is open to attack at any point.

The women of this organization realize that Republican politicians are designedly fostering this wet propaganda and are working with the wet Democrats, knowing that organizations representing 12,000,000 women voters are pledged to vote for dry candidates and no others. These women are of all political faiths.

A few days ago Mr. Charles D. Hilles, of the Republican National Committee, was quoted by the press as saying that "the full dinner pail of the Republican administration could beat any wet candidate the Democrats had to offer."

Now, I am perfectly confident of one thing, and it is this: That Mr. Hilles's boasted "full dinner pail" would never be able to overcome the handicap of a wet Republican candidate for the Presidency.

Under the present administration we have not had law enforcement. We have had such open and flagrant nullifiers in office, who were supposed to enforce the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead law, that they have succeeded almost in nullifying all laws and turning this country over to the lawless. But the law-abiding, God-fearing people of all parties know just where and upon whom to fix the guilt, and realize that the ballot is the remedy.

The Democratic Law Enforcement League members are satisfied that the women of these United States will forget every other issue in the next election except the "wet," because there is in the hearts of these women a conviction that the law could be enforced if those in office desired to enforce it. Also that the women are determined to have a candidate who is "dry," and he is not to be accepted by a mere statement for law enforcement, but whose fitness and character must be proven by "precept and example."

The women of this Nation are a political factor not to be disregarded. The women in the main are dry, first, and partisan, second. They scan the personality and character of the candidate, and if he does not measure up to their standard they demand a better candidate in their own party or support the dry man upon the opposite ticket.

We have heard so frequently of late "that the President has no power to defeat the intent of the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead law." Is that true? If so, why do the wets clamor so insistently for the nomination and election of a wet man? Let us see what the President has power to do. The President appoints the members of the United States Supreme Court. Our last President appointed a majority of the present court. The President could, by appointment, should vacancies occur, change the personnel and thereby the viewpoint of the Supreme Court, which has been the foundation rock of prohibition. He appoints the circuit and district judges throughout the United States, and, if a local court acquits a prisoner, law enforcement has no appeal. He appoints the Attorney General and all the district attorneys who prosecute, and the marshals who arrest. The Secret Service men who detect are under his control through the Attorney General.

He names the Secretary of the Treasury, the Prohibition Director, the heads of the Prohibition Department, the customs and the coast guards who detect and raid and seize and interfere to prevent violations of the law and grant or refuse permits to handle alcohol. He appoints the Secretary of State, our envoys, ministers, and consuls to other countries, who negotiate or fail to negotiate agreements for the prevention of liquor smuggling.

Through these appointments prohibition could be entirely nullified. The drys realize how supremely important it is to elect a President who is in full sympathy with the law. The power of appointment will make for enforcement or nonenforcement. A wet President could sound the doom of prohibition by making wet appointments. This is the truth, and should be perfectly understood by every dry voter.

I am pleading for the women in the case of the Women of America vensus Alcohol and War.

To my ctiy of St. Louis there came recently men and women from the Old World and the New to discuss the abolition of war. In this gathering were men and women of world prominence who have dedicated their lives to the outlawry of war, to the securing of the peace of the nations of the world by arbitration.

The sincere, thoughtful deliberations, the fine presentation of the ideals, truths, and plans for peace through education, to the end that all nations may unite to settle disagreements by courts of arbitration, instead of by the old savage method of fighting and killing, prove that the desire implanted in the hearts of men and women to serve God is realized through service to mankind. We recall with tender hearts the statement made by President Wilson at Helena, Mont., September 11, 1919:

"The truth is the regnant and triumphant thing in this world. You may trample it under foot, you may blind its eyes with blood, but you can not kill it, and sooner or later it rises up and seeks and gets its revenge."

And again, with pride, we lift our heads at his ringing words when he addressed the Senate, urging adoption of a woman suffrage resolution September 30, 1918:

"I tell you plainly that this measure which I urge upon you is vital to the winning of the war and to the energies alike of preparation and of battle. And not to the winning of the war only. It is vital to the right solution of the great problems which we must settle, and settle immediately, when the war is over. We shall need them in our vision of affairs, as we have never needed them before, the sympathy and insight and clear moral instinct of the women of the world. The problems of that time will strike to the roots of many things that we have not hitherto questioned, and I, for one, believe that our safety in those questioning days, as well as our comprehension of matters that touch society to the quick, will depend upon the direct and authoritative participation of women in our councils. We shall need their moral sense to preserve what is right and fine and worthy in our system of life, as well as to discover just what it is that ought to be purified and reformed. Without their counselings we shall be only half wise."

He is gone, but we are left to carry on. God help us to use our moral sense to preserve what is right and fine and worthy in our system of life and to look beyond the narrow vision of self in an effort to aid those who are threatened with the curse of war or alcoholism.

These are the issues nearest to the hearts of the women of the world. And the women of America are demanding a courageous leader—one with ideals above a party horizon. Not by docile ballot droppers but by the determined thinking women of the United States is this demand being made.

The party machines mean nothing to these women. North, South, East, and West the women are uniting with the resolution to fight for these two ideals, "No more alcohol; no more war."

Oh, the suffering and anguish endured by women from these two horrors from the beginning of time to the present day, generation after generation of sorrow, tears, bodily and mental torture, until now they are saying, with grim determination, "We will stop this; we will have no more of these two unnecessary evils." These two demons have eaten at the hearts of children, and their prohibition has become a part of the very being of women.

The Constitution of the United States is to the women of this country a sacred instrument of liberty, and its flouting is causing deep humiliation, anger, and resentment. It would be well for our political leaders to remember the women of France, who knitted while the guillotine was working. The great body of intelligent women of this country are resenting the fact that only a half-hearted effort has been made to enforce this law.

When, in 1794, a tax was levied on business to help defray the expenses of the Government, the whisky men refused to pay the tax, formed themselves into companies and resisted with guns the revenue officers who came to collect the taxes. President Washington commanded them to lay down their arms, and when they refused sent an armed force of soldiers to compel their obedience, and the brave whisky men ran away. Thus ended the whisky rebellion.

When the eighteenth amendment was adopted in 1919 there was no thought of a concerted movement to nullify it. It was accepted as the law by the mass of the people, because the great majority had spoken. But there had been drinkers in high places, men of wealth who, in their arrogance, could not conceive that this law was made for them as well as the other poor sots of the streets. Because these men in high places did not obey the law the distillers, brewers, and liquor men, with their political henchmen, began a campaign of propaganda that the law was made to regulate the poor man and deprive him of his personal liberty and his poor man's club, but the rich had all the liquor they wanted. Cunningly devised class-against-class propaganda.

Then the propaganda that was aimed to make us believe every house had a still.

Now, I know hundreds of families, and I do not know one where there is a still in the house or where they make or drink liquor, and I am sure the women of this organization have the same testimony to give.

In a recent article by J. Horace McFarland in Review of Reviews, on "Where is this booze?" he writes of traveling on the east and west coasts of Florida and not seeing either booze or drunkards. In Jacksonville he went purposely to Bay Street, that he had remembered as the nastiest wet place on earth, but he did not see any evidence of the former low saloons or drunken negroes. Nor did he see in Jacksonville a man intoxicated or any evidence of intoxication.

He told of going to St. Petersburg and having a rather extraordinary experience. He wanted to attend the morning services in the Methodist Church and was told that to get a seat he must be there at 9 a. m. He got about the last seat, and at 10.35 the congregation was dismissed because there was another waiting throng, and the service was to be repeated. He learned that this was the regular thing in the other churches; that they were doing double-turn work. He then describes his trip over Florida, that his wet friends had told him was so damp, and says he did not see liquor or an intoxicated person, and that surely there could not be much "kick" in booze which produces no outward sign. He averred that the truth is prohibition laws are being enforced a great deal better than most people believe, and on the average quite as well as are the laws that punish arson, crimes of violence, and the social crimes. That booze and narcotics can be secured by those who seek them, no doubt, just as those who wish to steal, burn, and do other mischievous things in defiance of the law can and will continue to do them. Mr. McFarland closes his story by saying:

"They are outlawed, and John Barleycorn is outlawed, and that is the one biggest thing that has happened in the United States since Columbus landed."

Now, I say "amen" to all that Mr. McFarland has written. I can speak from experience as an automobile tourist. I have traveled through every State in the Union, with the exception of one—Louisiana—and I have seen but two drunken men, one while waiting for the ferry at Wilmington, Del., to cross Delaware Bay to Penns Grove, N. J., and one who was driving a car and imperiled the lives of those in my car, as well as his own, by his recklessness on the mountain road as we were leaving Deadwood, S. Dak., for Yellowstone Park. I shall never forget that madman. But I wonder how many times our lives would have been in danger if we had open saloons on every corner in the towns and at the crossroads. No; I will vote to continue the filling stations for autos on the highways but not the liquor filling stations for men.

Now, another great sob propaganda was started by the personal-liberty preservers, "Prohibition is ruining young people." This is not true. The young people of to-day are doing the same as when I was young. We had the irresponsible and the responsible. The responsible young people went to church and Sunday school and day school, as they are now doing. Now more young girls are preparing for a business career, which, I think, is a wise thing for any girl. But girls and boys are interested in the Y. W. or the Y. M., or the Boy Scout or Campfire Girl activities, football, basket ball, swimming, tennis—all fine, healthful recreations to give them strength of body and clean minds to meet the vicissitudes of life.

But for a while this wet propaganda was so persistent that wherever one went in any part of the States it would be told that the young girls were being ruined by this poisonous liquor and that they were all carrying it in flasks. Pshaw! I do not believe the mothers of this country have all gone crazy. I am sure they have brought up their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, and we know that the youth so nurtured will not fail us. Each generation has its own problems, and my faith in the mothers of to-day is so strong that I do not worry about them but with them in their fear that the wets may bring back the reeking, foul-smelling saloon with its swinging door, loud laughter, and canned music to induce the youth of our land to enter into a place that would debauch them. A place where the robbers, thieves, pickpockets, election stealers, etc., met and hatched their plans. A place where the police went immediately to look for criminals, and found them. And yet in these places campaigns were planned and elections were decided.

President Nicholas Murray Butler, of Columbia University, asserts "that nothing is easier than to repeal the eighteenth amendment, and that the more the moral issues are pressed the weaker the case for prohibition becomes."

Dr. David Starr Jordan, former president of Stanford University, in an article in the Christian Science Monitor, headed "Prohibition, a defense of personal liberty," boldly challenges the assertion that the suppression of the liquor trade is "an attack on personal liberty."

"It is a defense of personal liberty against those oppressing the freedom of the rest of us. The saloon makes its neighborhood unfit for rearing boys. Under former conditions every saloon, every drunkard, and every man driving an automobile with liquor on his breath was a menace to his neighbors.

"The very fact that liquor victims and liquor apologists are now so active and in some quarters so plausible shows how deeply the destructive canker has eaten into America's national system."

Doctor Jordan's comments as a scientist on the evils of alcohol are of special interest.

"It may be remembered that the evil of liquor is not centered in drunkenness, for that is mainly nature's effort to throw off poison. When nature has been imposed on too long, becoming hardened to it, she ceases to revolt. It is absurd to refer to the saturated population of southern and eastern Europe as 'temperate.'"

The ravages of the "murderer" in the form of drink in France have been most effectively shown by the greatest of realists—Zola. From the standpoint of mental health saturation is worse than sprees. According to the statistics of Jean Bloch, France, in the last century, led the world in fatalities from alcoholism, of which mere drunkenness is a preliminary phase.

As to the purity of drugs, analysis has shown that few poisons (wood alcohol excepted) in liquor are more dangerous than ethyl alcohol itself, which is the chief constituent of all wines, beer, whisky, brandy, and other liquors. But it is certain that the American people would not for a moment consent that their National Government should go into the saloon business, for liquor is liquor everywhere, and everywhere it is disastrous to human well-being.

Alcohol, like opium, is a mind-destroying drug.

"If alcohol," says Doctor Cushny, of Edinburgh, greatest of pharmacologists, "were a newly discovered drug from some German laboratory, its sale would be everywhere prevented, even as cocaine, a much more useful and less dangerous drug, is now excluded from general use."

Doctor Jordan is squarely opposed to the views expressed by President Butler as to the possibility of repealing the eighteenth amendment. He declares that under no circumstances which he can imagine will it be repealed. The main purpose—that of breaking up the liquor traffic in America—will in time be achieved.

When a ruinous traffic becomes nation-wide only the Nation can deal with it. The remedy, if remedy exists, must be found in prohibition. And to be effective this must be national, for individual States can not fortify their boundaries. The old idea of State rights is giving place to that of "State duties." A duty which no individual State is capable of performing alone must be passed up to the United States, and State nullification of national statutes has not met the approval of history.

Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, president of the Federal Council of Churches, asks for a longer trial for prohibition. He declares that no sooner was prohibition established than its enemies began to encompass its destruction.

"After enduring drink for many centuries, nearly always with ignominious results, can we not endure prohibition even for a decade? I ask for a rigid enforcement of the law, and that by an equitable and rational public opinion, which will not be diverted from this magnificent experiment till it has had a fair opportunity. Give sobriety at least an equal chance with drunkenness."

The women have been waiting for the wets to attack the nineteenth amendment, and it has started. In a speech reported in the daily press the other day one of these little fellows said:

"The eighteenth amendment was unsound and the nineteenth amendment, the result of a few noisy women seeking notoriety, and both the amendments were hasty and ill-considered."

Now, we admit that women were deprived of their right, I shall not attempt to say how many years longer, but perhaps a hundred years, after this gentleman's forebears were permitted by their lords and masters to have a voice in their government. But I think he is not a good sportsman when he decries the fact of our citizenship—something we desired and prized enough to struggle years to gain—when he just happened to be born free. Also, we are not attacking the Constitution of our country, nor are we attempting to bring it into disrepute by deriding and belittling it.

The Supreme Court of the United States has decided as to the soundness of the eighteenth amendment, and I do not believe it will reverse itself because of this gentleman's attack.

O God, father of the whole world, help the men and women who are unintentionally aiding the wets in their propaganda of "being deprived of their personal liberty" to realize that alcoholism is a disease that has brought more misery to the world than any other, because it fastens itself onto the body, mind, and soul of men; because it makes beasts of men, both the educated and ignorant, sapping their brains, their will power, their judgment, their efficiency, and deprives their little children of their sight and hearing and causes them to be born cripples and imbeciles.

Help them to see the hands of the mothers and children stretched out in pleading to be saved from this terrible curse. Enable them to hear the sobbing, crying, terror-stricken little children, beaten and starved, deprived of the birthright to play and be happy, to be properly clothed and fed and to be given an education to prepare for citizenship.

Help them to hear the cry that is going up from these mothers and children all over the world for America to help them—America, the rich, the golden, the free, the happy Nation; America that saved the world in war; America, the Christian Nation, that has outlawed this curse of alcoholism and saved its own children. America, we cry to thee; we beg thee to save us from this monster that for money—the love of money—reaches out all over the world with the tentacles of an octopus and crushes the brains, the hearts, the souls of men, women, and little children.

O America, my country, God help us to hear and answer these prayers.

RECESS

Mr. JONES. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thought we were to vote at 5 o'clock.

Mr. JONES. No; it was agreed that the five-minute limitation on speeches should go into effect at 5 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Washington.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 5 o'clock p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 31, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, January 30, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, mighty to save and bless, subdue our wills and yet sustain our resolution. True love comes to its finest expression in self-sacrifice. So help us that our wisest learning, our best possessions, our brightest hours, and our largest abilities may be given to humanity. Fortify our wills that we may work bravely, earnestly, and wisely; we shall thus find life sweeter and service richer. The safety of our country lies in the virtues that spring from trust in God. Do Thou give balance to understanding, compensation for loss, and restraint for temper. When the day is done may cares roll away and Thine arms enfold us, which is the essence of the life divine. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, January 26, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1968) entitled, "An act to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to pay for the use and occupancy by the Department of Agriculture of the Bieber Building, 1358 B Street SW., Washington, D. C., and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 81. Joint resolution for the amendment of the act of March 3, 1927, by authorizing an annual appropriation to carry out the cooperative experiments contemplated by the act.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 131) entitled "Joint resolution providing for a commission to investigate and report upon the facts connected with the sinking of the submarine S-4, and upon methods and appliances for the protection of submarines," in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the President pro tempore had appointed Mr. HALE and Mr. SWANSON members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Navy Department.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it shall be in order to consider under the rules of the House the bill (H. R. 9285) to provide for the settlement of claims against the United States on account of property damage, personal injury, or death. It is a bill from the Committee on Claims, and it is known as the general claims bill. It was considered and passed by the House in the last Congress in substantially the same form as it now appears.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is that bill on the Union Calendar?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; it is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want to inquire of the majority leader what he proposes to do about the message which has just come over from the Senate in regard to the S–4 investigation?

Mr. TILSON. In view of the fact that the chairman of the House committee that reported the resolution in the House is not present, no disposition will be made of it at this time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this claims bill is a most important bill, in that it confers upon every department of this Government the exclusive right to pass upon and determine claims up to the amount of $5,000, and confers exclusive jurisdiction upon the Compensation Commission in claims up to $7,500. It is a shifting of responsibilities of the Members of Congress to various bureaus of the Government. Is the gentleman from Connecticut asking that this bill be considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union or in the House?

Mr. TILSON. In the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union under the general rules of the House. It will be wide open for amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Is this an administration measure that the floor leader is asking to be taken up out of order?

Mr. TILSON. No; a legislative act pure and simple.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the floor leader favorable to it?

Mr. TILSON. I am.

Mr. BLANTON. Then it is an administration measure.

Mr. TILSON. No; not necessarily so.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall not object to taking it up and shall not object to the gentleman's request, but I am going to ask for a quorum to consider it. There is not a large membership here now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I now ask unanimous consent that the general debate be confined to the bill, and that it shall not exceed three hours.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the general debate be confined to the bill, and that it shall not exceed three hours. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. The time to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] and the ranking minority member of the Committee on Claims [Mr. Box].

Mr. TILSON. Yes; I add this to my request.

The SPEAKER. The time to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusettts [Mr. UNDERHILL] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that three bills, H. R. 9146, H. R. 9760, and H. R. 9779, be rereferred from the Committee on Naval Affairs to the Committee on Pensions, which has to do with general pension legislation. I have spoken to the acting chairman of the committee, and there is no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bills by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9146) to amend the act of March 3, 1915, by extending to the widows or dependents of naval and Marine Corps officers and enlisted men who die and to enlisted men who are disabled as the result of submarine accidents the same gratuity and pensions as are allowed in the case of aviation accidents;

A bill (H. R. 9760) authorizing the granting of pensions to the dependents of the officers and men who lost their lives by the sinking of the U. S. submarine S–51 and S–4 in twice the amount due under existing law in each case; and

A bill (H. R. 9779) authorizing the granting of pensions to the dependents of the officers and men who lost their lives by the sinking of the U. S. submarine S–51 and S–4 in twice the amount due under existing law in each case.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota that these three bills be rereferred from the Committee on Naval Affairs to the Committee on Pensions?

There was no objection.

ADDRESS OF HON. JAMES A. REED

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by reprinting the address of Senator JAMES A. REED, delivered at the Jackson Day dinner, Washington, D. C., Thursday evening, January 12, 1928.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by reprinting the address delivered by Senator REED of Missouri on the occasion indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Senator REED of Missouri:

The Jackson Day celebrations held in this city have come to possess great national significance.

This meeting to-night at which are assembled leaders from all parts of the Union gives promise of a sweeping November victory.

The sober thought of the Nation is turning toward the old and sound principles which Jefferson so wisely laid down and which with unflinching fidelity and superb courage Jackson maintained and defended.

Those principles are as true to-day as they were when first proclaimed. Every departure has brought its brood of evils culminating in an era of corruption which has aroused the indignation and awakened the fears of all thoughtful men.

It is the high duty of the Democratic Party to meet the crisis and fulfill the hopes of the people.

We shall succeed if we proceed in wisdom. We shall fail if we disregard the principles of natural justice. We shall equally fail if we subordinate great fundamentals to questions of expediency or exhaust our energies in disputes about problems upon which our own party associates are far from agreement.

Our energies ought to be consolidated in the promulgation of those great doctrines of government upon which the Democratic Party was founded—without which liberty would perish and about which all Democrats are in agreement.

Let us remember that if every Democrat insists upon having his own way in all things, nobody will have his way in anything.

The preservation of the liberties of the people; the restoration of honesty in government; the punishment of public malefactors; the development of the resources of the land and the safeguarding of our international rights are of imperative and paramount importance.

Let us pitch our tents on the old camp of Democracy; let us form upon the battle line which Jefferson so wisely laid out and which Jackson so gloriously defended, and which brought to our arms victory and to the country a half century of peace and prosperity.

I do not ask that these policies be accepted because they were championed by Jackson and Jefferson, but rather because they were just and wise policies. Sound when proclaimed, they remain sound to-day. The principles of justice, like the rules of mathematics, live through the ages. They belong to the eternity.

If I am capable of understanding the spirit of the Declaration of Independence or realizing the soul of the Constitution, this Government was established to insure to the citizen the exercise of his natural liberties as an individual, and to preserve to him inviolate the enjoyment of all his faculties of brain and heart and soul.

Government was therefore ordained to prevent an interference with these sacred privileges. It was not designed that we should here on this free soil reincarnate the abominable doctrine of tyrants that the great masses of men should be guided and controlled by rulers. Man was to be no longer ordered to take a certain course through life. Masters were no longer to forge fetters binding either the body or the brain. On the contrary, it was asserted that man was capable of self-government. He was to proceed upon his own initiative; he was to suffer for his own folly. He was privileged to pursue the highway of wisdom or walk a path which the majority regarded as foolish. He was to be "the master of his fate; the captain of his soul."

Accordingly no man, whether a private citizen or the holder of an office, was permitted to interfere with the citizen in the exercise of his natural and inalienable rights.

At that point the law stepped in with its "thou shalt not," but up to that point the law was to be silent.

Against that philosophy every tryant pronounced his anathema. Tradition shook its hoary locks and prophesied disaster. Timorous souls, shaking with apprehension, feared to embark upon such an uncharted sea. Everywhere arose the discordant chorus, "Man can not govern himself."

In one burning sentence all these maunderings were silenced; all these arguments demolished.

Jefferson said: "Sometimes it is said that man can not be trusted to govern himself. Can he then be trusted with the government of others?"

Disregarding the central purpose of government, we have piled law upon law until the new-born babe finds itself enmeshed in legal regulations which are intended to control its acts until death.

Twenty thousand Federal statutes, 600,000 State laws, uncounted ordinances of cities, plus myriads of regulations pronounced by hundreds of boards and bureaus seek to impose upon the living the will, the whim, and the caprice of those who are armed with a little brief authority.

The land is overrun with agents, spies, and informers, all constituting an immense and in many instances an obnoxious un-American constabulary.

Government has been centralized until the States have been shorn of many of their just rights and obligations, whilst there is a growing and shameful disposition on the part of State authorities to voluntarily surrender the attributes of State sovereignty without which liberty is jeopardized and from which corruption invariably springs.

I repeat that the business of free government is to protect the liberty of the citizen.

What are some of these rights?

At the very head and front I place liberty of conscience. Liberty of conscience not in the narrow sense that a man may worship without punishment by the authorities but in the broad implication that no man is to be subjected to any kind of punishment, obloquy, or disgrace because of his faith. To all men of all creeds exact equality is to be accorded, and neither in private life nor in public office is the free citizen of America to be placed on account of his religion under the ban.

Impair that doctrine to the slightest degree and you tear from the temple of liberty its central supporting pillar.

Of almost equal importance—indeed, interlocked in principle with the foregoing—is the doctrine of liberty of speech, of the press, and the right of peaceable assemblage.

No careful student of the events of modern years can fail to recognize that at times of passion and prejudice these great constitutional rights have at times almost vanished in thin air.

We have at times very nearly accepted the doctrine that the right of free speech is to be construed as the right to speak only that which is popular at the hour. And, yet, every person who reasons must know that such a construction destroys entirely the doctrine of free speech, for there is no necessity of protecting a man in his right to utter that which jumps with the majority opinion of the hour.

Again, the sacred right of freedom of the press which Jefferson praised so highly when he exclaimed in substance, "I would rather live in a government with freedom of the press and without law than to live in a government with law and without freedom of the press," was at one time seriously endangered. Happily, we escaped that calamity.

Going along with these rights are certain great fundamentals to which I make no reference except to say that they include, among other things, the right of trial by jury or petition for redress, of public and speedy trials, and the prohibition of excessive bails and the imposition of cruel and unusual punishments.

There is another right of prime importance—the right to own and enjoy property.

In these later years a vicious and wholly indefensible theory has been advanced that in some way it is a sort of crime or quasi-crime for men to accumulate large fortunes. This has been accompanied by a disposition toward confiscation, injustices, and inequalities.

The Democratic Party can not afford—no party can afford—to ever attack honest wealth honestly accumulated and honestly employed.

The man with an enormous fortune and the man possessing but a few dollars are entitled to exact and equal protection before the law and under the law.

But just because it is the business of government to protect property, it is also its business to see that the powers of property are not abused to the despoliation of the individual or to the unjust wreckage of smaller fortunes.

The whole policy of the law should be to preserve fair and equal opportunity for all individuals and for all wealth honestly employed.

To employ a metaphor, the high seas should be open to the commerce of all peoples, big and little, weak or powerful. Therefore it is the business of government for the preservation of that liberty of the seas to prohibit the employment of piratical craft, which, because possessed of heavier guns and greater metal, send to the bottom without right or justice all smaller competitors. So that in all considerations affecting property, it is the business of government to protect all honestly acquired property, and in that protection to see to it that no unjust and unlawful means shall be employed for the destruction of the weak.

The Democratic Party in its history has stood proudly for these policies, and has pursued a course of conduct calculated to encourage honest investment and fair returns. This has been its story from the first.

Jefferson in his day was accused of being the enemy of wealth. Yet by opening and keeping wide open the door of opportunity for all classes of people and by protecting each citizen, great or small, in that which he had justly acquired, there was set in motion the vast energies of an entire people and enterprise and genius was invited into the great ring of achievement, with the result that the wealth of the country was vastly increased beyond any point at which it could have arrived under a policy restricting the privileges of the masses or granting to the powerful the opportunity to destroy the weak.

That policy was gloriously exemplified by Jackson, who, as has been said here to-night and will be said as long as the principles of free government exist, struck down one great power which sought to monopolize to itself the control of the industries of the Nation by controlling its currency and credits.

Cleveland pursued similar policies. During the period of his administration all men felt their honest investments were safe, and all men feared to employ dishonest or piratical methods.

We were swept from power. Then came the administration from 1912 to 1920. That period is illustrious for many great achievements.

The President early in his administration took the initial step which, backed by a Democratic Congress, lashed a corrupt lobby from the city of Washington. Tariff revision was enacted, removing many of the injustices and inequalities of the old system, laying the foundations for a general tariff reform which could only be safely worked out through a period of years. Antitrust laws were strengthened so as to give the Government better opportunity to prevent abuses and exactions. But finally the great work of that administration was perhaps the enactment of the banking and currency system which supplanted the old and rotten system which had existed for more than a half century, and which had produced periodic panics and had paralyzed the country, and which so hemmed in and bound the banking system that credits could not be extended in time of disaster.

In place of that archaic and miserable system there was created the present Federal reserve banking and currency system. It withstood the shock of the World War; it maintained the credit of the United States at the highest point occupied by any nation; it furnished the funds for our allies; kept the furnaces of our factories and industries burning and the wheels turning.

There may have been mistakes in the administration of that law, due to the imperfections of human beings. The law stands as a great monumental work.

I would be remiss in my duty if I did not say a very large part of the credit belongs to two men—CARTER GLASS, of Virginia, and President Woodrow Wilson.

These were great constructive acts, and mark in general the course that ought to be pursued by our party in its policies of future legislation.

These acts were for the benefit of the entire country. They were not class legislation. They were not calculated to take from one citizen his property and confer it upon another.

In contrast with these laws is the policy so long pursued by the Republican Party of running the Government of the United States in the interest of favored classes.

The natural right of the citizen to purchase in the lowest market was swept aside. A law was passed to compel him to pay extortionate prices to the favorites of the law.

Deny it as we may, the tariff law was paternalistic and socialistic in its essentials. Vast fortunes were accumulated but the money was extorted from the consumer. To-day the farmer realizes that he must sell in a world market at a low level, and that he is compelled by law to buy in a high market artificially created. He has struggled against these conditions for a half century. To-day he stands at the edge of the precipice of bankruptcy. He finds himself in exactly the unfortunate condition the Democratic Party has for 50 years warned him he would come to.

And now we find the farmer demanding a tariff or some means of relief from the inequality created by the law. His appeal is met with the cry that his doctrine is socialistic, bolshevistic, communistic. And the cry comes loudest from the lips of those who have demanded and received in principle the same kind of relief.

The just historian in writing the story of the Republican Party must declare that almost from the first it and its progenitor have sought not to serve the people equally but to serve them unequally—to create special classes and special interests.

To that fact we may trace most of the corruption that has cursed the land.

Whenever capital understands that it can gain special favors from government it will put up its money in campaigns as a pure business proposition, expecting heavy returns upon that investment. So that the years that have gone by are ugly and repellant with the stories of graft and political corruption.

It was Matt Quay who had help by law to fatten the manufacturers and who then declared he proposed to "fry the fat out of them."

It was Dudley who gathered in an immense corruption fund and employed it voting repeaters in "blocks of five" in the pivotal State of Indiana.

It was Mark Hanna who with unblushing effrontery purchased the colored delegates from Southern States, fixed the policy of his party, and then with a fund so large that his emissaries didn't know how to spend it, proceeded to the corruption of the ballot box of many States.

It was a few great protected capitalists who gathered in a room and proposed at one sitting to put up hundreds of thousands of dollars to nominate their favorite son for the Presidency.

It was another of the candidates of that party who paid out $38,500 to practically buy the delegates from the State of Missouri.

It was the organization of the same party who started a scheme to raise from thirteen to twenty millions of dollars to be employed in a political campaign.

It was the representatives of these interests, headed by Daugherty, of Ohio, and Penrose, of Pennsylvania, who, in the small hours of the morning, in a smoke-filled room, as they described it, agreed to nominate Mr. Harding; and it was a truculent convention which ratified their acts.

Back of these men were the interests that proposed to enrich themselves by the perpetuation of the tariff graft, by the theft of the oil lands—interests that are willing to fatten and batten upon the lifeblood of the Republic.

What wonder then when such men bid for such prizes that members of the Cabinet become corrupt; that public lands are delivered to the bribe giver; that corruption stalked through the departments of Washington; that the Attorney General literally bedded with the most notorious grafter of modern times, the most commendable act in whose life was that of felo de se.

So long as these prizes are hung in the political market they will be bid for by the corrupt, the venal, and the vicious. Cupidity is without conscience, and dollars like waters seek their lowest level.

Witness the spectacle of Pennsylvania. The Secretary of the Treasury proceeded to that great Commonwealth and informed the people that he spoke in the name of the President. He demanded the renomination of Mr. Pepper, and he demanded it in the name of the great interests that have so long enjoyed protection in Pennsylvania. Together with the members of his family he assembled the political pundits of Pennsylvania. He effected combination. He and his brother subscribed $75,000 as an initial ante in a political jack pot. Over $2,000,000 was spent for one candidate; 50,000 men and women were employed at $10 a day to work at the polls in the single city of Pittsburgh.

Money was carried about the State in gripsacks. Banks were so far as possible avoided. A single manufacturer boldly stated that he contributed $400,000, and that he did so in order to perpetuate the advantage of the manufacturers of Pennsylvania, namely, the exemption from all taxation for State purposes. This saturnalia of corruption was organized by the Secretary of the Treasury, who sits today in the Cabinet.

Upon the other hand, VARE gathered his grafters, his bootleggers, his friends, and that political organization which Root once described in substance as unspeakably corrupt. They piled up a majority in the city of Philadelphia exceeding 200,000. VARE was apparently triumphant. During the preliminary campaign the Mellon forces described VARE as wholly unfit for office, and charged that his occupancy of a seat in the United States Senate would be a public disgrace and menace.

No sooner, however, had VARE apparently triumphed than did the cohesive power of money and graft bring these gentlemen together. Mellon's nephew became the chairman of the committee to consummate at the polls the iniquity of the primaries. Mellon, standing in the Cabinet and almost from the steps of the White House, impiously declared that the contributions were as honest as ever made to a church of Almighty God. And Mellon still holds his seat in the Cabinet and the President "openeth not his mouth."

That is part of the story. When the oil frauds were being exposed; when the Senate, with no power except the mere right to issue a subpœna, was searching the land for evidence, the Department of Justice was not only paralyzed but worse than paralyzed by the presence at its head of Mr. Daugherty, the unspeakable. The Senate demanded his expulsion. The President treated the request of the Senate with contumely. He kept him in office during the critical period when the evidence could have best been discovered, and then discharged him on an inconsequential matter and with a letter of confidence.

It is safe to assert that the present Republican administration has been as subservient to the great protected interests as the office boy is to the head of the corporation for which he works.

Part and parcel of this subserviency is the yielding to the demand made for the cancellation of the foreign debts. That demand comes chiefly from the holders of the securities of European nations or from those who brokered these obligations. The reason is obvious. If our Government can be induced to cancel its claim, then the claims of these private holders of European securities will be assured payment. This administration has played into the hands of these gentlemen, who are willing to transfer billions of dollars of indebtedness from European nations and place that heavy burden upon the backs of the American people.

Is it not time to have an American administration which represents the American people, that feels the fervor of Washington's patriotism, and that acts with the deathless courage and unflinching honesty of "Old Hickory" Jackson?

SETTLEMENT OF CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9285) to provide for the settlement of claims against the United States on account of property damage, personal injury, or death.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9285, with Mr. LAGUARDIA in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9285, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, with the understanding that the bill be printed in the RECORD, I shall not object. If the gentleman will couple that with his request, I shall not object.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I think we had better have the bill read.

The Clerk read the bill.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, this bill vitally affects every Member of the House and should interest every Member of the House.

In presenting this matter for your consideration I would call to your attention the fact that the House passed this bill unanimously at the last session. The present bill is almost identical, carrying a few minor changes, which I will explain later. There is little I can add to the presentation which I made to you on a previous occasion, but a brief review of the situation and the provisions of the bill will serve to refresh your memory.

The Claims Committee is the oldest standing committee of the House, established November 13, 1794. The Court of Claims was established in 1855, its powers extended in 1862 and 1866, and by the Bowman Act in 1863. These various acts afforded little relief until 1887, when the Tucker Act "provided for bringing suits against the Government."

There is a rather interesting coincidence connected with these last two acts. The Bowman Act takes its name from Hon. Selwyn Z. Bowman, who at that time was a resident of my city of Somerville, in Massachusetts. The father of our colleague from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] introduced and passed the Tucker Act, which made the Bowman Act of some real value; and Mr. Tucker, during his incumbency here, represented the district in which I was born in the State of Virginia. I follow along with those two gentlemen in trying to find some relief for a serious situation, which has increased a thousandfold since those days.

Concurrent jurisdiction under the Tucker Act in suits up to $10,000 was given to the United States district courts. Jurisdiction under these acts was limited to contract claims. Since then Congress has passed a number of laws granting additional relief. In 1914 to the Agricultural Department to reimburse owners of horses, vehicles, and so forth, lost, damaged, or destroyed while being used in fire fighting; in 1910 the Commerce Department, empowering the Commissioner of Lighthouses to consider and settle claims occasioned by collision not to exceed $500; same power extended to the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey in 1920; in 1917, 1918, 1919, 1920, and 1922 the Navy Department was given additional powers; in 1914 the Post Office Department was given jurisdiction over burglary cases not exceeding $10,000, and in 1921 to settle property damages to the amount not exceeding $500. This latter provision was extended to the War Department in 1920. In 1916 the Employees' Compensation Commission was established, and in 1924 the World War veterans' act was passed. Two important acts were the act of 1922, known as the Underhill small claims act, which gave the departments the power to settle property damage up to $1,000, and the admiralty act of 1925, which authorizes suits to be brought against the United States in admiralty for damages occasioned by Government-owned vessels.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Did those cases arise out of contract or tort?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Those cases were for property damage.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then they were tort cases and not contract cases?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I am sorry I have not had time to make a serious study of this bill. Is it intended to pass it to-day or try to?

Mr. UNDERHILL. We hope to pass it to-day.

Mr. MADDEN. There is one provision in it which it seems to me should be eliminated. It is provided in the bill that a bureau chief, or at least the head of a department, may adjust claims up to $5,000. If a claim is adjusted, then it is ipso facto payable by the Treasury Department without any further consideration?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No; the claim must go to the Committee on Appropriations before it can be paid.

Mr. MADDEN. The bill does not read that way, does it?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. BOX. The gentleman will find the provision to which he refers on page 2, section (b). That provision requires the presentation of the evidence and all the considerations entering into the allowance of the claim to the Committee on Appropriations before it is allowed finally.

Mr. MADDEN. If the Committee on Appropriations must finally pass on such a claim it will probably be all right, because that committee rejects a lot of such claims, but even then I think it is putting a lot of responsibility and power into the hands of a bureau chief which ought not to be permitted.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I will say to the gentleman that I will explain that matter when I come to it, and if the gentleman believes it ought to be amended I shall be glad to consider any suggestion he may care to make, because I am always willing to consider his judgment in such matters as superior to my own.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I wish the gentleman would permit me to go on with my statement. We have plenty of time, and when I am through with my statement I shall be glad to answer any questions the gentleman may propound.

Mr. BLANTON. I will wait until the gentleman finishes his set speech, and then I want to ask him some questions.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I want to touch on these two matters particularly. In 1922 an act, known as the Underhill Small Claims Act, passed the House. I say to you that that has worked admirably, economically, and equitably, and that over 2,000 claims have been settled at a minimum of cost, relieving the Congress of the burden of adjudicating over 2,000 claims. In 1925 we passed what is known as the admiralty act. Those of you who may be opposed to a change in the fundamental law of the land and hold the old idea that the king can do no wrong or that the sovereign or government can do no wrong, will be interested to know that the admiralty act is the most drastic piece of legislation along that line that has ever been passed. It allows suits in admiralty for damages caused by United States vessels on the seas.

You can bring suits for damages because of accidents which occur on the seas, and yet you have left out of consideration suits for damages which may occur on land. So if any of you think that this bill is drastic or revolutionary, just let me tell you it is simply a progressive step and in line with the measure which was passed in 1925.

In spite of all of this legislation the number of damage claims before the Committee on Claims has increased this year, and it is a physical and mental impossibility to consider more than a very small proportion of them. During the last Congress—Sixty-ninth—over 2,000 claims bills were introduced, and while the Committee on Claims held more meetings than in any previous Congress only 250 of such bills became law, the largest number, however, in the history of the committee. The printing expenses of the Claims Committees of the House and Senate for proposed bills, hearings, and reports during the Sixty-eighth Congress were $38,000. The cost to the Government of printing private bills, of which private claims form a considerable part, was for the last 10 years in excess of $500,000. Membership on the Committee on Claims has become a nearly intolerable burden, not only because of the number of claims submitted, but because of the realization that careful judicial consideration of the claims is for the most part impossible.

The greatest dissatisfaction and the severest criticism of our Government in the matter of claims is the lack of a forum to which a claim may be taken as a matter of right as contrasted to the necessity for making supplication to favor of the governmental agency. Foreign governments are far more liberal in the practice of redress for claims than our Government. In England, if any person has in point of property a just demand upon the King, he may petition him in his court of chancery by what is called a petition of right. There the chancellor will administer right, theoretically, as a matter of grace and not compulsorily. In fact, right is administered as a matter of constitutional duty.

The idea that government is immune from the jurisdiction of the courts seems to have arisen from the application of the principles of the Roman law and the adoption of the monarchical principle that the sovereign can do no wrong. This theory of immunity on the part of the sovereign has been found to be impracticable and has been departed from materially by legislative or judicial action in all countries. In some it has been abandoned altogether. The idea that a government is immune from the jurisdiction of the courts is archaic, unjust, and inequitable. The Government can now be sued directly on matters of contract and in admiralty cases only.

In other words, if a big corporation has a contract with the Government and the Government does not live up to its obligations, the corporations can sue the Government. If you are the owner of a vessel costing a million dollars, more or less, and a Government vessel damages your vessel, you can sue the Government; but if you are a poor citizen, an ordinary taxpayer, and the Government injures you or your property on land, you have no redress except to come, with 2,000 others, to Congress in its brief sessions and ask Congress to adjudicate your claim.

Now, I am going to briefly set forth the provisions of the bill. First, it calls for an increase of the small claims act which was passed in 1922. The limitation contained in that act was $1,000, and departments were authorized to settle cases, where property damage occurred, up to that amount. The amount is increased from $1,000 to $5,000.

If you can trust your departments with the millions of dollars appropriated yearly, you certainly can trust the departments to settle property damages, which are easily ascertained, up to $5,000. There is no opportunity for fraud or collusion. The department has to come back to Congress with its report, and the Committee on Appropriations has full jurisdiction to either refuse payment or to act in accordance with the findings made by the department.

The same argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], adduced here just a moment ago as being applicable in this case, was used in opposition to the small claims act when we first considered it. They said the heads of the departments were not competent or able to settle a property-damage claim which was easily ascertainable, yet you trust your departments with millions of dollars of appropriations—not just one million dollars or two or three million dollars, but millions of dollars—and since I have been on the Committee on Claims the largest business we have carried on in any one session was about $12,500,000. If we can appropriate hundreds of millions of dollars to the departments, I do not see why in the world we can not trust them to settle such matters up to $5,000, particularly when there is absolutely no opportunity for collusion or fraud, as the department has to make a return not to Congress but to one of the best, if not the best, committees in this House, the Committee on Appropriations. They must submit a full history of the case, including the amount awarded, the damages sustained, and the whole thing right through. This has to go to the Committee on Appropriations and then the Committee on Appropriations turns it down, if it wants to, or it goes through as a proposition recommended by the department.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Then the saving clause in the gentleman's bill is a provision that after they settle the matter they must get by the watchful eye of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and his Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I think that is very properly so.

Mr. BLANTON. Then the gentleman is shifting the burden of this proposition from his Claims Committee to the already overburdened committee of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]; is not that true?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No; not at all.

Mr. BLANTON. In other words, the gentleman wants the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and his committee to look into and go behind and delve into every one of these claims brought by the departments to the committee, which would kill him in six months with all the work he already has to do.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Oh, no. If the gentleman will please restrain himself, I will tell him there is nothing of the sort involved, positively. It simply cuts out one step or two steps in the adjudication of these claims. It removes it from political consideration, and, if you please, it removes it from the power of the gentleman through pique or otherwise to object to a perfectly legitimate claim. That is all this does. It gives an opportunity to the claimant which he does not have at the present time.

And, by the way, if anybody wants to offer an amendment reducing this amount, I am perfectly willing to entertain it and defend my position, and if the House decides it will not trust the department, all right and good, my responsibility ends.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. When the gentleman first came here the Government did not pay damages for its own tort, did it?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No.

Mr. BLANTON. This is an enlargement that the gentleman has been responsible for. In all of the jurisdictions of the various States between private individuals where there is a suit on tort, where contributory negligence is proven, that obliterates the case. The gentleman does not carry out that idea in this bill.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Oh, yes; he does.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, he apportions the damage. The gentleman says the Government has been guilty of so much negligence and the claimant has been guilty of contributory negligence and we will therefore pay him a little bit less because of his own negligence—a different rule of law applicable to the Government to the one which is applicable between private individuals in the various States.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Not a different rule of law from that which the Government provides for the government of its own citizens, the people themselves.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Massachusetts is not a lawyer.

Mr. UNDERHILL. No, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. He is a layman.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman from Texas tell me when these tort claims were not paid by the Government?

Mr. BLANTON. They were not paid in this Claims Committee prior to the entry therein of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL].

Mr. BULWINKLE. Oh, we passed them before that.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to know when.

Mr. BULWINKLE. A tort claim in which the Government was wrong.

Mr. BLANTON. I was on the Committee on Claims when the question was first raised as to whether this Government would pay for a tort.

Mr. UNDERHILL. That does not make it right.

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. BOX. My colleague from Texas is in error about that, if he will permit——

Mr. BLANTON. I mean as a policy of government.

Mr. BOX. I am talking about a settlement being made by Congress. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box], the speaker now, presented a claim for death before the gentleman from Massachusetts was chairman of the Committee on Claims, and I think it was before he was a member of that committee. This claim was allowed. I know of a great many cases where this Congress has allowed compensation to people injured by the wrongful act of the Government, and they were doing this when I came to Congress and when I became a member of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BLANTON. When Mr. STEPHENS, now in the Senate, was chairman of that committee, before my colleague [Mr. Box] came here, was when the question was first raised whether or not this Government would allow itself to be responsible for the tort of some employee.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Oh, in the Hunter case in New Mexico we allowed $5,000——

Mr. BLANTON. That was after Mr. STEPHENS, of Mississippi, was chairman of the committee. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] has not been here as long as I thought. It was during the administration of Mr. STEPHENS, of Mississippi, that the question was first raised.

Mr. BULWINKLE. It was allowed when the gentleman from Texas was a member of the committee.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; when I first came here.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Let me go on, and then I will yield.

It does not help the gentleman's case at all when he stated that this great Government has been derelict in paying its just dues and honest debts. The Government makes laws for its people and the Government can not refuse the people the same right and the same privilege and the same justice that it exacts. I want to think of my Government as being honest. I am proud of it. But between you and me, our Government has not been honest with its people up to the present time. I am trying to put my Government in a position where it will be honest with the people and observe the same rules and regulations that it exacts from them.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Let me finish and then I will be glad to go over all the matter with anyone.

The reason I placed this limit at $10,000 is in order that we may protect the people throughout the country. If we allow the district courts jurisdiction, a man in Seattle, in the northwest part of the country, will not have to come to Washington to settle a little claim of seven or eight thousand dollars. If the man lives in Bangor, Me., or down in Texas, where it takes longer to go than across the continent, that man can go to the district court if he has a just and honest claim and have it tried there and not be put to the expense of coming to Washington and trying his case before the Court of Claims.

In a matter that exceeds $10,000 he can go before the Court of Claims if the amount is sufficient to warrant an adjudication by the best court that can pass on it, and that is no reflection on the district court.

As to the stumblingblocks which my predecessors found, including in that number I might mention the father of a gentleman who is now serving with us, who was previously chairman of the Committee on Claims. The father of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] sought a solution of this problem. He was a trained lawyer and a mighty good one. He looked at it from the legal standpoint and could not get away from the stumblingblocks in the path of most lawyers, the jury. He thought the jury had a position absolutely unassailable. But I feel, and always have felt, that you could not trust a jury on cases against the Government, because the ordinary juror seems to think that the Government has an inexhaustible source of supply of money, that all Uncle Sam has to do is to dig it up out of the mines, whereas he has to take it out of the pockets of the people, and it is provided in all these cases, following the practice of the Court of Claims, that they can not be tried before a jury, but they do have the right to go into court.

Also in cases of contributory negligence the Government is protected in the provisions of this bill; in both actions as regards property and in personal injury.

Now, the third point I consider the most important feature of the bill, and that is the settlement of personal injury and death claims. It is positively wicked; it is disgraceful that the Government should allow people to go as they have in the past without a single tribunal before which the most heartrending cases can be brought.

That is not the right treatment on the part of the Government. The Congress is not to be charged with dereliction of its duty, because it has much to attend to; it has not the time, and it has had to continually pass along details of this kind to the bureau chiefs. I am as much opposed to bureaucracy as anybody in the House, but the Congress just has to pass these details onto the bureau chiefs.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I have refused so many that I feel that I can not yield to the gentleman now. The Government has taken cognizance of this condition with reference to its own employees. I do not cast any reflection upon the employee of the Government, but he is in a pretty soft position. He has regular employment, and his pay check comes around regularly. Here in Washington he has 30 days leave, and in many of the departments he has more than that, and in addition to that he has 30 days sick leave, and then he has the retirement fund. Carpenters, blacksmiths, teamsters, and masons, artisans and professional men, who are paying the taxes, do not have the advantage of a retirement fund, even if they should contribute 3 per cent of their salaries. The Government employee says that he can not live on the present retirement, and that we must jack it up to twelve or fifteen hundred dollars a year, while at the same time we have people employed right here for less than that.

So far as our own particular pets are concerned, we have taken cognizance of them, and in the act of 1916 we provided a medium whereby their injuries may be taken care of, so that broken machines of human bones and frame might be to a certain extent replaced in industry. A very liberal compensation bill was passed in 1916, and only last year the Congress increased the maximum amounts allowed under the provisions of that bill, so that it is extremely generous at the present time.

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, there are only two things which will prevent a man injured in the Government service from receiving compensation. One is that he is intoxicated and the other is that he was under the influence of drugs. It is not a question of whether he was at fault when he sustained his injury; it is not a question of whether a fellow employee was the cause of his injury. Not at all. The question is simply did he sustain the injury, and was he sober when he did it, and was he in his right senses. That is all we require of them. Whereas under my bill, I state as emphatically as I can in a bill that in cases of contributory negligence, that contributory negligence be taken into consideration. That is following the policy which this committee has adopted.

Certain classes of claims in which relief is available under existing law are excluded.

Such, in brief, is the situation, the purpose of the bill, and the remedies proposed. To-day there is nothing adequate, scientific, or equitable relative to tort claims against the Government. It is a tremendous burden and expense to the Congress in time and labor and embarrassment to individual Congressmen in their inability to get favorable action.

Justice now awaits upon political consideration or the popularity of a Congressman or the influence of a Senator. Congress is not the place to bring these claims. Busy Congressmen have devoted hours, days, weeks, and months to investigating claims favorably reported, and as many others that have been adversely acted upon in committee and which do not appear upon the calendar. They must have the unanimous consent of every Member of the House before they can be considered, and they must then follow practically the same procedure in another body. All of their labors of months can be overturned or nullified by the whim, pique, or conscientious objection of an individual Member of the House.

The Federal Government is daily directing itself more and more into the affairs of the individual. Therefore the chances of injury because of carelessness of Government employees or because of unavoidable accident becomes greater all of the time.

The most important and legitimate function of the Government is the protection of the persons and property of its people. It provides such protection to the people one from the other, but with reference to itself neglects its most sacred duty. The Government which demands loyalty from its subjects should not deny justice to them. It may cost a little more money than the present system, but the Government will be repaid ten times over in loyalty, appreciation, and confidence of the people.

Article 5 of the bill of rights declares that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without the due process of law, nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation." Indeed, every declaration of liberty and human justice back to the Magna Charta indorses this principle. Yet in this country, the greatest and wealthiest country in the world, the Government, or its agents, destroys private property and human lives without recompense, compensation, or due process of law. The analogy is undeniable and the Government ignores its greatest obligation to its citizens. It is no longer a question whether or not the sovereign can do no wrong, nor can we refuse to pay our just debts because of the cost, but must acknowledge the evident fact that it is a mere subterfuge or excuse based upon the misuse of power or the evasion of justice.

Now, gentlemen, I want to point out to you briefly some of the troubles which confront the Committee on Claims, and confront each and every one of you individually.

Let me say a word in reference to Senate bills, without any criticism, because we are debarred by the rules of this House from doing that, but most of you have come in contact with this situation. The Senate passes many of these claims by courtesy. It does not demand from the department reports on the claims, but it passes them by courtesy. Then they come over here, and you go to the chairman of the Committee on Claims and say, "Here is a very pathetic case; the Senate passed it and it is on the calendar. Will you not report it out?" I look it up and find that there is not a leg for it to stand upon. I come to you and tell you the circumstances, and you say that I am hard boiled; that I am hard hearted, and yet if I reported one of those bills and took it up on the floor of the House it would discredit the committee, and it would be thrown out on the objection of a half hundred Members, let alone one. That is one thing that you are up against. We do not pass bills by courtesy; we pass them on their merits.

The responsibility of the chairman of the Committee on Claims is tremendous, and it ought not to exist. I have tried not to be influenced either by friendship or by any dislike I might have for an individual Member. I have tried to adjudicate these claims on their merits. I have no dislikes. I think I could count them as one single unit in this splendid body of men of 435, and if I did not have the support of the finest bunch of men that were ever in Congress I could not do it; I could not possibly do it. I have had that support in the Committee on Claims.

This is our proceeding: Each member at every meeting is assigned a handful of claims, and through the week, perhaps into the small hours of the morning, he studies them, and the next Friday comes to our meeting and makes a report. He may have a half dozen reports to make, but we can hear but one report at a time from that man, and he keeps these other five reports in his possession until he gets time to present them to the committee. He gets no publicity. He studies these claims, and brings them back on the following Friday to the general committee unless he finds in the meantime some complication and goes to the chairman for additional information. Sometimes we do not get around the table, and, as I say, he has half a dozen claims that he has worked upon for a week or 10 days, and he is obliged to put them back into his pocket until the next meeting. That is all wrong.

There are 3,000 claims pending before the committee. Every Friday each member of the committee, consisting of 21 members, is allowed to report a claim. Then if perhaps we are good and somebody else does not interfere, and the Members are willing to come here for a night session, we get a chance to present our bills to the House. Last year we had one day session, and all the rest of our claims, breaking the record of all previous years, were passed at a night session.

I should like to spend the rest of my time in going through some of the cases I have here. I have one case here that has passed five different Congresses, one branch or the other, and has failed to passage in both because it was too late, or it got caught in the jam and could not get through; and these claimants have been waiting all these years for relief for the payment of a debt which the United States owes them.

I would also like to talk, for illustration, on some of the bills that come down from the other body, but I will let that go.

I have other bills that have come down to us from the Senate. I might present those to you and show their inconsistency; show how one man was given on an identical claim a mere pittance, and another was given several thousand dollars. That is not right. We should take these matters where they belong, before a proper court or board. I would like to have those who are interested read the report of the committee, which goes more into detail than I can at the present time.

Before I close I want to pay a tribute of recognition to the men, the lawyers, on my committee. You all know I am a layman; I could not possibly have gotten this bill out and have met with its legal requirements if it had not been for such men as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box], the ranking man of the minority on the committee; the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. VINCENT], a member of the committee during the last session whose legal mind and ability as a lawyer is not exceeded by any Member of this body; the clerk of our committee, Mr. Helmus, who is also a trained lawyer. Other members of the committee who follow the legal profession who were of great assistance to me were Mr. SEARS, of Nebraska; Mr. BULWINKLE, of North Carolina; Mr. THOMAS, of Oklahoma; Mr. CELLER, of New York; and Mr. MORROW, of New Mexico. Every one of these men and the rest of the Committee on Claims are doing a sacrificing and unselfish work. They give to it their time from other matters, matters interesting to their constituents, for no member of the committee ever has a claim referred to him that affects his own constituents, or even his State; and so he is doing this work, why? He is doing it for you, in the first place; and he is doing it for the claimant, in the second place; and he is trying the best he knows how and the best he can to bring about a little relief to the people who are neglected by the Government.

Now I shall be glad to answer questions if anyone desires to ask them.

Mr. LOZIER. Is there any principle of sound policy, or any principle of moral or legal ethics, that should prevent the Federal Government from responding in damages for negligence and frequently the unfortunate acts of its servants?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Nothing, except simply the old archaic idea that the king can do no wrong. That idea has come down to us. We have never had a king, except a long time back; but that thing came down from the dark ages of the past, when the king had nothing to do with business when—

> The king was in his counting house counting out his money,
> The queen was in the kitchen eating bread and honey.

They were not liable to do any damage to the people; but this Government to-day is carrying on almost every line of endeavor that you can imagine—in the air and on the earth, and recently under the sea.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman very truly stated that in another body these bills are passed regardless and by courtesy. We never see there an adverse report filed against any of them. Now, if that august body, under oath, can pass these claims in that way, how can we expect ordinary bureau chiefs to give any better attention to them?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Well, thank God, I am not responsible for the conscience or acts of those at the other end of the Capitol. Perhaps I am doing the other body an injustice, but so far as these bureau chiefs are concerned, I would rather take my chances with them than with those at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. LANHAM. I would like to ask the gentleman a question in order to get some information with reference to this bill. The Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments a few days ago reported a bill giving to the Comptroller General authority to make reports to Congress of claims against the Government which come before him, claims which present either a legal or equitable basis for relief but for which no specific appropriations have been made. That, of course, would be under the existing law of a limit of $1,000. Now, in case this measure is enacted into law, would legislation of that character be unnecessary, or would it still be advisable to have such reports from the Comptroller General in those cases—that is, cases within the limitation of the law and which presented a basis for legal or equitable relief.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I think where there is any medium existing to-day—any real medium that can function—for the adjudication of claims of any character whatever it is just as well to let it stay where it is. I have a high opinion of the Comptroller General, but he has been an awful nuisance to our committee.

Mr. LANHAM. Of course, I assume that these reports would go to the Committee on Claims?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Many of them do, and they are based on a strict interpretation of the letter of the law and technicalities. Of course, I would not have the comptroller go against the law, but I think if I were in his place I could stretch my conscience to the extent of finding a reasonable interpretation of the law rather than a strict interpretation of the letter of the law.

Mr. LANHAM. My inquiry is directed as to whether or not that character of legislation would be necessary in case this bill passes? For instance, the Comptroller General appeared before us the other day, and he seemed to have reference to those cases not strictly and technically within the law, but to those cases which, in his judgment, present a legal or equitable basis but for which no appropriation has been made.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Those would not be affected by this. In connection with that I want to mention two cases showing our confidence—after having thrown him a brickbat I will now throw him a bouquet—in the Comptroller General. There was a terrible accident in New Jersey. Mr. ACKERMAN knows the case. A munitions depot blew up, hundreds of people were injured, many were killed, and property to the extent of millions was destroyed. In Mr. BACHMANN'S district, at an airplane exhibition by the Government, an accident occurred through faulty machinery. Lots of people were killed, others were maimed and injured for life, and property was destroyed. Your committee has no medium through which it can adjudicate such claims as those and so we have given authority, or hope to, to the War Department, to make an investigation and report to the Comptroller General and the Comptroller General will then decide what awards are necessary and right in the cases.

Mr. ACKERMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. ACKERMAN. The accident at Lake Denmark comes under the supervision of the Navy Department. I understand there are 1,100 claims pending at the present time which will shortly be certified to the Comptroller General, and if this bill becomes a law will those claims be settled under this bill?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No; they will be settled under the special bill we passed. I will ask Mr BACHMANN to tell me when the accident occurred in his State.

Mr. BACHMANN. In 1921.

Mr. UNDERHILL. It is now 1928 and the people who are walking around on crutches and who lost their property have been waiting for all these seven years and have not received a dollar yet.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Up to date no Federal court or other court in the United States could entertain a suit against the Government sounding in tort. Is not that correct?

Mr. UNDERHILL. That is correct.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The Court of Claims will entertain a suit against the United States on claims founded upon the Constitution or any laws of Congress, upon regulations of a department, upon contract with the Government of the United States, but can not and will not entertain suits on claims sounding in tort. Now, is it the purpose of this bill to permit suits in Federal courts in cases sounding in tort, irrespective of the amount of damage involved?

The bill under consideration gives bureau chiefs jurisdiction up to $5,000, but over $5,000—whatever the amount is—would the Court of Claims have the right to assume jurisdiction?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes. Let me illustrate that. I do not know that it is a very fortunate illustration, but it brings out pretty strongly many of the arguments I have given here. The Government has recently sued one named Doheny—I believe that is his name—and has secured a judgment in the courts for over $3,000,000. Mr. Doheny built a lot of tanks out in Honolulu at Pearl Harbor, and whatever Mr. Doheny may have done to the Government, he certainly did a good job for the Government there, because I have been out there and have seen the tanks. Mr. Doheny has no right to-day to go into a court for an adjudication of his claim against the United States, although the claim of the United States against him has been tried and judgment has been found for several million dollars. And how much chance, my good friends, would Doheny have if the Committee on Claims should bring in a bill giving him an opportunity to go before the courts?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Whatever claim Doheny has against the Government, did that arise out of a contract with the Government?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No; I understand he has no right to proceed against the Government.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The gentleman understands that, but I notice newspapers have talked about the matter. I am not trying to adjudicate Doheny's claim against the Government or his right to sue, but as to this talk about the king can do no harm——

Mr. UNDERHILL. Can do no wrong.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Or no wrong; it is the same thing.

Mr. UNDERHILL. He can do a lot of harm.

Mr. RAMSEYER. This talk about the Government being dishonest and unjust to its citizens, sounds all right; but there is some good reason for the doctrine that the king can do no harm or wrong. I am not going to amplify that now. You now wipe that all away and in any case sounding in tort, I do not care how large the case may be, the Government can be sued, with certain few exceptions, set out in the bill before us.

I am simply wondering what would happen in a case like this. We are talking about flood control, and I have heard a good deal of complaint about persons owning land on either side of the Mississippi River where because of construction of a levee some place the water is diverted, causing a great deal of damage, and I am wondering if this bill goes through and if constructions of that kind are carried on in the future whether it would be possible to sue the Government not only in the thousands but in the hundreds of millions of dollars for damages growing out of the Government's effort to control the floods of the great Mississippi Valley; or in case of war and the enemy being in the country and in possession of a large city, when it becomes necessary to bombard the city and destroy the property of the city there, the bill does not except that sort of a situation, and I am wondering whether you in this bill are not affording an opportunity to present hundreds of millions of dollars of claims for damages which the Court of Claims would have to hear. I do not want to go into the matter further, but I want to tell the gentleman there are some good, sound, fundamental reasons why we have stuck so long to this old doctrine that the sovereign can not be sued. Of course, I am not insisting that we should make no modification at all of that rule, but there is reason for the doctrine that the king can do no harm or that the citizen has no right to sue the Government, which after all is suing himself, and inasmuch as he benefits he, in part, injures himself also whenever he recovers from the Government, and I think we ought to proceed very cautiously along this line.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The only thing I can say to the gentleman in reply is that taking the two illustrations, in the years I have been on the Claims Committee no claim has ever been made against the Government for damages caused by the building of levees or the attempt at flood control. As far as war is concerned, I am not a lawyer, but I believe everything goes during war and there is no law that governs anything except military law.

Mr. STOBBS. Will the gentleman yield just a moment?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. STOBBS. In answer to the question of the gentleman from Iowa, I have not read this bill very carefully, but in my brief running over it, it seems to me that all claims against the Government here are predicated on the negligence of some employee of the Government, and that would answer the gentleman's question, and there could be no claims against the Government unless there had been a negligent act by some employee which would be the proximate cause of the injury.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Well, "the proximate cause of the injury"—there is no use now to define the various phases of negligence, but certainly if you were to construct a levee like the Government does and thereby turn the water on somebody else, you would be liable. The attempt here is to make the Government liable in a case of that kind the same as an individual.

I would like to ask the gentleman one other question on a different subject. I do not know whether the gentleman was in the House Thursday or not when I called to the attention of the House the importance of amending laws by reference to the late code instead of to the Statutes at Large or the Revised Statutes or other source of the statute laws in existence prior to the new code. The gentleman just spoke of the corps of fine lawyers he has on his committee, and I should like to know if they have considered the advisability of changing the references in this bill to the late code rather than to enactments in existence previous to the code.

Mr. UNDERHILL. This bill was drawn, as a matter of fact, some three or four years ago, before we had the new code.

Mr. RAMSEYER. When we come to the amending stage, I hope the chairman will consider either changing the references wholly to the new code, or at least after the references in the bill place also references to the new code.

Mr. UNDERHILL. We will try to do that.

Mr. COMBS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I will.

Mr. COMBS. In the paragraph which vests concurrent jurisdiction in the district courts for hearing the claims—line 25, page 3, this sentence appears:

> All suits brought to trial under the provisions of this paragraph shall be tried by the court without a jury.

In other words the district courts are to determine these matters even involving questions of fact without the use of a jury to adjudicate such controversies.

Mr. UNDERHILL. This is the same procedure that is followed by the Court of Claims, and we make the same provision.

Mr. COMBS. I was wondering if the gentleman had considered this aspect of the matter: The Court of Claims and the district courts of the United States are entirely distinct tribunals drawing their authority from different sections of the substantive law. The only effect of the act would be to remove the common-law immunity, the immunity which the Government now enjoys in any action sounding in tort and to make it subject to any common-law action under the provisions of this bill. That is in contravention of the Constitution of the United States. Article 7 of the bill of rights provides that in all suits at common law where the value in controversy shall exceed $20 the right of trial by jury shall be preserved.

We are now dealing with a bill which proposes the removal of the disability or immunity the Government enjoys, and in which all actions brought thereunder are in effect common-law actions instituted in the regular way and conforming to the regular rules of pleading, and for that reason it seems, without any exhaustive study, the bill is a denial of the right of trial by jury, and that that would be a denial of the constitutional provision.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Not at all. The precedents have been well established in creating the Court of Claims which has the same provision. We are establishing a new court, we are giving new privileges, and we may make such restrictions as we please.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I will yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The exact point has been ruled by the Supreme Court of the United States in several cases. In the case of McElrath against the United States, the court says:

There is nothing in these provisions which violate either the letter or the spirit of the seventh amendment. Suits against the Government in the Court of Claims, whether reference be had to the claimant's demands, or to the defense, or to any set-off, or counterclaims which the Government may assert, are not controlled by the seventh amendment. They are not suits at common law within its true meaning. The Government can not be sued except with its own consent. It can declare in what court it may be sued and prescribe the forms of pleading and the rules of practice to be observed in such suits—

And so forth.

And speaking generally it says that to the trial of cases against the Government the constitutional provision has no application.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, this bill is a most dangerous bill, yet I realize, I guess, as much as anyone here, that there is no chance in the world of stopping its passage. If I were to show all of the bad features of it, one of which was raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], which alone ought to defeat it, if we were to argue the bad features of it for an hour and then call for a record vote perhaps we might get 10 or 20 votes against it, because most Members here want all of these numerous claims against the Government paid.

So what is the use of wasting time on such a proposition. But I want to call attention before the bill is passed to some of its features, so that hereafter it can not be said that it was passed without protest. The gentleman from Massachusetts was mistaken when a few moments ago he said that it passed last session unanimously; it did not. I was against it then. I did not believe then it ought to pass, but there was no chance to stop it. I was against the bill in 1922 that conferred on the Government bureaus the right to settle claims up to a thousand dollars, but there was no chance to stop it. It passed under our restrictive rules here.

This bill ought not to pass. Down in Texas where I live the law is that where a claim is not more than $200 it has to be brought in the justice court and be decided by a justice of the peace. And it must be over $20 in order for an appeal to be taken to the county court. In the State of Texas, where the claim is over $200 and up to $500, it must be brought in the county court and tried by a county judge. If it is over $500 and up to $1,000 it may be brought either in the county court or in the district court, both having concurrent jurisdiction. If it is for more than $1,000, it has to be brought into the circuit court, if you please, under the rules prevailing there.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL], when he passed that bill in 1922 which conferred jurisdiction on bureau chiefs of all claims up to $1,000, had in mind then just what he has in mind now—the shifting of responsibility. That is what it is, pure and simple. Let me show you what he says in this report:

The purpose of the bill is to relieve Congress.

That is the purpose of this bill. It is to take work that the Committee on Claims ought to do, and work you and I ought to do, and send it down here to a bureau and let a bureau chief do what 435 Representatives and 96 Senators ought to do. That is the underlying purpose of it. It is getting rid of work we ought to do ourselves.

He says further in his report that "during the last Congress over 2,000 claim bills were introduced and that only 250 of them became law." He regrets, seemingly, that only 250 of them passed. The taxpayers ought to rejoice over that fact. But he let the cat out of the bag during his argument as to another controlling purpose connected with this legislation. He was asked about the proposal to let General McCarl make reports to Congress on bills. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] asked him that question. He said that "General McCarl was a nuisance once in a while." Why? It is because General McCarl, as the Comptroller General of the United States, created by this Congress to protect the Treasury, has stood in the way of taking money out of the Treasury unlawfully through improper bills. He has become a nuisance.

He said that this bill would take about 1,000 bills away from objections here on the floor and put the bills where objections could not stop their passage. Another nuisance is where some Congressman may get up and object and stop a bad bill. Whenever such a Congressman objects and stops a bad bill, to the mind of my friend from Massachusetts, he is a nuisance.

By this bill he wants to confer exclusive jurisdiction on the head of every bureau of this Government to pass on claims up to $5,000. In one breath he says you can not trust the United States Senate to pass on that. He says that Senators pass them by courtesy, regardless of their merits, and in the next breath he tells you that we can trust the bureau chiefs to safeguard the rights of the taxpayers of this Nation. I have not that idea about either the Senate or the bureau chiefs. I would rather trust a United States Senator under oath to the people and would rather trust a Representative under oath to the people and responsible to the people than I would a bureau chief.

I can remember when one night here about 11 or 12 o'clock I made an objection to a bill where naval officers, if you please, had bought a whole bunch of mahogany furniture for their homes and were trying to make the Government pay for it. They had bought numerous mahogany chiffoniers at $200 each and numerous mahogany chifferettes at $200 apiece. They bought a lot of $200 mahogany chairs for their homes and $200 mahogany tables and $200 mahogany bedsteads, and when Comptroller General McCarl held that it was without authority of law and turned it down they were asking the Congress to pay for it, and I blocked its passage and have kept it from passing ever since.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The gentleman will acknowledge that that report did not come, in the first place, from the Committee on Claims?

Mr. BLANTON. No; but it came from the Committee on Naval Affairs with a unanimous report, and I had to block its passage several different times.

Mr. UNDERHILL. And if he will read this bill he will find that those claims are excluded.

Mr. BLANTON. And we have never paid for all that expensive furniture yet and never will, but I want to tell you, gentlemen, what is coming to-morrow from the Committee on Appropriations in the Army bill. Our friend from Illinois MARTIN MADDEN has had too much to do. He can not look after everything. There is coming here in the Army bill to-morrow for you to vote for a little insignificant clause that looks innocent but which will authorize Army officers to do that very thing that we kept the naval officers from doing, and will permit Army officers to buy certain heavy pieces of the most expensive mahogany and rosewood furniture they can buy without any limitation as to cost, to use in furnishing their homes. It is in that Army bill that you are to consider here to-morrow.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I would not like to have that impression left standing without some explanation. If the gentleman will permit me, I would like to explain it.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sure that my friend in charge of this bill will give me more time and I shall yield to the gentleman from Illinois. I would like to know how it got by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not have to apologize for its getting by. I am for the provision. I will tell the gentleman what it means. It has been the policy of the Army when they are building new buildings to put in certain standard fixed utilities in the form of bedsteads and things of that sort, and ranges—gas ranges or whatever they may be.

Mr. BLANTON. They call it "heavy furniture," to try to get it by a point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. This provision is placed in the bill to prevent the necessity of Army officers moving that stuff when they are transferred from one place to another. When they move to a new place they find that sort of furniture there, to which they can add their own furniture. It is only for that purpose that this item is in the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. But it is to get the Government to buy for them their furniture. Wait and see how they will abuse it.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh no, they will not. It has always been watched.

Mr. BLANTON. But the gentleman does not deny that it is in the bill?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, it is in the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Where they can buy their beds and their chifferettes and ranges and heavy furniture with the public money of the people.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The gentleman will please confine himself to the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Do you know how much time Congress is in session every year? This year Congress will be in session about six months. This is the usual six-month session, and then Congress will be in vacation about six months.

Last year Congress was in session only three months, and then it was adjourned and in vacation from March 4 to December 5, 1927, nine months' vacation. Every other year we have a nine months' vacation. Do you not think we ought to work when we do come here? I have worked until past midnight over in my office many a night on these bills, not with the purpose of trying to defeat anybody's bills but to try to prevent the tax money of the people from being paid out wrongfully, and because I have worked myself nearly to death on these bills my friend from Massachusetts would say that a man who would do that work is a nuisance, because he stops some from passing.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Has "the gentleman from Massachusetts" ever criticized the gentleman from Texas when he desired time in which to study a bill? It is true a number of years have passed since the gentleman from Texas was a member of the Claims Committee.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, you said this bill would stop objections to claims. I will tell you what happened on that committee. I am an associate member of it now, and I have been an associate member of it since I have been here in Congress, because every bill you report out of that committee I get a report on, and I know what is in it when it comes up for passage. I remember when I was on that Committee on Claims there was a bill to pay the Sevier heirs $67,000,000 out of the Public Treasury. That claim was about 101 years old at that time. I found out that it was not a just or meritorious claim against the Government, but it was called up by a friend of the bill. There were lots of these Sevier heirs living in my State, and some living in the State of Tennessee, and some in Georgia. They had enough Congressmen and Senators interested to get it up, and, to my surprise, when I forced a vote on that bill in committee every single member of that committee voted in favor of the bill except myself, and the committee reported it out.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In a moment. I spent two weeks down in the department looking up the old records on this case, and if you will look into the records of the Committee on Claims—if you will examine the bound volume of adverse reports made by that committee—you will find my adverse report against that bill; and when that adverse report was read by the committee it convinced the members of that committee that it was not a good bill, and they voted with me against that bill; they voted to kill it.

Mr. LEAVITT. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. LEAVITT. I was interested in the gentleman's statement that we had nine months' vacation every other year. Did the gentleman ever take a nine months' vacation at the expense of the people?

Mr. BLANTON. No. I have spent practically all of every vacation I have had in 11 years in studying the departments of the Government and in finding out what they do with the money they get.

Mr. LEAVITT. Then it is not a vacation that the gentleman takes. No one of us takes a vacation.

Mr. BLANTON. But Congress is not in session, nevertheless. I will say this, that we ought to be willing to do the work that devolves upon us as Representatives of the people here with respect to the proper holding of the purse strings of the Treasury. I know what will be done here in these bureaus if this bill becomes a law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. In view of the fact that I am the only one speaking against this bill, will my colleague give me 10 additional minutes?

Mr. BOX. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. BLANTON. There is not a man here who appreciates more the splendid work of my colleague from Texas [Mr. Box] than I do. I appreciate the splendid work which he has done on this committee. For the work he has already done the people in his district ought to keep him here for the next 10 years. [Applause.] I will say that without equivocation.

Mr. LOZIER. In reference to the Sevier claim, which grew out of land transactions, is it not true that adverse reports were made against that bill almost constantly for the last 50 years?

Mr. BLANTON. I did not find them in the committee. I made my adverse report after I had dug up all the old records in the department.

Now, here is what my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] says:

> During the last Congress 356 tort claims were presented to the House, and only a small fraction of them became law.
> It was not until about eight or nine years ago that any tort claim was allowed. I remember the circumstance just as well as I remember anything at this moment—when the question came up as to what should be the policy of the committee and of this Government in regard to payments for torts—it had never been done except in rare instances by the Congress; it was a new departure. And I remember then that Member after Member called attention to it, and there were only a few at that time favorable to it; but finally there were enough to pass it.

Now, my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] says that the safeguarding clause in his bill is that after you put the claims up to these bureau chiefs and they allow the claims up to $5,000, or the compensation committee allows them up to $7,500, even then they have to run the gantlet of MARTIN MADDEN'S Appropriations Committee before they can get their money. That is his safeguarding clause. He wants Mr. MADDEN and his Appropriations Committee not only to do the work they are doing now, but he wants them also to take up the work of the Claims Committee in addition upon their shoulders. I say it is not right. I am a partisan Democrat and MARTIN MADDEN is one of those orthodox partisan Republicans, but I will repeat what I have said time and time again, that he is one of the most valuable men we have in this Government, and you do not want to work him to death.

He has not the time and neither has his committee to delve down under all these claims. Why, the Committee on Appropriations is supposed, whenever a claim has been allowed and becomes a fixed charge against the Government, to appropriate the money for it; and we have criticized them here for not doing it. You remember the criticism of our friend from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD] because it refused to bring in an appropriation for a claim that had become fixed and adjudicated. The criticism was general on the floor and was so strong that it forced the Committee on Appropriations to allow the money. Let me tell you that whenever a bureau chief decides a case you are going to find the Committee on Appropriations appropriating the money to pay it without quibble.

Let me show you another thing which Brother UNDERHILL says. He talks about his $1,000 act in 1922, and he says that up to March 4, 1925, "there have been settled under this act over 1,242 claims," and he says nobody has ever heard of any fraud or collusion. Where would you expect to hear that? What do bureau chiefs care about it? They will keep on settling these claims and you will never hear anything against them at all. The ordinary bureau chief—and I say this advisedly, some of them are my personal friends, but I would say it to them and I have said it to them—thinks that any money he can get out of the Treasury for any purpose is legitimate if he has the spending of it. What does he care about it? The ordinary Government bureau chief would like to see just as much money taken out of the Treasury and put into circulation as possible, and you never find them trying to cut down expenses, but continually find them trying to enlarge their bureau and get as much money out of the Treasury as possible. You know that is true.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Six years ago the Committee on Claims had over 200 bills before it for amounts of less than $75. If the bureau chiefs gave every one of those claims favorable consideration, it would have been cheaper than it would have been for Congress to adjudicate those 200 claims.

Mr. BLANTON. No. I would rather spend $1,000 of the people's money to prevent some fellow from getting money that he is not entitled to than to pay him $100 to which he is not entitled.

Mr. UNDERHILL. So would I.

Mr. BLANTON. I would rather do that, and you pursue that course in your private business. When a man is trying to get you to pay him something you do not owe, you will spend five times the amount involved to keep him from getting it. That is good private business and ought to be the business of the Government. You will always find conscientious men like UNDERHILL, BULWINKLE, BOX, and the rest of these members of the Committee on Claims, who will pass on these claims in the Claims Committee. We have been doing pretty well during the history of this Government up to the present time. Why do we want to keep shifting our own responsibility?

If you pass this bill that Mr. UNDERHILL has drawn, raising the limit to claims of $5,000 that bureau chiefs may settle, and to $7,500 that the Compensation Commission may settle, and $10,000 to the blue sky as to the Court of Claims, it will not be much over a year before he will come in with another bill and he will double the ante. It will be $10,000 in the bureaus and $20,000 in the Court of Claims. He started with a limit of $1,000 in 1922, but, just like the poker player, pretty soon he gets reckless and wants to take the limit off. He has increased the ante now from $1,000 to $5,000, 500 per cent, and will be coming in here shortly with another bill to again increase it.

But what is the use of my wasting my breath? I know I can not stop the bill. I know there is no chance in the world of stopping it. Every one of you colleagues have these private claims. You do not like to have these nuisances around, like Comptroller General McCarl, to interfere with them. You do not like for BLACK of Texas, BLANTON, and Box to object to them. You want them to go through Congress without any objection. You want them to go through in one breath so that they may be passed in a quarter of a minute.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. Does the gentleman think the doctrine of respondeat superior ought to apply to the Government in tort cases?

Mr. BLANTON. I will let my layman friend from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL], who has covered the entire doctrine of contributory negligence in this bill, answer that.

Mr. PERKINS. He says it should.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I will simply say that the clause with reference to contributory negligence was placed in the bill because it referred particularly to the employees' compensation act, under which contributory negligence is not considered in any way, shape, or manner. There is another statement I would like to challenge. The Comptroller General has absolutely nothing to do with bills that come out of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BLANTON. I know that.

The UNDERHILL. The only nuisance he is is in some of the decisions he hands down, which are so far fetched as to cause us so much trouble in the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BLANTON. If you were to go to Secretary Wilbur to-day you would find he would agree with Brother UNDERHILL—that Comptroller General McCarl is a nuisance. Every other Secretary and every other bureau chief would agree he is a nuisance because he stands in their way. He stops them from spending money unlawfully.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE].

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry I have been so disillusioned to-day. I had the idea that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] was working all during the year, but here I find that last year he took nine months vacation and is contemplating six months more this year.

Mr. BLANTON. My colleague does not want to misinterpret what I said. I said just the contrary, that I have spent practically all of every vacation every year for 11 years working here in Washington, checking up the various Government bureaus.

Mr. BULWINKLE. The gentleman said that Members of Congress took nine months' vacation last year and would have six months this year, and I assume that the gentleman was speaking from his own personal experience.

Mr. BLANTON. I said we were not in session during that time.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I took it the gentleman was not speaking from the experience of other Members of the House, but from his own.

I am in favor of this bill. I have been on this committee, now, for seven years. I have seen the Members of the House come to the different members of the committee asking them to see to it that some meritorious claim bill was reported from the committee.

There were 2,000 bills last session and there are nearly 1,000 already this session, many of them with merit, some of them without; but it is not just and it is not fair to the citizens of this country that all their hope in being reimbursed or in receiving damages to which they are entitled shall be left to the committee and to the House.

Consider what happens on the floor of the House. You who have been here at night when we have had night sessions know that one objection defeats a bill. No matter how long a member of the committee may have worked upon that claim, no matter how much he may have studied it, yet perchance some one comes along who possibly has never seen it before and rises and says, "Mr. Speaker, I object," and that is the end of it.

Oh, there are a number of these cases. We are bringing them out now, cases in which people are hurt, school-teachers and people in all occupations of life, through the negligence of some of the Government employees.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The committee reporting out this bill goes beyond negligence and includes, as the gentleman will see on page 1, line 8, and page 2, line 2, not only negligence but wrongful acts or omissions.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Now, wrongful act does not necessarily involve negligence, neither does omission.

Mr. BULWINKLE. That is true.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Under the act where you make the Government liable for injury to private property not in excess of $1,000, you specifically state, "Caused by negligence of an officer or employee."

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. You expand in this bill beyond what you went under this limited liability of $1,000 to private property.

Mr. BULWINKLE. We do.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Now, what is your reason for it?

Mr. BULWINKLE. The reason for it is in order that these meritorious cases, whether they arise from negligence, wrongful acts, or wrongful omissions of any of the agents of the Government shall be settled or shall be adjudicated by some one instead of waiting from year to year on Congress.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. In answer to the gentleman's suggestion, in order that the Government be held liable for the negligence, wrongful act, or omission of any officer or employee of the Government, he must be acting within the scope of his office or employment.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Within the scope of his authority; yes.

Mr. LOZIER. And that is a limitation upon the liability of the Government.

Mr. RAMSEYER. He might be down there along the Mississippi building dikes, and by the building of the dike controlling the waters to prevent floods, might roll the waters on lands that had not been subject to overflow before, thus making the Government liable to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I do not agree with the gentleman from Iowa. I do not think the gentleman need feel that way about it. I do not see how this could involve the Government in hundreds of millions of dollars. I think the gentleman is going just a little too far in that statement.

I know, gentlemen, that, so far as the bill is concerned, possibly, it is not all that we could desire, but I do know that it is the other class in this country that has got to be considered. While we are considering the Government, we have got to consider the people who make up the Government.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Does the gentleman not realize that by throwing down the bars to all kinds of suits sounding in tort that damages might be piled up which might even threaten sovereignty itself. That is the purpose of the rule we have heretofore followed that the sovereign could not be sued in cases sounding in tort. We have established the Court of Claims to entertain claims against the Government founded upon contracts, and then we expanded that in 1922 to injury to private property up to $1,000, but this is the first time we have ever undertaken to give the sovereign's consent to be sued for cases sounding in tort, and being a new adventure, does not the gentleman think, and do not the members of the committee think, that we should possibly limit the amount to which the Government can be held liable in suits against itself in cases of tort?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Possibly so.

Mr. RAMSEYER. It is the little cases that have annoyed the gentleman's committee, not the large cases like the Doheny case. The chairman may have been a little unfortunate in his illustration of the Doheny case. I take it that the committee did not have it in mind making it possible for the Doheny case to come within this bill.

Mr. BULWINKLE. No; I think the gentleman and I will have our wings sprouted before that bill passes this House.

Mr. LOZIER. This involves the doctrine of the liability of the principal for the wrongful acts of his agent, because it is only when the agent is acting within the scope of his employment that the principal is liable. This bill by its specific terms does not make the Government liable for all negligent acts, but only for negligent acts within the scope of the employment. It is the application of the ancient rule in reference to the liability of the principal for the wrongful act of his agent in suits against the Government for negligence of its employees.

Mr. RAMSEYER. If you throw down the bars you might make the sovereign, which in this country is the people, liable not only for hundreds of millions but billions of dollars, which might threaten the life of the sovereign and the very existence of the Government.

Mr. LOZIER. The doctrine that the sovereign can not be sued, that the king can do no wrong, had its origin in the period of the world's history when the sovereign was not engaged in business or private activities. Under the present system in vogue in the United States the Government activity reaches every branch of private business. You can not go down the street one block without coming in contact with some truck or some instrumentality of the Government.

There is no reason why the doctrine that the Government can not be held liable for the tort of its agents should prevail now, because of the fact that the Government is engaged in private business activity to such an extent that it is in a position to cause tremendous injury and damages as a result of the wanton or wrongful acts of its employees.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The statement that there was a time when the sovereign was not engaged in business or private activities is, I think, historically inaccurate.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. The rule was not correctly stated when it was said that when a claim is up one objection will stop it, because the next time it will take three objections to stop it. Even when there are three objections, on a regular claim day it can be called up in its own right and then it takes a majority here to stop it.

Now, I want to ask the gentleman a question. Is it not a fact that we have already had four claim days in less than two months of the session?

Mr. BULWINKLE. In the last session, in the second session of the Sixty-ninth Congress we had one claim day, and that was all. In the first session of the Sixty-ninth Congress my recollection is that we didn't have a single claim day and had to have consideration at night.

Mr. UNDERHILL. And the gentleman might add to that that there was placed on the calendar, before the committee had had a solitary claim bill passed, over 160 bills.

Mr. MacGREGOR. In answer to the statement of the gentleman from Iowa that we would be submerged by the amount of claims and lose our sovereignty it may be said that cases have to come to Congress for the appropriation.

Mr. BULWINKLE. They do, and I may say that when the gentleman from Texas speaks about the increased work that we are putting on the Appropriations Committee I wonder if these matters would not go to the Committee on Expenditures, the new committee that we created at this session of Congress?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. If the gentleman will yield, I have looked at the rule creating that committee. That committee would not have jurisdiction under the terms of the rule. Of course, it would be possible to give it jurisdiction.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I will.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In reference to the suggestion made by the gentlemen, is it contemplated under the terms of this bill that when a departmental head passes on a claim and recommends an appropriation and it goes to the Appropriations Committee, that that committee or any other committee to which it may be properly referred are to make a de novo investigation of the merits of the claim, or is it contemplated that they can make it automatically?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I do not think that was the intention of the committee. If there is anything that should arise after the bureau chiefs, after the department head has investigated the claim, if there is any reason why they should not be paid, then I can see why we can call it to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I am rather in accord with the view that the gentleman has intimated, that at some stage in the enactment of this legislation it might very well be provided that the matters, after being passed on originally, shall be put within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Expenditures, for the reason that that committee is supposed to have a very large outlook upon the expenditures being made in all of the departments and all of the agencies of the Government. It will be a committee doing its work, supposedly, in a very comprehensive way, and the objection made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], based upon the ground that the Committee on Appropriations is now too much encumbered with work, would be met.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. In a moment. Much has been said about shifting authority. We have done that. We may as well admit it. There is no question about it. However, unless you increase the Committee on Claims, and unless you guarantee one or two days a week for the consideration of claims, no Congress could possibly consider 50 per cent of the claim bills that are introduced. I refer now to the meritorious claims.

Mr. UNDERHILL. And, in addition to that, if we do provide in this bill or any other that these matters should be referred back to the Committee on Claims, then the same procedure that we have to go through now we would have to go through then, whereas the Committee on Appropriations makes the appropriation and that is the end of it.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes. I now yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. GARBER. Does subsection (b) give exclusive jurisdiction to the department or head of the establishment to determine primarily all claims up to $5,000?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I would say that it does.

Mr. GARBER. Does it fix the jurisdiction of the several departments?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Up to $5,000; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has again expired.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. GARBER. The need for an additional agency to determine these claims is universally recognized. The responsibility is on the Government to afford a fair and impartial tribunal to hear and determine these claims.

Mr. BULWINKLE. That is correct.

Mr. GARBER. I now ask the gentleman a question as a lawyer and as a judge. Take a department head, who is under the pressure of the Budget to keep his record down to the lowest possible expenditure and to keep the record of his department free from negligence or malfeasance in office. Does the gentleman think that a tribunal such as the bill sets up is such an impartial tribunal as could weigh and determine fairly and impartially a claim under the circumstances?

Mr. BULWINKLE. The gentleman does not realize yet how these bills are reported out of the committee. Since the Sixty-seventh Congress, when I came here, I do not know of a single claim that has not been referred to a department and that the department has not referred to the Director of the Budget. It has come back here to the committee every time in that way. Of course, the chairman is loath to take these bills up that have an adverse report from the Director of the Budget or a department head, but that has been the system all along. We are still doing that.

Mr. SMITH. Do I understand from the gentleman that it is the function of the Director of the Budget to pass upon the merits of a claim?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Evidently so, because only last year when the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] had a claim for $195 for loss of tools that belonged to a carpenter in a fire, the matter went to the Director of the Budget. These were the tools of the carpenter, when he should have been using those of the Government. The officer in charge asked him to bring his own tools. That night lightning struck the house where the carpenter was working and his tools were burned up. The claim was referred to the Director of the Budget and he said that it did not meet with the financial program of the President.

Mr. SMITH. What became of the bill?

Mr. BOX. The gentleman does not mean to have the House to understand that that report was binding upon the House?

Mr. SMITH. What did the committee do with the bill?

Mr. BULWINKLE. It reported it out and the House passed it.

Mr. UNDERHILL. It passed it at this session of Congress.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. And this bill does not prevent the claim being brought to the Committee on Claims, even if the bureau chief should deny it, does it?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I do not think it prevents it at all, but I think this, that if I were the chairman of the committee, I would be a little loath after the department turned it down to take it up.

Mr. GARBER. Is not the language of section (b) "exclusive"?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes; in so far as I have already stated.

Mr. GARBER. Then that is the answer to the gentleman's question. This gives exclusive jurisdiction to the department.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Does the gentleman think that is exclusive on Congress?

Mr. GARBER. It gives exclusive jurisdiction to these departments who are trying all the time to keep down their expenditures. The idea of the whole proposition is shocking and revolting to the judicial conscience of every lawyer, and the gentleman knows that.

Mr. UNDERHILL. That does nothing of the sort.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Then what does this language mean on page 2, line 6—exclusive jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the head of each department and establishment acting on behalf of the Government to consider, ascertain, adjust, and determine any claim, liability for which is recognized under this section, if the amount of the claim does not exceed $5,000.

Mr. BULWINKLE. That is correct. The same is true now up to $1,000.

Mr. McDUFFIE. What does that language mean if it does not mean that you are giving exclusive authority to the departments?

Mr. BULWINKLE. You are giving authority to the department to find it. There is no question about it. But that does not preclude you from introducing a bill into the Houe.

Mr. McDUFFIE. But it precludes you from getting an action on it, for this reason: The committee will instantly say, "This authority has decided it." You will have shifted your responsibility to the department.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. The general pension law vests with the Pension Bureau the authority to pass upon pension claims, but it does not preclude Congress from exercising its sovereign power and passing private bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. BOX. I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Fear has been expressed as to suits being brought against the Government. I want to say to the membership of the House that the Cherokee Nation, which is one of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma, permitted itself to be sued, just as one individual sues another; and in a period of 50 years I do not believe there were two dozen successful suits brought against the Cherokee Tribe. For one I believe that would be a wholesome Federal law. I believe that the Government of the United States and the government of every State in the Union ought to permit itself to be sued like an individual.

And while I am on my feet, with the permission of the gentleman from North Carolina, I must say that I believe that where there is a just claim against the Government, we should not only allow the claim but allow reasonable interest from the time the claim was presented.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has again expired.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Again I say that I shall support the bill.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee. I opposed this bill in the last Congress. I had not studied it thoroughly, and I felt then it was delegating a power and right to a bureau or head of a department that should not be relinquished by Congress; and if I should offer any criticism against the measure to-day, I would say that I coincide with the views of a great Texan heretofore expressed, and, as a member of the committee, I would emphatically express the view of that great lawyer and statesman, a splendid former governor, that patriot and efficient former Congressman, father of my friend, FRITZ G. LANHAM, my colleague of my State, the Hon. S. W. T. Lanham, who, when he was a member of the Committee on Claims of this House, objected to leaving the decision entirely to the judge on the bench. I would rather trust 12 good and lawful citizens to determine the equities and the rights of the citizens as between the citizen and its sovereign, than to leave it to some judge solely; and I have great respect for the integrity of the judiciary of my State and Nation as a whole.

And I want to say that at one time, for a few minutes or a few months, I donned a judicial ermine myself, and for a "good lawyer" I had a remarkable record, which, of course, I admit, so no need to take any testimony on this score. [Laughter.] In the cases appealed from my court I had 100 per cent reversals. [Laughter.] Only one case, however, was appealed, and it was promptly reversed and remanded, and the appellate court almost rendered judgment in same. [Laughter.]

I would rather trust the jury than trust it to the court; but I am overruled by my Committee on Claims in this contention.

Now, I want to say to my colleague from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], who is opposing this measure, that I am somewhat surprised as to his attitude. Out of the 3,000 bills that are introduced and referred to the Committee on Claims, it is a physical impossibility for that committee to consider one-fourth of them in a single session. Now, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] a few minutes ago, in naming over some of the gentlemen on this committee who stood like the rock of Gibraltar and protected the Government, namely, the chairman, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box], and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE], overlooked one of the "watchdogs of the Treasury."

I myself am on the committee; also the splendid refined Congresswoman from Kentucky [Mrs. LANGLEY] is a member, and she is there at every session, and I want to say in her behalf that she studies every measure referred to her and others that come before that committee, and makes a just and intelligent report to the ones referred to her for consideration, just as do the other splendid and patriotic gentlemen comprising the membership of that great Committee on Claims. Probably the gentleman from Texas does not know of the great service we are all trying to render our Government and our constituents on this Committee on Claims. I observe the new Members of Congress on this committee work just as hard and as zealously in trying to protect our Government as some of us older ones.

I want to suggest to my colleague from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] an illustration. Suppose old Mr. Tom Scroggins, who resides at Buffalo Gap, in Taylor County, goes from his home over to the city of Abilene, the city where my colleague lives. Suppose Mr. Scroggins goes over there with a load of cotton, disposes of his cotton, and proceeds to walk up and down the beautiful paved streets of the gentleman's city, probably after he has paid a note or two at the bank, purchased a "linsey-woolsey" dress for his faithful wife Anna Melindy—it being just before Christmas—interviewed old Santy in the shape of dolls for the little girls, firecrackers and popguns for the boys, and in crossing the street to get a "Henry Clay" pipe and a "slug" of "natural leaf" for himself—along comes one of these Army officers with a hired chauffeur, said officer having a little too much of the "oil of joy" aboard for safe-and-sane driving, and runs over poor Uncle Tom and kills him, Mr. Scroggins leaving a wife and a prolific family of nine children. Now, if they brought the case before this committee under the rules of precedents established before I became a member, the utmost the family would get is $5,000. But you have a Federal court in Abilene, and the widow and children, under the terms of this bill, could go into that court and recover $10,000, if they could establish their claim. I am surprised at my colleague from Texas opposing a bill of this character.

If he lost a limb he could recover $10,000, it would be just as much to him and his family, just as important to them in recovering damages in a Federal court, where they could go without incurring very much expense, and it would mean as much and more as it meant to the gentleman to whom we gave, as I recall now, a large sum for that spoiled bacon, or what he claimed was spoiled, on account of some default of the Government. It came from this committee and this House passed it. Now, I may be mistaken as to its being bacon, but it was some kind of perishable goods. If I am mistaken as to the bacon matter, I do remember we gave some firm quite a sum last session on account of the feelings of a certain lot of oysters, situated in an oyster bed, being wounded by some governmental agency, and I may have voted for it; but I am still for Uncle Tom and all his kind, when our Government or its agencies carelessly or at fault injures him—giving just recompense, nevertheless, and our Government when at fault should be required to make speedy restitution to its citizens.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I would be willing to submit all of these claims to a court for judicial determination. But rather than have bureau chiefs to decide them, I would rather leave it to the legal judgment and sense of fairness and generosity of my friend from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH], a member of the committee.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I would do my best to give his constituent a square deal. But the committee has ruled not to give more than $5,000 for the loss of a life; but under this bill an injured person or his heirs, in case of death, can go into a court in the State or district where the injury occurred and recover as much as $10,000. The gentleman knows we can not consider all of the meritorious bills that come before the Committee on Claims. Why, gentlemen, the chairman apportions two bills to each member of the committee every Friday, to be reported upon the following Friday, and last Friday at our regular session, I will state to my colleague from Texas, we were in session over three hours before all had reported.

Now, this measure does not deprive a citizen of any of his rights. I am opposed to these bureaucrats and all that, but I do want citizens to have accorded to them the same rights the Government takes. I want him to have every possible right if he is injured by the Government. I do not believe in the doctrine "that the king can do no wrong." I think he can do as much wrong as the citizen; but, thank God, we have no king in this country—but a sovereign—and if the citizen is injured through fault of the sovereign, the citizen ought to have a speedy trial. He should be able to go to a forum and prove his claim without any very great expense.

If you would ask me what I would do I would cut out of this bill the provision providing for the payment of attorneys to represent claimants before Congress. I would not give him one cent. A Congressman can take care of such a claim without a cent of cost to a citizen—the Government pays us for all this work—and I would cut these attorneys out of the bill entirely. [Applause]. I am a lawyer and I hold my profession in the highest esteem. A Congressman really does the work, or practically all, and a lawyer in many instances gets too much of the money allowed. You know that, every one of you, and I would cut them out almost if not entirely. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. I would gladly send them all to a court and have the cases properly adjudicated, but I would not submit them to these bureau chiefs for determination.

Mr. HUDSPETH. This Claims Committee can not properly take cognizance of every case and go into every claim, I will state to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. Then let us send them all to a court to be decided.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The bill does not deprive them of that right. It gives them the right to go into court, and if they are not then satisfied they can come back to this committee and have the committee consider and pass upon their claims. If I am wrong in that I want to be corrected by some one. Give every claimant a chance whether his claim is $50 or $50,000, or whether he resides in New York, Texas, Minnesota, or Oregon. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the committee, your committee recognizes that this legislation goes further than the National Congress has ever gone in this direction. There have been efforts to provide remedies of this kind made during the last 50 and perhaps 75 years. The Members of the two bodies of Congress have time and again shied at the proposition. They dislike to see this power delegated to other authorities.

Mr. GILBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. I yield.

Mr. GILBERT. I want to ask a question that goes to the fundamentals and one which carries out the thought of the gentleman from Oklahoma. We are sympathetic with this effort for a citizen to have a fair trial of his case, however small it may be; but these department heads are executives and administratives. Would it not be better to create a tribunal that was more judicial and let the citizen have the same rights as he would have in a court? These bureau heads are not judges.

Mr. BOX. The gentleman suggests a pertinent question. However, your committee studied that question. I know this member of the committee did, and I found, and I think the other members of the committee found, no adequate way of dealing with it outside of the departments.

The thing, gentlemen, that prompts this legislation has been presented to you, but I doubt whether any Member of the House who has not been on that committee and seen the vast amount of claim business that is not receiving consideration, and the number of just claims never considered, can fully appreciate the necessity for some such action as this. A man has to see that in order to realize that with the expansion of the country and its business, and the accumulation of this great volume of just claims, that some provision has to be made.

The committee has been referred to as being annoyed by this business. The thing that has annoyed me in this connection is not the amount of work required. I am glad to do all I can. The thing that has annoyed and humiliated me is the fact that the Government of the United States is not dealing justly with claimants.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. Does the gentleman consider that the Government is dealing justly with its claimants when it refuses to give to the claimants an impartial tribunal to determine their claims?

Mr. BOX. The gentleman refers to the clause he quoted a moment ago. I think some happier phrase could have been used in that connection. However, I am sure it is not contemplated by the committee or by the Congress that a man having a just claim shall not have further consideration if it has not been fairly considered on its merits by a department.

Mr. GARBER. Then the word "exclusive" should be stricken out.

Mr. BOX. I think that is a word which is somewhat unhappily used. If the gentleman will reflect a moment he will recall that your committee could not and you as a body could not deprive yourselves of the power to deal with these claims. If you did so, or undertook to do so in this act, to-morrow you would have the power to override it or repeal it in a particular act or in a general act. In other words, if that is your construction, it would nevertheless not be binding upon us to-morrow or upon our successors in succeeding Congresses.

Mr. GARBER. Assuming that those conditions are fully recognized, we will proceed upon the premise that your conditions are intolerable and absolutely against all human performance; yet does that excuse the act of affording a prejudiced tribunal to hear, pass upon, and determine claims against itself? What would be the procedure in determining claims, say, as to an official appointed by a department head who is guilty of neglect and where damage has been caused?

Here is your witness, your material witness, testifying before your department head, who is interested in keeping down the expenses of his department and making a record for himself. Why, it is quite apparent, as I said before.

Mr. BOX. The gentleman sees just one side of it, may I suggest. It has already been argued on this floor that the bureau heads do not see the Government's side of it at all and that we are simply opening the door of the Treasury for all sorts of raids. I think it is not fair to assume that the departments will be unjust. I do not believe it is fair to assume they will be prejudiced. We have to have them engaged in the administration of nearly all of the laws that we make here. The head of an executive department possibly has a different viewpoint from ours, but we have no right to assume that another and coordinate branch of the Government will be less just than we are. We may have our private opinion about it, but in the spirit of teamwork, in view of the fact we are not able to pass on all these claims in a manner and to an extent that is commensurate with the obligation of the country, we must provide some remedy, and it seemed to the committee that these gentlemen whom we trust with the administration of these important affairs will, as a whole and on the average, come as near doing right as anyone else.

Then we provide that the evidence that they hear, with the conclusions they reach—the claim, the evidence, and the conclusions—shall come, not before the Appropriations Committee but before Congress, and there be considered by whatever committee Congress may designate now or hereafter for this work.

Mr. HUDSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HUDSON. I appreciate the work of the committee and what they are doing and in general favor the proposed legislation, but I am wondering if the committee and the gentleman, as a member of the committee, would not be willing to amend the legislation by striking out, at line 6, page 2, the word "exclusive"; and then again, in section 202, page 7, line 16, the word "exclusive" there, in order to overcome in a measure the very thing which the gentleman from Oklahoma has been speaking of, that these claimants would not feel they had a chance to bring their claims before a committee of Congress.

Mr. BOX. I have no authority to make any agreement for the committee, but I would say that the gentleman's objection has been made by other gentlemen on the floor and would have my serious consideration. If it appeared that this seemed to go further than we have power to go, or further than we ought to go as a matter of right, then I would vote for an amendment to that effect. I am not committing myself now because I would want to consider its effect.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. I yield to the chairman of our committee.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Perhaps I can clarify the situation. The small claims act was written so that authority was vested in the heads of departments, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL], I think, was a member of the committee at that time and had some doubt as to the wording. I may be wrong about the gentleman who suggested it, but the word "exclusive" was put in that act so that no clerk, no underling, no one except the head of the department could be held responsible or could have this authority. It does not in any way, shape, or manner interfere with the rights of the petitioner, if he wants later to come to Congress.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Does not the word "exclusive" refer to the authority rather than to the man passing on it?

Mr. UNDERHILL. We have to have some one who has authority and who is responsible. We could not leave it to a clerk or to a secretary or some one of that sort. We had to leave it to the head of the department.

Mr. BANKHEAD and Mr. HUDSON rose.

Mr. BOX. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama and then shall yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BANKHEAD. This is a rather important matter to clear up.

Mr. HUDSON. I thought I had the floor.

Mr. BOX. I will next yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is rather important, I think, for some of us who are in doubt about some features of the bill to get this particular matter cleared up, now that we have it under discussion. What was the view of the committee itself, I will ask the chairman, with reference to what you had in mind in reporting this bill with respect to this phase of the matter?

Mr. UNDERHILL. The question did not arise, because the same wording was used in the original small claims act. This question never has arisen in the committee and until this afternoon has not arisen here. It was not the purpose of the author of the small claims act—if I may claim to be the author—and it was not written in the first draft of the small claims act, but it was on the insistence of the committee at that time that the word "exclusive" was written in there.

Mr. BOX. I now yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HUDSON. I was interested in the reply or the explanation of the gentleman from Massachusetts as to the use of the word "exclusive." The gentleman says it is to give authority to the head of the department. Would not this authority be given to the head of the department under this bill if we left out the word "exclusive"?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes; but it could be construed so as to give such authority to some one under the head of the department.

Mr. HUDSON. That would be a rather curious construction of the law, it seems to me. As these two sections are now written, it seems to me that what the committee wants to establish in the eyes of the claimant is that his only right is before the head of the department or the commission, and that he can not come to the Congress for relief; and if that is true, I think it is a bad proposition.

Mr. UNDERHILL and Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee rose.

Mr. BOX. I yield first to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. UNDERHILL. May I once more emphasize the fact that the purpose was not to exclude any of the rights that the individual had. The gentleman knows, for instance, if he writes to a department, unless he goes personally and makes an appointment with the head of the department, some clerk takes the matter up and the reply is not satisfactory. Consequently, it was felt by those who knew more about it than I do, and who had had a longer experience than I had had, that the word "exclusive" should be put in here so that the head of the department would be the one to adjudicate the claim.

Mr. HUDSON. Does the gentleman think that this will keep clerks from doing the work?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. BOX. I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It seems to me, at present at least, that the word "exclusive" ought to remain in the bill. The only tribunal that would deal with them would be Congress and by using the word "exclusive" you could not prevent Congress from having jurisdiction, because we can not bind our successors. It seems to me that it ought to be definitely understood, if we are proceeding upon the assumption that this legislation is correct legislation, that it ought to be definitely understood that that is where they will go and not to Congress.

Mr. BOX. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion. Congress could not exclude itself. By this language this function is simply confined to each department and to the head of that department. This is placing it in the hands of a definitely designated authority.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Has Congress the power to exclude the court? You say in section 7 that no suit upon any claim shall be brought under section 4 or 5 if the claim has been determined by the head of any department or establishment under section 1. Suppose I have a constituent who is selling envelopes to the Post Office Department and that department declines to pay for them?

Mr. BOX. That would be an action of contract or implied contract.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But you provide that the department can finally determine that matter?

Mr. BOX. Does the gentleman think that that kind of an action could be brought under this act?

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is a claim and a wrongful action can come in under a contract as well as a tort. How can you deny the right of a claimant to protect his right by a judicial review?

Mr. UNDERHILL. The gentleman does not have that right now.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Have I not the right under a contract?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Oh, I thought the gentleman was referring to a tort?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Perhaps we misunderstand each other. The point I make is this: If you confer jurisdiction upon an executive officer to determine a claim, whether arising out of contact or tort, must there not be given the right of a judicial review of the action of such an executive officer?

Mr. BOX. If this covers such an action it is not so contemplated by the committee.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I thought it might not be, but I wanted to see if it was.

Mr. ROMJUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. I will.

Mr. ROMJUE. Regarding the word "exclusive," it was suggested that it should be left in the bill on the ground that the claimant's claim should go to the head of the bureau. As a matter of fact this does not exclude the applicant from coming to Congress.

Mr. BOX. I think not, if Congress sees fit to take jurisdiction. I want to say that I believe after the passage of this act it will be more difficult to get consideration by the committee and by Congress of a claim rejected by the head of a department.

Mr. ROMJUE. Under the law at the present time a claimant can not go into court without getting permission of Congress—is that true?

Mr. BOX. It is.

Mr. STOBBS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. STOBBS. What proportion of the cases coming before the Claims Committee exceeds in amount the sum of $10,000?

Mr. BOX. I would be unable to answer that except to say there are a great many.

Mr. STOBBS. Is not the greater number of claims less than $10,000?

Mr. BOX. I think so, but that is a wild guess.

Mr. STOBBS. This legislation is radical in that the sovereignty is actually giving up its right to refuse to be sued or in allowing itself to be sued.

Mr. BOX. Within the strict limits designated.

Mr. STOBBS. There is absolutely no limit as to any claim that may be brought before the Court of Claims under this bill.

Mr. BOX. I can not agree to that proposition.

Mr. UNDERHILL. There is no limit placed on the amount for which the Government can sue one of its subjects.

Mr. STOBBS. The theory is entirely different.

Mr. UNDERHILL. What is justice for the sovereign ought to be justice for the subject.

Mr. STOBBS. I am heartily in sympathy with this bill to relieve the intolerable conditions before the Claims Committee, but it seems to me that when you provide that any citizen of the country may bring a suit against the United States without restrictions as to the amount, you are taking a step that is extremely radical; whereas if you had placed a limit on it and let the claim come back to Congress you would have answered the purpose.

Mr. UNDERHILL. A thousand times it has been asked me by Members of the House and members of the legal fraternity, "Don't you trust your courts?" I will answer the gentleman the same way.

Mr. STOBBS. You are turning it over to the Court of Claims.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. With reference to the word "exclusive" on page 2, whereby the exclusive authority is supposed to be conferred upon the head of departments, does not the gentleman believe that if the word "exclusive" was transposed so that that line would read "authority is hereby conferred exclusively upon the head of each department," and so forth, that that would clarify this authority?

Mr. BOX. That might improve the language of the bill.

Mr. PEERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. PEERY. Is it contemplated under section 1 to authorize the payment of a claim on account of damages to or loss of property unless negligence is established upon the part of the employee of the Government?

Mr. BOX. As I understand it, and as I think the committee understands it, the doctrine of mitigation of damages, by the showing of contributory negligence on the part of the claimant, enters into it. I think that is in line with the later and more enlightened legislation in many of the States. In my own State formerly we had the rule that a man could recover damages for injury on account of the negligence of another provided his own negligence did not contribute to his injury. That was an absolute bar, and I presented the defense many times. Later we modified that rule by saying that the negligence of the party injured could be considered in mitigation of the damages. That is the purpose of the committee in inserting that provision.

Mr. PEERY. I understand the second clause to which the gentleman has addressed himself, but my question is this: Is it intended to authorize the payment of a claim unless negligence is established upon the part of the employee of the Government?

Mr. BOX. I do not know that I get the gentleman's meaning, and it is probably my fault. If a claimant is injured by the wrong of the Government, through the negligence of the Government, I doubt if there was intended to be any distinction used as between those words, though "wrongful" seems to be more inclusive than "negligent." If he was injured by some wrong of the Government, which would make the Government legally or morally responsible, by some act which in the light of circumstances attending could be expected to produce some such injury, then the claimant would have the right to present his claim; and if it was shown that he had contributed to his own injury, that would reduce the damage; but I do not understand that it allows a claim where there was no wrong, which, with reference to the circumstances and results, had no relation to the injury.

Mr. PEERY. You can not recover against a private individual in the courts unless negligence is established. Why should you extend this as against the Government? In other words, why, after using the word "negligence," do you use the words "or wrongful act or omission"?

Mr. BOX. The gentleman from Texas considers that as meaning substantially negligence.

Mr. PEERY. Why not stop with the use of the word "negligence"?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. One of the most dangerous features of the bill is that it takes from the Comptroller General the right to pass on all claims against the Government up to $5,000. For instance, there are many claims from the Navy Department that the Comptroller General has been turning down, and the Secretary of the Navy has been criticizing him about it and he wants to have them paid. The Secretary would simply order that they be paid. So also would the War Department and the Interior Department, and with every other department of the Government. You are absolutely clipping the wings of the Comptroller General of the United States.

Mr. BOX. We are taking from the Comptroller General no power he now has. The views of the Comptroller General were thoroughly presented to your committee during the previous Congress. A subcommittee, composed of three of the attorneys of the committee—and I had the honor to be one of them, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. VINCENT] was another member—I think the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE] was another—sat and went most carefully into the suggestions that the Comptroller General had to make. No one of the members of that committee, so far as I could see, had any prejudice against the attitude of the Comptroller General. Most of us believed, and I believe now that the Comptroller General is a most useful and efficient public servant, but we reached the conclusion that such legislation, for instance, as my colleague from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] presented, was unnecessary and that this legislation would take care of the right of these claims and protect the right of the Government.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. Some of us are concerned about many claims that have been unfavorably reported by certain heads of the departments. We want to be sure that there will be somewhere that we may go without prejudice. We are glad to have it said that Congress can not exclude itself, that we can still file a bill for our constituents, and I, for one, want this Committee on Claims, each and every one, to say not that it will be difficult for these people to have their claims presented to that committee, but that these claims can be presented to your committee without prejudice.

Mr. BOX. The gentleman from Texas can speak only as to what his attitude will be during his brief time on that committee. It is true now that an adverse report by a department carries great weight with the committee, and while I think sometimes we go too far in that direction, yet as a general policy I think that is correct. As long as you have responsible, competent men on that committee, whenever it is shown that one of these departments has dealt unjustly with a claimant I believe there will be men enough on the committee who love justice and have some capacity to determine it, to adjudicate the facts and make such report as will enable Congress to do what its sense of justice prompts it to do.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Is it the intention of this bill that claims disposed of and settled by the departments shall have the same binding force upon the Committee on Appropriations as an act authorizing an appropriation or a decision by the Court of Claims?

Mr. BOX. I think not. I think the requirement here is that the claim must be reported, with the amount stated, and that the Appropriations Committee will then go over those facts and supervise the action of the department in a general way, and be able to report to this House.

We want that committee, or some other committee established by this House, to have the right to review the work done by these departments. Some of us are suspicious; sometimes, perhaps, we go too far. But we want to have either the Committee on Appropirations or some other committee to supervise this work and report to the House any abuse, and then either the committee or the House can correct the abuse.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I served for two years on the War Claims Committee, and the records will show that we reported and passed through the House here a number of bills in cases where the department had reported on them adversely. I have one bill now pending where an adverse report came from the Secretary of War, and this House nevertheless passed it.

Mr. BOX. We make mistakes, just as others do, but at the same time we try to do justice. This legislation may be subject to criticism. I do not claim that it is not. But any man who loves his country and his fellow men will feel sick when he sees the number of claims presented by lowly people not having political power and realizes that usually they can not be considered. If we had the power to present to you five times or ten times as many reports as we do, you would have to devote five or ten times the amount of time that you now devote to hearing them.

Reference was made a moment ago to the Members having great vacations for six or nine months. I know that with reference to the work of this committee I myself spent one whole summer, almost the entire summer, in making an investigation as thoroughly as I could of a group of great claims. My office here is open every business day, and at home I have an office, and I do not think it is quite fair to say of the Members of this House that they work only three months one year and nine months the next year. I am not boasting; I am not talking to my constituents now. I will talk to them when I get home; but I want to say that I work nearly every day in the year and I have not time enough to do all the work that comes upon me. I have not time enough to dispose of all that work.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I agree entirely with the statement that the gentleman has just made. Every Member of the House is busy practically every day of the year. I want to ask the gentleman about this language on page 3, line 7:

> No claim that, prior to the time of the passage of this act, has been rejected or reported on adversely by any court or department or establishment authorized to hear and determine the same shall be considered under this title.

Mr. BOX. Where is that?

Mr. McDUFFIE. On page 3, line 7. Some of us have bills pending for the settlement of claims on which some of the department heads have reported adversely. That means we wipe the slate clean, and all claims that have been reported upon adversely by some department are forever shut out and can not be considered under this bill. Under that you could not even present them. All they would have to do would be to present the language of this bill and say, "You are out of court." I do not want to have to regret in the future that I voted for this bill to-day.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I think the gentleman from Alabama omits the substance of this language:

No claim that, prior to the passage of this act, has been rejected or reported adversely by any court or department or establishment authorized to hear and determine the same shall be considered under this title.

That means that no claim previous to the passage of this act shall be allowed if it is reported adversely by the court. In other words, unless that language be in there, it would remove the statute of limitations on thousands and thousands of cases that arise under the tax laws, the income tax laws, and the revenue laws. It has to be in there if you are going to protect the Government in the statute of limitations. But it does not preclude the gentleman from coming to Congress with his bill at any time, no matter how far back the claim may have had its origin, and does not prevent the gentleman from receiving exactly the same treatment he would receive if this bill had never been written.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman who has the floor [Mr. Box] very frankly stated a moment ago that if this bill passes, you will have a very difficult time to get consideration of a bill presented to Congress in the future.

Mr. BOX. That is only the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I have great faith in the gentleman. He is inclined to speak his own mind, and I follow him because of that fact.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I imagine that the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box] had reference largely to cases that would arise after the passage of this act. These cases that are now before Congress and have been presented to Congress and which have been precluded by the passage of this act—certainly on these we would have consideration from Congress. If we shut off the tribunal that we are establishing from the consideration of it, I should think that the Congress would lend a very sympathetic ear to it.

Mr. BOX. In this connection I want to remark about the work of these departments. I hold no brief for them except that they represent my Government, and they are helping to carry on.

I have read a great many of their reports, favorable and adverse. They sometimes make mistakes, but they are usually right. We have to pass these responsibilities on to somebody else, not because they annoy us but because you and your constituents are entitled to a tribunal; you are entitled to a hearing, and you are not getting it now. The claimants have not been getting it for these 60 years, and so we had to find some method of getting an adjudication of these cases. And, after all, I would rather risk the departments in performing the duties marked out here than to risk anybody else, especially when they are subjected to the checks and right of review that are reserved to Congress.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If we pass this bill conferring exclusive jurisdiction in the manner indicated, before Congress could reassume jurisdiction over any of these claims it would have to pass another bill setting aside that provision.

Mr. BOX. The first act of Congress inconsistent with it would be setting it aside in that case.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, I doubt it.

Mr. GILBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. GILBERT. The gentleman and the committee have done a great work, and I am going to gladly support the bill; but it has occurred to me that a claimant is not only entitled to a trial but he is entitled to a trial before an able and impartial tribunal. That being so, why would it not have been well to give concurrent jurisdiction to the district courts, so that a man who had a claim against the Government, instead of coming to Washington, if he saw fit, could litigate it at home in the district courts?

Mr. BOX. With reference to claims between $5,000 and $10,000 that is true in this bill.

Mr. GILBERT. I did not know that.

Mr. BOX. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 8269) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JONES, Mr. WARREN, Mr. SMOOT, Mr. BORAH, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. HARRIS to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The committee resumed its session.

SETTLEMENT OF CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I will try to clear up some of the questions that have been raised. The one that seems to give the most concern to some of our Members is the clause which gives jurisdiction to the departments up to $5,000. On one side one Member protested against that, because he says the departments are going to be prodigal, and while he did not say so he intimated they were going to be crooked and that they were not going to do the right thing in regard to the Government, because they would make excessive awards to claimants. Then a gentleman on this side of the aisle rails at the departments and says they are going to be stingy; they are going to be narrow and are not going to give the claimants what they ought to have. The real facts of the matter are these: Suppose I had a claim against the Government for $3,000, and I took it to court, how much would I get of that $3,000 when I got through with the court, had paid my lawyer and paid all other expenses? The only purpose of making the limit $5,000 is to give the poor devil who can not hire a lawyer and who can not afford to go into court a chance for his white alley. That is perfectly simple and it is perfectly fair. A claim up to $5,000 is hardly worth taking into court when you have to pay the concurrent expenses. If the gentleman from Kentucky wants to introduce an amendment limiting the amount we will entertain it and leave it to the Members of the House as to whether they think a claimant, an ordinary, everyday taxpayer, should have to go to that expense in order to get that to which he is justly entitled.

Mr. GILBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. GILBERT. I rise, although it is unnecessary, to resent the continuous slams against lawyers. A lawyer is the only friend a poor man has. He can, out of a $3,000 claim, spend $300 or $400 of it and go into a court on an equal footing with any millionaire in the land. If he could not employ a lawyer he would be without influence, without money, and absolutely helpless before power and wealth. Lawyers as a whole are as unselfish, as patriotic, and as good citizens as any class of people in the world and the only friend the poor man has. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERHILL. If I have given any offense, unwittingly, to the legal fraternity, individually or as a class, I humbly apologize. I was simply expressing my own experience wherever I have had to defend or institute litigation.

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I will.

Mr. BOX. As the gentleman stated in his opening remarks, there are a number of lawyers on this committee. Some of them have been making their living in that profession for a number of years, and I myself have made my meat and bread at it for 25 or 30 years. So I am not prejudiced against the legal fraternity. However, there have been some abuses in that connection, of which the chairman is advised. I will state now for the information of the House, that I have information, which I believe is correct, that one bill, on which the committee divided, and which the House finally passed, awarded $140,000, and that one-half of that amount went to the attorney instead of to the claimant that Congress intended to compensate. So in trying to protect the rights of all concerned we included what we believed was a reasonable limitation.

Mr. HUDSPETH. And if the gentleman will permit, it was a widow who only received $70,000 out of the $140,000 award?

Mr. BOX. I believe so.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Let me call your attention to the fact that the gentleman from Texas complained last year because some lawyers in Washington were robbing the widows and orphans and the wounded and mentally unbalanced veterans before the courts. I did not wish to bring this into the question at all. We will strike that out and simply say that the purpose of the limitation is for the purpose of giving a small claimant a chance to get his money back without expense.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. On the question of the maximum amount, has it not been the gentleman's experience that ordinarily a person who has a meritorious claim of $1,000 will put it in for $5,000?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Not recently; no.

Mr. BLANTON. But that has been the gentleman's experience?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. And the gentleman has cut some claims down from $5,000 to $1,000?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes; and more than that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I should like to ask the gentleman a question, and perhaps before asking the question I should make this statement: Of course, it is very desirable that in the administration of this act, title 1, there should be uniformity; that is to say, a case occurring in the Post Office Department should be treated exactly as a similar case occurring in the Department of Commerce, or in whatever department it may occur. Does the gentleman think the rules fixed in the bill itself are sufficiently rigid as to insure this uniformity in all the departments? Each department is going to have some rules in addition to those that are laid down in the bill.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The bill, the gentlemen will find, expressly prohibits the Army and Navy Departments from adjudicating cases of members of that organization; that is, it does not allow officers and enlisted men to appeal to the head of their own department.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. This measure, I apprehend, is experimental, and I am anxious to see the experiment made; but much of the success of the measure in its experimental stage will depend upon there being uniformity. For instance, if there is an injury to a person by an agent of the Department of Commerce——

Mr. UNDERHILL. The gentleman means a personal injury?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. A personal injury or whatever it may be, whether it grows out of contract or whether it grows out of tort, what is to be the measure of damages fixed. The measure of damages, in other words, for a similar injury should be the same running throughout all the departments.

Mr. UNDERHILL. That is perfectly safeguarded in the bill with reference to personal injury and, of course, property damage can be more easily ascertained.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. To make an absolutely rigid rule is practically impossible. I realize what is in my mind is attended with much difficulty of arriving at, but I was anxious to hear from the gentleman, as the chairman of the committee having considered this question so long and so thoroughly. In the making of such rules as are made by the departments for the carrying out of this proposed act, there ought to be some sort of cooperation and collaboration between the departments so there will be substantial uniformity throughout the various departments of the Government.

Mr. UNDERHILL. May I say to the gentleman that personal injuries are fixed absolutely, so much for the loss of a toe, or the loss of a hand, or the loss of an eye, or the loss of a leg. These are all fixed. It is not so easy, perhaps, to fix positive damages with reference to property damage, but it is much easier to ascertain the value of property than it is the value of life or limb. So we have covered that point.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield for a question for information?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARBER. In connection with the inquiry of the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] does the bill provide the procedure before a department? Does it provide that the testimony shall be taken down and the witnesses sworn and a record made; if so, at whose expense?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No; the bill does not provide that. I will say for the information of the gentleman, it is usual for a department when any accident is reported—and usually they are all reported—to order an investigation immediately. Sometimes a court of inquiry or a court-martial is ordered. Then testimony is taken down at the expense of the department, all the facts are gathered together and then later on, if the claim comes before Congress, it is submitted to our committee when we ask for information. We are usually furnished with a full and exhaustive report of that particular accident. Once in a while the department comes back with the statement, say in a case which starts way back in 1885, as a case did which is before us, that the department has no information whatever, but you would not be surprised that the department did not have information about an accident that occurred to an individual in 1885.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman stated a few moments ago in a colloquy the gentleman had with some other Member, that the purpose of including the words "exclusive authority," in section 1, was to obviate the possibility of some subordinate of a department making up these decrees and rendering these judgments. Do I understand by that statement it is the intention of the committee to require the Secretary of War himself, say, to adjudicate all claims arising in the War Department?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Every time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is, of course, important and it is the purpose of the committee to try to gain expedition in the settlement of these claims.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not the gentleman from Massachusetts think that with all the great duties of administration that these Cabinet officers have imposed upon them, they would find great difficulty in taking the time to adjudicate the thousands of these claims you are sending to them for adjudication?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No; this is the situation: Something was said about how much vacation we have and how much work we have. The Committee on Claims can not work except when Congress is in session, whether it is three months or six months. Although the work of the individual Congressman, like Tennyson's Brook, goes on forever, Congress does occasionally adjourn and the work of the Committee on Claims stops. The departments go on just as though Congress was still in session, provided we appropriate money for them. The Secretary of War, with his multitude of duties, when we send to him for a report, can call upon his assistants to place before him this report; or, if he wants to take the chance, as long as we have vested him with responsibility, he can assign the Judge Advocate General to write his report for him.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is somewhat begging the question, and that is the reason I wanted to inquire if it is the firm purpose of the committee to put the rigid rule of judicial responsibility upon the head of the department, the Cabinet officer himself, and then if he carries out the law he has got to give his personal attention to the compilation of the evidence and render a decision on all of these hundreds of thousands of claims. If so, I fear that you will have a great deal of confusion and delay.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The gentleman from Massachusetts has no pride of authorship in the word "exclusive." It was not in the original bill. I do not want to make the statement absolutely, but I think it was a colleague of the gentleman, the gentleman from Alabama, who insisted when the first small claims act was passed that we should place the responsibility in some one, some one who would not pass the buck, and consequently the word "exclusive" was written in. If Congress wants to strike it out, I do not know but that I might be impelled to vote for it.

Mr. ROMJUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. ROMJUE. It is said that the word "exclusive" was put in for the purpose of keeping the subordinate from having anything to do with it, compelling the head of the department to pass on it, but it seems to me that the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama is pertinent. It puts it up to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy and the Postmaster General and if the arguments made by the proponents of the bill are true, they must pass on the claims.

Mr. UNDERHILL. It does not change the situation a particle. If you were all members of the Committee on Claims, I could explain it.

Mr. ROMJUE. I served on the Committee on Claims for quite a while.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I served my term.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I know the gentleman from Tennessee did, and if there is any man who represents a real statesman in this body it is the gentleman from Tennessee. [Applause.] I would have enjoyed a more intimate service with him and could have profited thereby. But, gentlemen, we can not cure all the evils. The trouble for 58 years or more has been that the minds of men, particularly those who have been trained in the legal profession—once more I want to speak in the highest regard for those gentlemen—are controversial in their character. We do not expect to remove all the evils that exist. The purpose of the author of the bill, the purpose of the committee, and those who have given assistance, is first to relieve the intolerable situation which is making bolsheviks of a large number of our people because they can not get justice or relief from the Government. Second, to relieve the intolerable situation that exists, with almost every individual member in this branch of Congress, because of the difference of the ways and manner in which the claims are handled in the two bodies. Third, to relieve to a certain degree—to the extent of 33⅓ or at most 50 per cent—the Committee on Claims so that they can give their attention to matters of great moment which do not come under the provisions of this bill, but which really should have the consideration of the committee and Congress.

Those are the three underlying purposes of this bill. We can not cure every evil, and we do not attempt it. We can not read into this bill every difference of opinion, but we must come to some compromise.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I have not been in the Chamber for the last few minutes, and it may be that this matter to which I wish to call attention has been discussed. Section 5 provides that suits under sections 24 or 145 of the Judicial Code upon a claim accruing on or after April 6, 1920, and prior to the passage of this act shall be brought within one year after the passage of this act, or within six years after the accrual of the claim. It might be that a claim accrued in December, 1927, and under that provision suits can be brought six years after December, 1927.

Mr. UNDERHILL. There are a few amendments which must be offered to the bill. That time limitation has been cut down. Wherever the figures 1920 occur that is changed to 1925. Wherever the limit is one year that is changed to six months.

There is one clarifying amendment—clarifying so that Members will realize what we intend—that nothing contained in the exceptions of section 8 in this act shall be considered as precluding Congress from considering injuries or damages arising under said exception.

It does not amount to anything, but shows the intent of the committee that claimants may have an appeal to Congress if they desire for injuries sustained previous to that date.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I am wondering if the chairman will agree to an amendment, on page 3, in section 3, limiting the amount that may be sued for in the Court of Claims.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I would be very loath to do so. Every argument which I have used on the floor this afternoon I would have to repudiate if I accepted such an amendment. I am a firm believer that the Government should not require from any one of its subjects or servants that which the Government is unwilling to do itself, nor should it take to itself any privilege or right that it is not willing to accord to its people. The Government is able now to sue its people, either individually or collectively up to any limit. If the Government should establish a court for the adjudication of these claims, I do not think that it is right in fixing a limit and saying, "Thus far shalt thou go and no further." It is not just or equitable, and it is not honest. What is more, I do not know where you could place such a limit.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. This, of course, is experimental. Suppose we limited it to $10,000. Suppose we inserted after the figures "$5,000," in line 17, on page 3, the words "but does not exceed $10,000." We could then try this act out with that as a limit, and the claimants would still have their old remedy of coming to Congress when it was above $10,000. I think that is worthy of consideration. I want to follow the gentleman on this bill pretty closely, if I can.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I trust that the gentleman will not offer the amendment, because that would hardly touch 10 per cent of the claims of that character.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The amount was suggested to my mind because it is the amount to which you grant jurisdiction to the district courts—at least it is between $5,000 and $10,000.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Up to $10,000 to the district court.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If it is above $10,000, the only tribunal they will have to work in will be the Court of Claims.

Mr. UNDERHILL. It will be Congress if you make the limitation $10,000.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes; if you fix that limitation; but you now fix the limitation in the district court to $10,000.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes; and that is in order to save time and expense.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And there is no limitation on the amount if the suit can be brought before the Court of Claims?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No; it is exactly the same as in the admiralty act. Some vessels cost millions of dollars. I do not know what the California, which has just started out on her maiden trip, cost. Suppose through some negligence on the part of the commander of a battleship the California should be destroyed. The United States says that the owners of the California can go into court and sue for any amount up to the amount of the value of that steamer and the cargo, and not only that, but also for demurrage. Suppose a man has a hotel, and through the negligence or carelessness or faulty act of the Government that hotel is destroyed. He at least ought to have a chance to go into court and press his claim, even if it should exceed $10,000.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Is not this always true, that if there is no limitation placed upon the amount which a claimant may sue for and recover before the Court of Claims, the recovery of that amount does not act as a warrant on the United States Treasury?

Mr. UNDERHILL. That is true.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Is it not as it always has been, that they must come with this recommendation to Congress for an appropriation? It does not automatically become paid. Therefore, we have a safeguard that ordinarily you would not have, because it is not payable out of any funds in the Treasury. It must be specially appropriated for. If it is very large, the Congress will hesitate, and if it is at all suspicious, the Congress will not appropriate.

Mr. RAMSEYER. As a matter of fact, where judgment has been duly entered by the court, is it not a fact that Congress does simply make the appropriation to pay those judgments?

Mr. BLANTON. Almost in every case.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Oh, no, no.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Wait. Congress, or either House of Congress, has the right to refer any matter to the Court of Claims for consideration. It may refer claims sounding in tort to the Court of Claims, and some of those have come back. The court has gone into it and recommended a certain amount to be paid. In some of those cases the Congress has not followed the recommendation of the Court of Claims. On the other hand, why establish a court, why give a court power to render judgment and then deny the person who has gotten the judgment the right to recover by simply exercising the arbitrary will of Congress and deny the appropriation?

Mr. UNDERHILL. May I quote one case to the gentleman, if he wants a concrete case? I refer to the French spoliation claims. They have all been before the Court of Claims.

Mr. RAMSEYER. In what shape?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Judgment has been rendered by the Court of Claims, but the committee will not consider those claims for one minute.

Mr. GILBERT. And the longevity pay claims were the same kind, possibly.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Were those cases ones arising out of contracts, where the Court of Claims has jurisdiction, or were they cases referred to it by one of the bodies of Congress for consideration?

Mr. BOX. There is a slight error, as I understand it, in what the gentleman has said. They were not referred for general action but under a special reference.

Mr. UNDERHILL. That is what was done in respect to a lot of them. The committee found it would not do to refer to the Court of Claims for a finding of fact. We found that after the Court of Claims had gone all through the case and found the facts and reported them back, our committee, having confidence in the Court of Claims, reported them to the House, but the House turned them down, and so it has been the practice of the committee in recent years to refer claims to the Court of Claims for payment and not for finding of facts.

Mr. GILBERT. In the longevity pay cases, not only the Court of Claims but the Supreme Court of the United States said we owed these parties certain amounts, and yet Congress went for 20 years and refused to appropriate the money.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Is that the only case where judgment was rendered in the Court of Claims and Congress refused to appropriate?

Mr. GILBERT. That is all that I have in mind.

Mr. UNDERHILL. We had a case referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of fact which affected the Standard Oil Co.

Mr. RAMSEYER. But I am talking about judgment in the Court of Claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired. All time has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.—

TITLE I.—PROPERTY DAMAGE CLAIMS

SECTION 1. (a) Subject to the limitations of this act, the Government of the United States authorizes the payment of claims on account of damage to or loss of privately owned property, if the claim accrued after April 6, 1920, and if the damage or loss was caused by the negligence or wrongful act or omission of any officer or employee of the Government acting within the scope of his office or employment. Contributory negligence shall operate to diminish the damages recoverable in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to the claimant.

(b) Exclusive authority is hereby conferred upon the head of each department and establishment acting on behalf of the Government to consider, ascertain, adjust, and determine any claim liability for which is recognized under this section, if the amount of the claim does not exceed $5,000. Such amount as may be found to be due to any claimant shall be certified to the Congress as a just claim for payment out of appropriations that may be made by Congress therefor, together with a brief statement of the character of each claim, the amount claimed, and the amount allowed, with a summary of the evidence upon which the allowance was made: Provided, That no claim shall be considered by a department or establishment unless presented to it within one year from the date of the accrual of said claim, except that any such claim accrued after April 6, 1920, but prior to the passage of this act, may be presented within one year after the passage of this act.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to page 1, line 8: Strike out "1920" and insert "1925"; and on page 2, line 20, strike out "1920" and insert in lieu thereof "1925."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. UNDERHILL: Page 1, line 8, strike out the figures "1920" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "1925"; and on page 2, line 20, strike out the figures "1920" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "1925."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] has the floor.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The only purpose I have in view in offering this amendment is to lengthen the time, due to the fact that it is difficult to summon witnesses, and besides that this is insisted on in another body, and it is necessary in order to get it through.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I have a second amendment: Strike out the last two words in line 21, page 2, and insert the words "six months" instead of "one year."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. UNDERHILL: Page 2, line 21, strike out the words "one year" and insert in lieu thereof the words "six months."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD: Page 2, line 18, strike out the word "one" and insert in lieu thereof the word "two."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee on this amendment. I offer it with this in mind: Of course, this bill in its jurisdiction would cover all claimants who may live not only in continental United States, but in all of its insular possessions, and those who are connected with its consular offices in foreign countries. It seems to me that the limitation of one year in which to bring a suit under this act might in certain instances work a hardship upon men and women who have a real and just claim against the Government in this particular. A man, for instance, in Honolulu might receive a personal injury of a very serious nature that would necessitate his treatment in hospital for 8 or 10 or 12 months, and it would be physically impossible for him probably to confer with counsel or make arrangements about the bringing of a suit; things of that sort. It might in some instances deprive citizens of the opportunity to present their claims.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to discuss it. It does not alter the situation with reference to these isolated cases. They can still come back to Congress. On the other hand, I do not think the Government would be properly protected when you extend the time two years, when the Army and Navy are assigning men to the Philippines, when witnesses are lost sight of.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Of course, fixing a time at which the statute of limitations shall run is surely an exercise of legislative power. My idea is not antagonistic to the merits of the bill or the provisions of the bill, but it occurred to me that it might appear reasonable to the committee for the reasons I have stated. I have no pride of opinion on the proposition, and I will take no offense if the amendment is voted down, but it seems to me it presents an equitable situation which might be a very valuable right to the claimants against the Government.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I want to lay my cards on the table and say that it is necessary to place these limitations on the bill in order to get consideration by the other body.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not know that that should be conclusive upon us, although as a legislative problem it may be all right.

Mr. BLANTON. To carry out the gentleman's intention the words should be "two years." The gentleman used the word "year."

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to modify the amendment so that it shall read "two years" instead of "one year."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 1, before the word "omission," insert the words "negligence or."

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, I find myself in hearty sympathy with the purposes of the bill.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT: On page 2, in line 6, strike out the word "exclusive" and insert in line 6, page 2, after the word "conferred," the word "exclusively."

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I believe the word "exclusively" should be stricken out of the bill entirely and, therefore, I am opposed to the amendment which has just been offered. If you put the word "exclusively" in this bill, it seems to me it will become absolutely conclusive upon the Comptroller General and deprive him of the authority we have already conferred upon him by section 305 (42 Stats. 24) of the general accounting act, which reads as follows:

SEC. 305. Section 236 of the Revised Statutes is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 236. All claims and demands whatever by the Government of the United States or against it, and all accounts whatever in which the Government of the United States is concerned, either as debtor or creditor, shall be settled and adjusted in the General Accounting Office."

If this bill is passed with the word "exclusively" in it, I do not see how the Comptroller General can pass upon a claim in any shape, manner, or form, because it will stand as authorized by Congress through the delegated power given to the head of some department.

For my part I am opposed to the entire section as written. I think this section should be amended so as to require that when these claims are settled or adjusted by department heads the claims should be certified to Congress for reference to the Committee on Claims. I have not had time to work out a proper amendment, but it might accomplish the purpose to so amend as to make it read "and shall be paid out of appropriations that may be 'authorized' by Congress" instead of appropriations "made" by Congress. If the word "authorized" is put in in place of the word "made," it would go to the Committee on Claims, and they could bring in an omnibus bill dealing with all of the claims reported by the heads of departments.

Claims so reported ought not to go to the Committee on Appropriations, which is without legislative function, in no sense a committee on claims. Those claims ought to be passed upon by the proper committee of the House, and I shall offer an amendment at the proper time.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. If the Committee on Claims should bring in an omnibus bill, it would be an absolute waste of time, because when it went to the other body it would be loaded with a lot of claims that we could never agree to at all.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Bearing out what the chairman has said, year before last we spoke of classifying the claims bills, and asked them over in the Senate whether they would agree to pass an omnibus bill of each classification. They said they would not, because they wanted to attach whatever they pleased to it.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute amendment for the amendment just offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota offers a substitute amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute amendment offered by Mr. WILLIAMSON to the amendment offered by Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT: On page 2, line 6, strike out the word "exclusively."

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman can reach what he is after by demanding a division of the amendment offered by the gentleman from California. What the gentleman from South Dakota wishes to do is to strike out the word "exclusive" but not to insert at a different place the word "exclusively." By a division of the pending amendment he can get the same result without the submission of his amendment at all. Therefore I think the gentleman should withdraw his amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, then I ask unanimous consent to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to withdraw the substitute amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. May I state in this connection, gentlemen, that there has been reported out by the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments a short time ago a bill which authorizes the Comptroller General, in certain cases, to submit to Congress for reference to the Committee on Claims certain claims passed on by him. If the word "exclusively" should remain in this bill it seems to me very clear that it would not only be in direct conflict with this proposed legislation, but that it would deprive the Comptroller General of the power which already exists in his office to pass upon the validity of claims transmitted to Congress by department heads.

I do not believe this bill should go through in its present form, because I do not think we should give to the heads of departments exclusive power to settle items of liability which might arise therein. I do not believe they should have that power, because it would amount to giving them legislative authority to pass upon claims and authorize appropriations for their payment without their having been passed upon by a committee of Congress or a court. Such claims should not be passed on to the Committee on Appropriations, which is not a legislative committee.

Mr. NEWTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. The gentleman's amendment does not attempt to confer jurisdiction upon the Comptroller General with reference to the payment of these claims.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I am simply trying to preserve the jurisdiction which the Comptroller General now has under existing law. If you put in the word "exclusively" it will deprive him of the power we have already conferred upon him under the general accounting act.

Mr. NEWTON. Is it the gentleman's idea that he ought to have the right to go into the merits of a claim and pass upon the question?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. The Comptroller General has that power now in certain cases.

Mr. NEWTON. Well, there will never be a claim paid if that is the way it is to be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has exactly the right idea about it, in my judgment. By this bill we are taking away from the Comptroller General consideration of all claims of $5,000 and under that sum.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. There is not any question about it. That is the clear purport of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. And hereafter he will not have jurisdiction over them at all, and that is exactly what the heads of the departments have been trying to do for the past several years. They have been trying to get rid of the Comptroller General of the United States, and this bill does it for them.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. In other words, here is what we are doing, in my judgment: We have established a General Accounting Office for the express purpose of representing Congress in the safeguarding and prevention of improper expenditure of public funds. It was not created to represent the departments, but we established it as an independent department to pass upon claims and demands against the Government separate and apart from the executive heads that have the spending power. This being the case, we ought not now, in defiance of existing law and the policy which Congress has already established, to put in a proviso which takes away that power.

Mr. LUCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes.

Mr. LUCE. Does the gentleman think Congress ever intended to make the Comptroller General a dispenser of justice? What duty has he beyond determining what is the law? What has he to do with applying the law?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Let me tell the gentleman this: I can cite the gentleman to cases where there is not any question, in my judgment, that heads of departments in the exercise of certain discretionary power lodged in them by law have done certain things which are clear violations of law.

Mr. LUCE. Certainly; I admit we want to check violations of law, but we are not proposing in this bill to allow any man to violate the law, we are allowing him to administer the law.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Pass this bill in its present form and you will have no committee of Congress to determine the question of whether it is in violation of law or not.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. It seems to me the gentleman has a misconception of the meaning of this section. This section only refers to claims for tort, and, so far as I know, the Comptroller General has no jurisdiction over claims for tort, and no one else except Congress. The very purpose of this act is to reach that situation and fix it so that a department of the Government can deal with it instead of the Congress itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I move the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division of the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from California——

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from South Dakota asks for a division of the question.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, there are two separate propositions here. One is to strike out the word "exclusive" and the other is to insert in a different portion of the bill the word "exclusively." I think the gentleman has a right to demand a division of the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is divisible, and the question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California to strike out the word "exclusive," in line 6, page 2.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California to insert the word "exclusively" after the word "conferred" in line 6, page 2.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The result of this legislation means, in short, that the Committee on Appropriations will, in the final analysis, have to take each one of these claims reported favorably by the head of a department or a bureau chief, go into it from beginning to end, and find what the testimony is in order to decide whether or not Congress shall make an appropriation to pay it; is not that the fact?

Mr. UNDERHILL. They do that now.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The Appropriations Committee goes into all of these claims now?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes; all that are under $1,000.

Mr. McDUFFIE. And they take them up, case after case?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I suppose that is their procedure.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The point is the Committee on Appropriations is the busiest committee in the House. It is practically running the Government now, having control of its purse strings. Does the gentleman think it is proper to put such a burden, which his committee might undertake and handle, on the other committee, the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I have tried to explain that. I do not know whether it is my inability to get it across or not; but it is just a repetition when you send it back to the Committee on Claims, and you run up against the same stone wall, the same objections that you have with reference to the whole procedure that is now carried on. If they come back here to the Committee on Appropriations, after an examination by the department, it is written into the law and there is nothing more said about it. There are no objections to it on the floor of the House, either for political or personal reasons. The Committee on Claims might just as well shoot its claims in here day after day, or whenever they get the chance, unless you are going to accept this proposition that the Committee on Appropriations act as a safeguard to the interests of the Government, and that is all that is involved.

Mr. McDUFFIE. One other question. The gentleman said, as I understand it, that if one department head files an adverse report on a claim any Member of Congress, of course, can introduce a bill, but will it not be the policy of the gentleman's committee to refer to this act we are considering, when such a bill is presented, and that will be the end of it?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No more than it does now. That is the policy now.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Of course, we can change the law, but to do that it takes time, patience, and hard work. I do not want claimants shut out, because the head of some department, who perhaps is not a lawyer, or who has not a judicial mind, has reported adversely on a claim. It may be that some department head will perhaps be indifferent or in his efforts to hold down the expenditures of his department, might unwittingly become biased or prejudiced against a claim. Of course, any Member of Congress can introduce a bill, but with this bill, if it becomes the law, staring him in the face, will it not be difficult to get relief?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No more difficult to get relief to-morrow after this bill passes than it is to-day without the bill being passed.

Mr. McDUFFIE. We, the Congress, are putting more and more legislative responsibility on the heads of bureaus, and that it another objection I have to this legislation. We are surrendering our prerogative to legislate to the responsibility of a bureau head, or to bureaucratic control.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Where else would you put it?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I would suggest that the Committee on Claims retain it.

Mr. UNDERHILL. And retain the same intolerable conditions?

Mr. McDUFFIE. My suggestion is that the Committee on Claims might do a little more work or that we create a board consisting of Congressmen or an additional committee of Congress to assist in passing on these claims.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have it go in the RECORD that I am willing to resign my position as chairman of the Committee on Claims in behalf of the gentleman from Alabama of the minority party, and I hope all my colleagues over here will stand back of me on the proposition; and if he can get any more work out of these conscientious, hard-working 21 men and women than the committee does I will be content.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I will accept the honor if your colleagues will agree, and we will get something done. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 13, strike out the word "made" and insert in lieu thereof the word "authorized."

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I alluded to this matter a few moments ago. I do not think we ought to vest in the heads of the departments matters which are legislative or quasi judicial in character. You have as many departments as there are members in the Cabinet. You are going to have as many rules and regulations for settlement and as many different measures of damages as you have members of the Cabinet; there will be no uniformity. I realize that the Committee on Claims is a hard-working committee. I do not think there is a more conscientious committee in the House or a harder worked body of men, but it does seem to me that if the department heads would investigate the cases and effect settlements as herein authorized and would then send them to Congress to be referred to the Committee on Claims with a summary of their findings in each case, that the committee would not have to spend a great deal of time in passing upon the merits of such claims. There should be some committee of the Congress to deal with the merits of unlitigated claims. This is not properly a function of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The gentleman's amendment strikes out the word "made" and puts in the word "authorize."

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Whenever I find myself in disagreement with my friend from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE] it always causes me to reexamine the matter, because I have a very high regard for his judgment upon legal or all other questions, but it does not strike me that we are delegating legislative authority. We are placing some judicial authority in the executive branch of the Government. I agree to that. But it seems to me that we are only transferring from the legislative branch judicial authority.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Does the gentleman think that the authority exercised by the Committee on Claims is judicial or legislative?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think it is a mixture; I think very largely judicial. Based upon my own experience upon that committee long years ago, I should say that the preponderance of decisions required of members of the Committee on Claims is judicial in character. I should certainly hesitate to build up bureaus by transferring legislative authority to them. I would not knowingly vote for such a measure. I think it would be one of the most dangerous things that we could do. I think that we have gone too far in that direction already.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman does not believe in building them up by increasing their authority along judicial lines or giving them judicial authority, does he?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. My position may not be thoroughly consistent in that regard.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the gentleman thinks, and I think he is correct, that the bulk of the work done by the departments in this character of claims will be judicial, what does he think of giving judicial power with no review by any appellate court?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am inclined to think very strongly that there might very well be an amendment which would give judicial review of those cases under $5,000 as well as giving original authority in cases above $5,000.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. As I understand this bill, it merely authorizes these departments to ascertain the facts of the claim, and to give their judgment that it is a just claim. Then it comes back to Congress, and Congress in the final analysis passes upon the claim. It does not seem to me that it is an unusual delegation.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It does not differ from what has been done in the past, or for a long period of years, as regards Civil War claims so far as that is concerned. We are not setting a precedent here in principle.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The gentleman will agree that this bill uses the same language, but only increases the amount from $5,000 to $10,000.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is true.

Mr. TILSON. And is it not also a fact that every bill introduced here for a claim is first sent to the appropriate department, and that Members of the House are very largely influenced by the report the department makes after such investigation? Such reports when they come to this House are very persuasive, especially with some Members in making their objections here. Sometimes objections are based very largely upon the fact that the department has reported unfavorably, so that in this bill we are not departing very far from the plan we are already using in the adjustment of these claims.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Practically, without exception, and I think properly so, the claims, such are those that we are discussing here, are referred to the department in which the cause of action, if I may so designate it, arose, with the request for an opinion from the head of that department.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment to make a few observations on this section and probably on the bill. From the questions that I asked the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] a while ago. Members have probably sensed my general attitude toward the bill. I know that the proper handling of claims in the Claims Committee presents a very hard situation. The Committee on Claims is a hard-working committee, and I think they handle those claims as well as they could be handled by any committee, and but for the situation so created we probably would not have this bill now pending before the House. I am in sympathy with the purposes of the bill. We must also understand, before we go any further, that in this bill we are making a radical change in our judicial procedure. Up to this good hour there has been no authority for a citizen or a noncitizen to sue the Government of the United States in cases sounding in tort. There are good reasons why the sovereign should not be sued. I am not going to take the time of the House to amplify that proposition because I think every lawyer of the House knows just why the rule has prevailed. If we are going to change the rule and permit the sovereign to be sued, I think there ought to be a limitation. We ought to experiment on smaller cases, and while we are experimenting on smaller cases, at the same time we would be relieving the Committee on Claims of probably at least nine-tenths of their distressing labors.

We first attempted to relieve the Committee on Claims in 1922 when we conferred jurisdiction upon the heads of the departments to adjudicate claims up to a thousand dollars for injury to private property on account of the negligence of Government employees. I ask Members to note this language in that statute:

caused by the negligence of any officer or employee.

In this bill we go further. We confer jurisdiction for damages or loss to private property—caused by the negligence or wrongful act or omission of any officer or employee of the Government.

There can be no question that we are widening the scope of the statute that we passed in 1922.

Mr. MANLOVE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. MANLOVE. The gentleman suggests that we limit the amount. Might it not be well to start at a lower base than $5,000.

Mr. RAMSEYER. We have no base.

Mr. MANLOVE. At a lower figure.

Mr. RAMSEYER. From a cent to $5,000 under this bill we confer jurisdiction on the department chiefs.

Mr. MANLOVE. That is what I am saying.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Over $5,000 and up to the sky——

Mr. MANLOVE. Instead of starting with $5,000 start at a lower sum.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Would the gentleman limit the jurisdiction of the department chiefs below $5,000? As the bill reads, it is in sums up to $5,000 that the department chiefs pass upon. In cases involving between $5,000 and $10,000 the Court of Claims and the Federal district courts have concurrent jurisdiction. From $10,000 to the farthest star the Court of Claims has exclusive jurisdiction.

Now, we are not going to get through with this bill to-night. There is some questioning of my statement. Let me repeat—from $5,000 to $10,000 the Court of Claims and the Federal district courts have concurrent jurisdiction, and above $10,000 the Court of Claims has exclusive jurisdiction.

I say we are not going to get through with this bill to-night, and I want the Members of the House—between now and the next time we meet to consider this bill—to give serious consideration to the question of fixing a limit on the amount the Government can be sued for in cases sounding in tort. Maybe my imagination is running off with me.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. RAMSEYER. May I have three minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSEYER. But I can conceive a situation where the claims arising out of tort might mount up to such staggering amounts that they would threaten the very existence of the sovereign. Now, it is all well and good to say that the Government should be treated like an individual, but who is the Government? It is the people. Under our system of government sovereignty resides in the people, and when you threaten sovereignty you threaten the organization under which the people live, move, and have their being in organized society.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I have prepared an amendment limiting the amount to $10,000.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I think as a starter we ought to accept an amount like that. If it works all right, it will be easy enough in a subsequent Congress to extend the jurisdiction.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It would be better to go a little slow, because we can not foresee what increase it would make in the business of the Court of Claims if this bill is passed.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. At the present time if the head of a department says a thousand dollars is due, the deficiency bill would provide payment. Under this bill a department head may say a $5,000 claim is due to John Doe, but after he has made that decision he sends here a departmental bill asking Congress to authorize an appropriation for John Doe, and the Committee on Claims goes over this list of bills that the department head has sent in and, if satisfactory, it indorses the recommendation of the department.

Mr. RAMSEYER. There ought to be a limit to the paying out of the public money.

Mr. ARENTZ. This is merely an amendment to the former bill.

Mr. UNDERHILL. A bill came in last year for $4. The committee thought it did not have the time to devote to such a matter, and we concluded that if they could not pay that $4 they would have to go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to protest—that may not be exactly the right word; I wish to argue—against placing in this bill the limitations suggested, and at the same time in all kindness to take issue with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER], when he said there were reasons why we should still recognize the doctrine that the king can do no wrong. My keen interest in this subject dates back 20 years to my personal experience in the Massachusetts Legislature. In the course of protracted studies since that time I have never been able to find one single reason to support to-day that most pernicious and cruel doctrine of antiquity, the dogma that the king can do no wrong. [Applause.]

Let me recall a bit of the history of this subject. I must put it in a very few words, because I did not have opportunity in general debate to call your attention to it. In my own Commonwealth of Massachusetts in the early days the legislative, executive, and judicial powers were exercised by one body, the general court. It took us nearly 150 years to get the greater part of the judicial functions wholly out of the general court, and it took us nearly another 150 years to bring that reform to virtual completion. There never was and never will be a legislative body capable of dispensing justice. The most cruel injustices recorded have been those committed by law-making bodies. Such bodies are by their constitution not capable of dispensing justice. So your forefathers and mine, after a bitter experience of more than a century and a half, began to make constitutional separation of the powers. The constitution of my own State in 1780 is the model, in the words of John Adams, for that purpose. Our Federal Constitution has been so construed.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] was absolutely correct when he expressed the belief that the granting of claims is a judicial and not a legislative power.

It was nearly 75 years ago that the Congress began to recognize this, and by the creation of the Court of Claims gave the first inkling of its apprehension of what is common sense in the matter by beginning to resort to a judicial body. And now comes a singular coincidence. About 50 years ago a man from the city of Somerville, Mass., was a Member of this House. His name was Bowman, and he achieved the next important step in this reform by securing the passage of what has since been known as the Bowman Act. The singular thing is that he to whom the honor will come, and should come, for initiating the legislation now before us lives to-day within gunshot of where Selwyn Z. Bowman lived.

The next step was taken under the lead of the father of that much-respected colleague of ours, Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia. The Tucker Act still more broadened the powers of the Court of Claims.

Now, we have the opportunity of carrying the reform yet farther—not as far as I would like to go and not as far as some future Congress will go, but still a step in advance. Because it is a step in advance I hope that step will not be shackled. I hope it may not be the few inches that will come if you put on these amendments, without going the full length of what your committee so wisely and admirably recommends.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. How much farther could you go than this bill goes?

Mr. LUCE. You can go to the point of taking out of the Congress of the United States every shred and fragment that may be left of judicial procedure, and that will come so surely as it has come in nearly every other civilized country on the globe. My State approached it a half century ago and for these many years our legislature has not been seriously perplexed and harassed by attempting to administer justice in the settlement of claims. There are other States in this land that have equally proceeded. I know the idea shocks gentlemen from States where it has not been tried; I know they are skeptical; I know they are afraid; but I point to the States of this land that have had this now for these many years. I know it is the part of wisdom, that it is the part of equity, and that it is the part of justice itself to stop trying to administer justice in a legislative body.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts may proceed for one additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts may proceed for one additional minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWTON. Does the gentleman's State permit the State government to be sued, just the same as a suit may be brought against an individual?

Mr. LUCE. At least in contract; yes.

Mr. PEERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. PEERY. I would like to ask the gentleman if he considers it wise in principle to transfer judicial power to the executive branch of the Government to the extent of $5,000, as this bill proposed to do?

Mr. LUCE. The latest idea among students of the science of government is that there is no proper discrimination between the executive and judicial departments; that in reality the Government consists of two things—making the law and the carrying of law into effect. We used to proceed on the assumption that we should also separate the executive and the judicial, but complete separation has been found impracticable and gradually all the countries of the world are bringing those two powers together.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LAGUARDIA, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9285) to provide for the settlement of claims against the United States on account of property damage, personal injury, or death, and had come to no resolution thereon.

REFERENCE OF HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 175

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to refer House Joint Resolution 175, which relates to changing the name of the Ancon Hospital in the Panama Canal Zone to the General Gorgas Hospital, from the Committee on Military Affairs to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution by title.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution, as follows:

House Joint Resolution 175, to change the name of the Ancon Hospital in the Panama Canal Zone to the General Gorgas Hospital.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that this resolution may be rereferred from the Committee on Military Affairs to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. This is not a military hospital.

Mr. PARKER. No; it is a civil hospital.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SETTLEMENT OF CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, some question has been raised as to when the bill which has been under consideration to-day will go on again. I believe it to be in accordance with the rules that this bill will go on at any time when there is not a privileged matter to take precedence over it. I understand that to-morrow the Committee on Appropriations will have a privileged bill, the bill making appropriations for the War Department.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Has the bill been reported?

Mr. TILSON. It will be reported to-morrow and will be taken up under general debate immediately.

Mr. BLANTON. Without even having been printed? That is pretty fast work.

Mr. TILSON. It will be taken up for general debate only, as I understand.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman's unanimous-consent request which was preferred this morning with reference to the bill we have had under discussion, contain the request that it remain the unfinished business of the House?

Mr. TILSON. It did not. It did not limit it to to-day, but simply asked that it be in order.

Mr. DENISON. While unanimous consent may have been granted that it be in order, that did not mean it would be in order indefinitely.

The SPEAKER. The Chair examined the colloquy which occurred this morning and there is no mention of a day certain. It was simply general leave that this bill might be considered under the Rules of the House.

Mr. DENISON. I should think it would take unanimous consent to bring it up.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands it, this bill is now the unfinished business and may be taken up at any time where there is not another matter of higher privilege under the rule.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Why not finish this bill to-morrow? The Members have just recently studied the bill and are more familiar with it now than they will be if it is displaced indefinitely.

Mr. TILSON. There are two reasons. One is that a number of Members have asked that it not come up to-morrow so that they may have an opportunity to consider it a little further. Another reason is that there is an appropriation bill with considerable general debate pending that it is desired shall go on to-morrow.

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask the gentleman whether he does not think it wise policy to at least have a big appropriation bill like the Army bill printed before we take it up for discussion?

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman understands that general debate on a bill of this sort means a very wide discussion upon things that do not pertain directly to the bill which is supposed to be before the House.

Mr. BLANTON. The bill will not be read to-morrow?

Mr. TILSON. Certainly not.

RETIREMENT FOR DISABLED EMERGENCY ARMY OFFICERS

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill (H. R. 500).

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the retirement for disabled emergency Army officers is provided in H. R. 500 and S. 777.

NINE CLASSES OF WORLD WAR OFFICERS

Nine classes of officers fought in the World War. These were the regular officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps; the provisional officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps; and the emergency officers of the Navy, Marine Corps, and the Army. The first eight classes have been retired by the Congress for their wounds. The disabled emergency Army officers alone have been denied retirement for their mutilations and disabilities. It is to rectify this discrimination against the seriously disabled emergency Army officers that the American Legion has pressed this legislation for the past nine years.

The discrimination is against the emergency Army officers, who have not been placed on a parity with the eight other classes of disabled officers who fought in the World War. There is no discrimination against the disabled enlisted men, as they will lose nothing—they will not surrender a single right—if their disabled officers are placed upon a parity with the eight other classes who have already been retired.

EQUALITY PROMISED

Equality for all officers and enlisted men was promised in the selective service act of May, 1917. This equality has been granted to all classes of enlisted men and to eight of the nine classes of officers. The disabled emergency Army officers alone have been denied the fulfillment of this promise, made by the Congress 11 years ago.

Section 10 of the selective service act of May, 1917, provided as follows:

That all officers and enlisted men of the forces herein provided for, other than the Regular Army, shall be in all respects upon the same footing as to pay, allowances, and pensions as officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades and length of service in the Regular Army.

The retirement privilege has been held to be a pension. In view of this, would it not appear that through this enactment Congress desired the emergency officer to be on exactly the same footing as the Regular officer with respect to payments for battle casualties?

General Orders, No. 75, War Department, August 17, 1918, reads in part as follows:

This country has but one Army, the United States Army. It includes all land forces in the services of the United States. These forces, however raised, lose their identity in that of the United States Army. Distinctive appellations, such as Regular Army, Reserve Corps, National Guard, and National Army, heretofore employed in the administration and command, will be discontinued and the single term "United States Army" will be exclusively used.

Orders having reference to the United States Army as divided into separate and component forces of distinct origin, or assuming or contemplating such a division, are to that extent revoked.

A recent letter from one of the Members of Congress—Representative T. W. HARRISON, of Virginia—who was on the committee which drew up the selective service act, states the following:

I consider that the clause in the draft law was a distinct obligation on the part of the Government to put the emergency officers in the same class with the Regular officers. I was on the Military Affairs Committee when this bill was passed, and it was the opinion of the majority of that committee that the language used was sufficient to take care of the emergency officers.

For years the Civil War officers had been clamoring at the doors of the Military Affairs Committee to be placed in the class of the Regular Army officers, and to remove any possible distinction against the new emergency officers the language was inserted in the draft bill to remove a controversy. The language is very broad and I have never understood how the War Department managed to evade it.

WHO ARE THESE DISABLED OFFICERS?

They were the platoon commanders, the company and battalion commanders, who led their men in the most desperate fighting the Nation has ever known—led them against rifle and artillery fire, machine guns, flame projectors, and poison gas, led them through barbed wire and trench and forest, through mud and blood, in a manner which stirred the wonder and admiration of the world—10 years ago.

LET'S GO

These were the officers whose motto was "Come on, boys," not "Go on, men." They took their leadership seriously, did these emergency officers; were so determined to set an example to their men that the British and French repeatedly warned them against their unnecessary exposure to danger, for they were marked men, marked down by the enemy as a special target for snipers and sharpshooters.

Chateau-Thierry, Belleau Wood, St. Mihiel, and the Meuse-Argonne abounded in their deeds of sacrifice and heroism. But the results tell the tale. The battle deaths among these officers of the Infantry and machine-gun outfits were 55 per cent higher than those of the men who served under them. Two thousand of them were killed in action. Three thousand of them now survive, disabled permanently, more than 30 per cent.

Look for your answer at the citations for gallantry in action—"above and beyond the call of duty." There you will read the history of their imperishable deeds—in the awards of the Congressional Medal of Honor and the distinguished service cross—deeds which were heralded from coast to coast, thrilling the Nation with wonder and pride—but deeds which reduced these gallant officers from stalwart, vigorous manhood to the maimed, crippled, and mutilated husks of men they are to-day.

OFFICERS MEN WITH RESPONSIBILITIES

The officers were chosen largely for their responsibility, as the comfort, safety, and lives of the men they commanded were in their hands. Because of their greater age, a large proportion of them had wives and children or other dependents when they entered the service. Many others had incurred family, business, and professional responsibilities which the enlisted men had not yet attained because of their youth.

OFFICERS HAD FAMILIES

The average officer was above the draft age. In fact, a large proportion of them would not have been able to have entered the service—due to their family responsibilities and the necessity of those dependent upon them—but for the fact that as officers they received a rate of pay which enabled them to enter the service and still support their families. This fact is frequently overlooked in considering the justice and urgency of this legislation.

OFFICERS OLDER THAN ENLISTED MEN

The officers were older than the enlisted men by an average of 12 to 15 years. The lieutenants and captains averaged 8 years older; the majors 17 years older; and the few colonels and lieutenant colonels, who were permanently injured, 22 years older. These men abandoned careers at the call of their country. The majority have been unable to resume these careers due to their disabilities. The average disabled enlisted man, on the other hand, was at the threshold of his career. The situation confronting the average of these two classes is, therefore, vastly different—one in midcareer with dependents, the other at the outset of his career and without dependents.

This great difference in the ages of officers and enlisted men is a natural one and has been true through all America's history. The reason for it is apparent. It is necessary that an officer be a man of greater experience, greater ability in handling men and coping with situations, than the enlisted men themselves. As a rule, his greater age has also brought him greater military knowledge, essential to proper leadership.

SELECTION OF OFFICERS

Here are some extracts from a War Department memorandum of June 4, 1917, which instructed officers of the regular service on the methods they were to follow in selecting candidates for the officers' training camps. These show the emphasis placed upon age, experience, and character:

GENERAL PLAN

To provide officers for * * * the National Army the War Department has adopted the policy of commissioning all new officers of the line (Infantry, Cavalry, Field and Coast Artillery) purely on the basis of demonstrated ability after three months' observation and training in the officers' training camps. Thus the appointment of officers of the new armies will be made entirely on merit and free from all personal or other influences.

* * * Also, in connection with these camps, it is to be noted that mature and experienced men are needed to fill the higher grades (first lieutenant, captain, major, and a few lieutenant colonels).

QUALIFICATIONS

* * * In order to obtain the experienced class of men desired, preference will be given to men over 31 years of age, other things being equal. Because of the anticipated large number of applications, it will probably be difficult for men under that age to qualify except in instances where the applicant has preeminent qualifications or unusual military experience.

CHARACTER OF MEN DESIRED

Since the special object of these camps is to train a body of men fitted to fill the more responsible positions of command in the new armies, every effort will be made to select men of exceptional character and proved ability in their various occupations. While it is desired to give full opportunity for all eligible citizens to apply, no man need make application whose record is not in all respects above reproach and who does not possess the fundamental characteristics necessary to inspire respect and confidence.

WORLD WAR OFFICERS' TRAINING CAMPS

The following data has been supplied by the press-relations section of the War Department on the First, Second, and Third Officers' Training Camps held during the World War to supply commissioned personnel for the World War armies. The figures show the number who applied for entrance in the camps, the number who were admitted to the camps, and the number who received commissions as the result of attending the camps. Figures on the Fourth Training Camp were not available, and as this camp took place in the summer of 1918 it is not thought that many of its graduates saw World War commissioned service in action.

	Number who applied for admission	Number admitted	Number commissioned
First camp, May 15, 1917	200,000	43,000	27,341
Second camp, Aug. 29, 1917	200,000	23,000	17,247
Third camp, December, 1917	----------	18,437	11,657
Total	400,000	84,437	56,245

The personnel of the third camp was made up exclusively of enlisted men already in the service. These made application for attendance through their company commanders. As each regiment was limited to a definite number of men, no figures were compiled on the number of applicants, although it is known that these were many times the number accepted. The foregoing figures relate solely to camps for the combat services and do not include the noncombatant and administrative branches of the Army, for service in which tens of thousands of officers were commissioned from civil life.

SPLENDID MEN SELECTED

When the first officers were graduated from these officers' training camps the press of the Nation heralded them as the finest body of American manhood ever grouped together. And well they might, for the exacting War Department requirements had been scrupulously carried out.

Only 1 out of 10 of the applicants was finally commissioned. This small selected group represented men of proven ability in civil life who were still sufficiently fit physically to withstand the grueling tests prescribed by the training camps.

Four out of five of the applicants who desired to attend the camps were denied this privilege. Some because of their immature years, others because they lacked a record of proved ability in civil life, others because their physical qualifications were not up to the high standard set. In addition, a large number who would otherwise have been qualified were denied the privilege of attending the camps because of the limitation in numbers.

These exceptionally qualified men were then put through the practical and exhaustive tests which the three months at training camp provided for their physical, mental, and moral qualifications to be combat officers, upon whose ability, courage, and judgment would depend the lives of the boys whom the mothers and fathers of the Nation intrusted to their care.

ENLISTED SITUATION DIFFERENT

The World War enlisted men were chosen for their lack of responsibility. Out of each 350 men who passed the required physical examination for service, 250 men received exemption because they had dependents and 100 men were accepted for service through their lack of dependents. It was the desire of the Congress that the enlisted personnel be men without family obligations, and that the spirit of this desire was fulfilled is shown by the foregoing exemptions granted to those who had passed the physical examination.

EXEMPTIONS

The final report of the provost marshal general of the Army to the Secretary of War, dated July 15, 1919, shows in table 4, page 24, that 2,780,576 men were actually inducted into the service during the World War, as compared to table 2, page 20, of the same book, which shows that 6,964,229 men received exemption from their local boards because of dependency.

This means that for every 100 men actually inducted into the service 250 men were exempted because of dependency.

This action was in line with that portion of the selective service act which authorized the President to exempt among others the following:

> Those in a status with responsibilities to persons dependent upon them for support which renders their exclusion or discharge advisable.

It is apparent from this act that Congress desired its fighting forces to be made up of men without family responsibilities. The figures quoted show that this wish was followed by the local boards.

One of the chief reasons for the difference in pay of officers and enlisted men of all armies and for all wars has been because of the difference in their ages and responsibilities. These same responsibilities continued after the emergency officers were disabled and crippled. If this difference in pay was proper when the emergency officer was well and sound, how much more necessary to continue it after he has been permanently disabled and thus prevented from earning a livelihood for the family which was dependent upon him prior to his war disability.

A FALLACY EXPOSED

Occasionally opponents state they can not see the justice in a disabled officer receiving a higher rate of compensation for his disability than a disabled enlisted man. They cite as an example of this two brothers of approximately the same age, just out of college, one attending an officers' training camp and obtaining a commission, the other enlisting and serving in the ranks. Both become equally disabled in the service. Why should one receive a higher rate of compensation for his disability than the other? This is the stock argument advanced by opponents.

There would be justice in this argument provided it were typical of the situation. It is not typical. The fundamental merits of the legislation are due to the fact that this illustration is very far from the true situation.

The officers were older than the enlisted men by an average of 12 to 15 years. They were in midcareer in civil life. A large proportion of them were married and had families dependent upon them. Many of these officers could not have accepted commissions but for the pay which they received as officers; otherwise they would not have been able to support those dependent upon them while they were in the service.

THE LEGION FIGHTS FOR ALL DISABLED

Ever since 1919 the American Legion has fought aggressively for beneficial legislation for all disabled men. Its membership is overwhelmingly from the ranks, and the Legion is responsible to a great degree for the many beneficial laws which the Congress has enacted for the relief and protection of all classes of the war's disabled.

The opponents who have fought the disabled officers' retirement measure so vigorously—in the open or through parliamentary tactics—do not dare claim that the Legion would sponsor legislation which would deprive any disabled man, enlisted or commissioned, of any rights or privileges heretofore acquired.

This "discrimination-against-the-enlisted-man" argument has been designed to create opposition on the part of the enlisted men, an attempt which has signally failed. The enlisted men do not object to their disabled officers being placed on a parity with the eight other classes of disabled World War officers, and many veteran company organizations composed wholly of enlisted men have so expressed themselves through resolutions advocating the enactment of the retirement measure for their former officers.

ENLISTED MEN FAVOR THIS LEGISLATION

The membership of the American Legion, more than three-quarters of a million strong, is composed of at least 85 per cent enlisted men. The 1,000 delegates to the nine national conventions have been thoroughly representative of the membership of the Legion. At the St. Louis caucus of the Legion, May, 1919, when they decided to drop all military titles in connection with their meetings and proceedings, a resolution was adopted calling upon Congress to grant retirement to the disabled emergency officers. Since that time nine national conventions of the Legion have been held. At each of these conventions the attitude of the Legion established at the St. Louis caucus has been reaffirmed, and resolutions adopted calling upon Congress to grant this retirement.

At its national convention held at Omaha October, 1925, a legionnaire, who had formerly favored this resolution but who now, as a Member of Congress, is opposing it, took the floor of the convention and appealed to the Legion to prevent discrimination against the enlisted men and to vote against continued advocacy of this measure.

This Congressman spoke upon the subject twice in an appealing and persuasive manner. His appeal to the 1,000 delegates to desert the disabled officers failed in its purpose, and the convention voted overwhelmingly to continue this fight for justice. Since that time no one has spoken against the measure on the floor of a Legion convention.

A FALSE IMPRESSION

Opponents of this legislation who assume the rôle of champions of the disabled enlisted men—who outnumber the disabled officers 20 to 1—strive to create the impression, by opposing this retirement measure for this ninth class of disabled World War officers, that they are conferring benefits of some sort upon the numerically greater class of disabled enlisted men. This attitude conveys a false impression. The enactment of this bill will not deprive the disabled enlisted men of a single right heretofore accorded them. On the contrary, blocking this measure is actually depriving the ninth class of disabled officers of a portion of the rights already accorded the other eight classes of officers who fought in the World War.

OFFICERS' PENSION RATE GREATER THAN ENLISTED

From the Revolutionary War to the Civil War there was no "retirement." During this long period the disabled Emergency officers received exactly the same rate of pensions as the disabled Regular officers. The amounts of these pensions were based upon the rank held by the officers. The enlisted men received much smaller pensions, but the rate was exactly the same for Emergency and Regular enlisted men.

These war-disability pension rates were paid for the Revolutionary War, for the campaign on the Wabash, for the War of 1812 with England, for the Black Hawk War, for the Indian depredations in Florida, for the Creek War, for the war with Mexico, and under certain circumstances for the Civil War.

THE GENERAL PENSION LAW

On July 14, 1862, the present general pension law was approved, which has governed disability pension payments from that day to the present year, for Regular and Emergency services, officers and privates, except those cases where subsequent enactments have made it noneffective. This general pension law set a maximum disability pension for an officer—Regular or Emergency—at $30 a month, and for an enlisted man—Regular or Emergency—at $8 a month.

CIVIL WAR

The disabled emergency Army officers of the Civil War received greater rates of pension payments under this act than the disabled enlisted men of the Civil War until May 11, 1912, when general-service pensions—not service-disability pensions, mind you—for all ranks of the Civil War over 75 years of age were increased to $30 a month by the Congress.

SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR

Disability pension payments to the emergency officers and enlisted men of the Spanish-American War were also regulated under this general pension law of July 14, 1862. The disabled emergency officers of that war continued to receive a higher rate of pension than the disabled emergency enlisted men until the act of June 5, 1920, when general-service pensions—not service-disability pensions—for all ranks of the Spanish-American War were increased to $30 a month for men over 75 years of age or permanently disabled, service connection for disability not required.

RETIREMENT FOR NAVY AND MARINE CORPS

The emergency officers of the Navy and Marine Corps, disabled in the World War, were retired by the act of June 4, 1920, approved one day prior to the approval of this Spanish-American War act of June 5, 1920, quoted above.

OUR HISTORIC POLICY

It will, therefore, be seen that from the Revolutionary War down to the present date it has been the policy of the American Government to give higher rates of disability pay or pension to the emergency officers than to the enlisted men who were disabled in time of war. These are facts which can not be contradicted, and are based upon our pension laws and their administration by the Commissioner of Pensions.

In view of these facts, can anyone claim that our national policy governing pension payments for war disabilities has been to pay the same rate to the emergency officers as the emergency enlisted men? From the Revolutionary War to the present date the contrary policy has been followed by our Government.

"RETIREMENT" CAME WITH THE CIVIL WAR

It will be seen from the foregoing that there was no "retirement" for any class of officers from the Revolutionary War to the Civil War, and that during this entire period all classes of disabled officers received the same disability pay based upon rank. So the "national policy" which the Regular Army has sought in vain to keep exclusively its own is of comparatively recent origin.

THE REASON

Retirement in the Regular Army came about in the following manner: When the Civil War broke upon us it was found that many regular officers in the higher ranks, due to their advanced age and the disabilities incident thereto, were unable to perform the active service with troops required. Following the Battle of Bull Run, July 21, 1861, the first retirement law was approved, August 3, 1861. This provided retirement for Regular Army officers with 40 consecutive years of commissioned service, and for disability not necessarily incurred in war time.

REGULAR ENLISTED MEN DO NOT GET IT

This original retirement act for the Regular Army has since been greatly enlarged by subsequent enactments. But it is apparent that one of the impelling reasons which actuated the Congress in initiating retirement was a desire to raise the efficiency standards of the Regular Army officer personnel through removing in an emergency those physically unable to withstand the hardships of campaign. It was therefore a war measure and not a peace-time measure as is so often erroneously claimed. The enlisted men of the Regular Army did not obtain retirement until February 14, 1885, and then only for length of service. The general pension law of July 14, 1862, still cares for their disabilities. They have never obtained retirement for battle or peace-time injuries.

HOW ENLISTED MEN FEEL

It has been stated by opponents that the former enlisted men are opposed to this measure, but these opponents have never satisfactorily explained the fact that, although the membership of the veterans' organizations are overwhelmingly composed of former enlisted men, all of these organizations have uniformly indorsed this legislation. A few letters and resolutions urging congressional action, written by former enlisted men, are quoted, in part, as follows:

Resolution

5733 WAYNE AVENUE,
Philadelphia, Pa., April 16, 1926.

We, the surviving noncommissioned officers and privates of A Company, Three hundred and fifteenth Infantry, Seventy-ninth Division, assembled for the purpose of discussing the merits of H. R. 4548, known as the Fitzgerald bill, making eligible for retirement disabled emergency officers who incurred disability in line of duty in the World War, have reached the following conclusions:

There were nine classes of officers who fought in the World War, the regular officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, the provisional officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, and the emergency officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps. Eight of these classes have been retired, but the one class which Congress has excepted from retirement is the disabled emergency Army officer.

We, as enlisted men of the Army in the World War, can see no reason why our emergency officers should be singled out for this discrimination by Congress, and, recognizing that the provisions of the Fitzgerald bill will give to emergency officers the recognition already given eight of the nine classes serving the colors, are 100 per cent for it.

We feel that the officers of our own company are being discriminated against in failure to place them on an equality with other officers, and as a group of enlisted men from one company only, feel that we voice the sentiments and wishes of every soldier in the country who served below the grade of a commissioned officer in expressing the wish that his officers receive treatment equal to those of the more fortunate classes.

We believe that this is a matter in which we as soldiers are not being discriminated against; on the other hand, we feel that our officers have been unfairly dealt with and demand that the wrong be righted.

EUGENE GLATFELTER,
Chairman Company A, Three hundred and fifteenth Infantry Reunion Committee, Formerly Sergeant, Company A, Three hundred and fifteenth Infantry, Seventy-ninth Division, A. E. F.

* * * * * * *

DEAR SIR: I am a totally and permanently disabled veteran of the World War, and I wish to urge upon you the duty we still owe to the disabled war-time officers who have not been retired. The passing of the emergency officers retirement bill will in no way aid me, but I feel as my friends in the American Legion feel—that discrimination has been shown against these officers; and I respectfully beg of you to give this matter your enthusiastic approval.

Very cordially yours,

EDWARD F. O'NEIL,
Formerly Sergeant, First Class.

* * * * * * *

DEAR SIR: There is a bill before the House of Representatives known as the Fitzgerald bill to take care of the disabled emergency officers of the World War.

As you are a member of the House Rules Committee, I would greatly appreciate it if you would assist in getting this bill reported favorably at an early date so that it can be voted on at this session. This is a bill that in all justice should have been passed seven or eight years ago. I realize that I am not in your district, but I will appreciate your support and may some day be able to return the favor.

I might further say that I was an enlisted man, and this bill will not affect me in any way, but I believe it should be passed.

Very truly,

DONOVAN D. MCCARTY, County Judge.

* * * * * * *

DEAR SIR: It is requested that you vote for and assist in getting through a bill to retire the disabled emergency officers of the World War on the same status as the disabled officers of the Regular Army.

For your information, the writer was a private in the emergency Army, saw service overseas on five fronts, and will assure you that our emergency officers did just as good a work as the officers of the Regular Army. Not only that, but our emergency officers faced the music with us; therefore, why shouldn't their disabilities be given the same consideration as the disabled Regular Army officers?

Very truly yours,

BEN R. CLARK.

We enlisted men do not want to be retired.

These letters speak for themselves and are typical of many others received in connection with this legislation.

BATTLE DEATHS

The dangers and hazards of the company and platoon leaders—the emergency officers—are well illustrated by the following statistics taken from The War with Germany, by Leonard P. Ayres, General Staff, chief of the statistics branch of the General Staff of the Army, published by the Government Printing Office.

This official War Department publication shows that 2,191 Army officers were killed in action or died of wounds received in action. Remember that three classes of officers were in the Army. A further analysis of this list shows that 2,040, or 93 per cent, of these officers who were killed in action came from one class—the only class still denied retirement—the emergency Army officers. The remainder of the Army officers killed, 151, or 7 per cent, came from the two classes of Army officers already in receipt of retirement—the regular and provisional Army officers.

OFFICERS' DEATH RATE HIGH

By far the greater number of deaths and casualties occurred in the Infantry and machine-gun outfits—greater than all other branches of the service, for both officers and enlisted men. Let those who are invoking parliamentary tactics against the relief of these officers examine diagram 51 on page 121 of this official publication. The statistics quoted there show that in this fighting branch of the service there were 80.5 officers killed in action for each 1,000 officers who reached France, as compared with 51.7 enlisted men killed in action for each 1,000 who reached France.

This comparison is a true index of the hazards which confronted the emergency Army officer in action. It shows that in this branch of the service that the battle deaths of the officers were 55 per cent greater than the battle deaths of the enlisted men. This will illustrate the seriousness with which the emergency Army officers took their responsibilities. These figures are eloquent with the exposures and hazards which go hand in hand with leadership and demonstrate the high spirit, the fidelity to trust well placed, which imbued those whose first thought was of victory—their men—and last of all, of self.

WOUNDED IN ACTION

Ayres's book shows further that 8,122 officers were wounded in action. Of these, 3,195 are listed as severely wounded. As only 3,030 of the emergency Army officers are now rated at more than 30 per cent disabled, it will be seen that many of the severely wounded officers have died or are now so recovered—nearly 10 years after the fighting—that their disabilities are rated at less than 30 per cent permanent. This legislation cares for the severely disabled officers. "Severely wounded" usually means one whose survival is uncertain.

WHERE DID THE OFFICERS COME FROM?

Ayres's statistics show that there were 200,000 officers. These were divided into the following groups:

From officers' training camps	96,000
Physicians	42,000
Directly from civil life	26,000
From the ranks	16,000
National Guard	12,000
Regulars	6,000
Chaplains	2,000

All of the foregoing were emergency officers except the 6,000 Regulars. It is apparent from this that it is absolutely essential in order to wage a major war successfully that the officers who do the fighting, who have actual control of the men, upon whom the lives of the enlisted men are directly dependent, are the emergency officers, for whom retirement is now sought for the severely disabled.

REGULAR OFFICERS RETIRED

Ayres states there were only 6,000 Regular Army officers in the Army at the beginning of the war. Since that date and up to 1926, 1,109 Regular Army officers have been retired for disability, and 645 Regular Army officers have been retired for reasons other than disability, a total of 1,754 Regular Army officers retired since the beginning of the war.

An analysis of the Regular officers' retirements up to January 1, 1924, showed that only 9 West Pointers had been retired for wounds received in action during the World War, although 58 provisional Army officers had been retired for battle wounds.

From the foregoing it would seem that although battle wounds are few, retirement has been accorded in generous numbers to the Regular Army officers.

The reverse has been the lot of the emergency Army officer. Battle wounds have been his portion, privation his recompense. He still awaits retirement at the hands of a grateful Nation.

RETIREMENT PROPER FOR REGULARS

The present theory back of the retirement of the Regular Army officer is that his disability—age, health, accident, or battle wounds—which prevents him from being of further use in the Army also unfits him for the competition of civil life and that he should, therefore, be retired, or pensioned, at a rate of pay sufficient to maintain himself and family. This theory is considered sound. Not only as a matter of justice, but for sound national defense policy the regular officer should be able to look forward to retirement, instead of poverty, after his usefulness in the Army has passed.

ALSO RIGHT FOR OTHERS

If this theory is sound for the regular, it is also sound for the disabled emergency Army officer. The emergency officers were professional or business men. Because of their age and the nature of their disabilities, vocational training has proved of little practical assistance. It is agreed that competition in civil life is much keener than in the Regular Army. If it is harder to meet competition with a sound body and mind in civil life, how much more difficult it is for a former officer, after years in hospital, to attempt to take up business or professional work again, in competition with men who were not in the service, and earn sufficient to maintain himself and his dependents.

Fairness and sound national policy alike demand that he receive the retirement already accorded the other eight classes of disabled officers.

PROVISIONALS GRANTED RETIREMENT

Retirement was granted the provisional officers by the act of July 9, 1918, and by the act of June 4, 1920, retirement was granted the disabled emergency officers of the Navy and Marine Corps. From 1922 to 1925 seven additional laws were enacted granting retirement to individual disabled emergency officers of the Navy and Marine Corps.

The disabled emergency Army officer, of the nine classes of disabled officers who fought in the World War, is the only class now discriminated against in this connection.

HOW ABOUT THE NAVY AND MARINE CORPS?

By the act of June 4, 1920, the disabled emergency officers of the Navy and the disabled emergency officers of the Marine Corps were granted retirement on the same terms that exist for regular and provisional officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps. Under this act 292 of the emergency officers of these services were retired, and for eight years have enjoyed the full benefits of retirement. Seven supplemental acts have been passed also.

NO ENLISTED OPPOSITION

If the enlisted man is opposed to this legislation—as its opponents claim—why has not complaint been registered during the past eight years by the enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps because of the continued retirement of their disabled emergency officers? There are 600,000 enlisted veterans of these services to register this complaint if they felt that they had been discriminated against. No such complaint has ever been made.

WAR DEPARTMENT'S POSITION

The present Secretary of War, Col. Dwight F. Davis, an emergency officer who wears the distinguished-service cross, does not oppose this legislation. However, the attitude of the General Staff has been unfortunate, and Secretary Davis's predecessors actively opposed the measure.

One of the reasons for this was the fear that the addition of the emergency officers would unduly "load down" the Regular Army retired list. In 1917 only $2,700,000 was appropriated for the pay of the retired officers of the Army. For 1927 a total of $7,364,000 was appropriated for this purpose, an increase of $4,664,000.

This increase since the beginning of the World War is more than twice the cost of retiring the disabled emergency Army officers. Battle casualties did not cause this tremendously increased cost of the retired list of the Army.

To relieve the War Department of the necessity of disbursing from its funds money not applicable to strictly military purposes, the present legislation for the retirement of disabled emergency Army officers provides that the administration of the measure be committed to the United States Veterans' Bureau. This removes all objections heretofore raised by the War Department, and the department, therefore, no longer objects to the passage of the proposed legislation.

SOUND NATIONAL DEFENSE POLICY

The legislation is sound national defense policy. Officers of our volunteer armies should not be restricted solely to youths without family responsibilities or to men of great wealth. The great class of brainy, energetic men in the midst of careers achieved by their own efforts should be considered in providing officer material for future emergencies. This has proved the most effective class of war-time officers. Yet a denial of proper disability compensation for the older men with family responsibilities is sure to affect the available officer material in a future war.

From the Revolutionary War until to-day the American Congress has always provided a higher rate of disability pay for disabled officers than it has for disabled enlisted men. Those who state the contrary are not familiar with the disability pension laws on our statute books, and the disability pension laws enacted since the Revolutionary War. An examination of these laws shows that the regular and emergency officers received the same rate of disability compensation and that this rate was based upon the rank held by the officer, whether emergency or regular.

Opponents attempt to gain credence for two misstatements, upon which their chief arguments against the measure are made. One is that it has always been our national policy to compensate emergency officers and enlisted men at the same rate of pay for their war disabilities. The other is that it has always been our national policy to compensate disabled regular officers on a different basis from disabled emergency officers.

Both statements are incorrect.

THE NAVY HAS CONSISTENTLY FAVORED THE MEASURE

The Navy Department has never opposed the retirement of disabled emergency officers; in fact, has officially favored it. It is because of this friendly attitude that retirement was granted the disabled emergency Navy and Marine Corps officers by the Congress in 1920.

The Navy, however, was not faced with a swollen retired list like the Army. In 1917 the annual appropriations for the retired list of regular officers of the Navy and Marine Corps was $3,305,399. In spite of the addition of the disabled emergency officers to this list in 1920, the total appropriation for the retired list of the Navy and Marine Corps in 1927 had only reached $4,800,228, an increase of but $1,494,829 in 10 years, or less than one-third of the increased cost of the Regular Army's retired list.

There were not as many officers in the Navy who had to be retired in order to maintain a proper efficiency standard, such as pertained in the Army. It is in part due to this that the increase in the Navy's retired list has been of a reasonable character.

NO DISCRIMINATION AGAINST THE DEAD

The wives and children of all officers, including Regular Army officers, who were killed or died of wounds during the World War have been treated on an exact parity and receive exactly the same compensation from the Veterans' Bureau. No distinction or discrimination has been made between them. This holds true for the eight classes of officers already retired, as well as for the ninth class for whom this retirement is sought.

In addition to this, the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill will not affect the dependents of any officer killed in action. As stated, the dependents of the dead emergency officers have received the same treatment accorded the dependents of all classes of officers, through the operation of the war risk insurance act.

The charge that this legislation "discriminates against the sacred dead" is therefore without foundation of fact. There has been no discrimination as between the dependents of officers killed in the war, no matter what their rank or branch of service.

To further show that the widows of emergency officers themselves do not feel that they are being discriminated against the following extracts from letters of such widows are quoted:

* * * His death was a great shock to all of us, as he seemed to be getting on so well, and feeling better than he had for some time just before the operation. The doctor said it was the shock of operation which caused cerebral hemorrhage. He suffered intensely the first week of his illness, before going to hospital. During his disability since the war we had been constantly together, which makes it doubly hard for me to be separated from my companion of so many years, but I bow in submission to God's will.

He did not live to see the passage of the retirement bill which he so much desired, but I sincerely hope it passes soon for the benefit of many others. * * *

* * * * * * *

* * * I regret to advise that Lieutenant ——— has passed away. When his physical condition permitted he was anxious to do all that he could to assist in getting this legislation through. I, therefore, trust that the next Congress will see fit to pass it and enable the remainder to benefit by it.

* * * * * * *

* * * My husband has passed away a victim of tuberculosis contracted in the service. Last winter during the short term of Congress we looked forward each day to reading in the daily papers that the Fitzgerald-Tyson bill had passed, but, of course, were disappointed. With the best of wishes in your efforts to get this bill passed at the next session. * * *

* * * * * * *

* * * I'm sure that you have not been notified of the death of my husband and am sorry, indeed, that the bill did not become a law in the last session. I hope for success in the next. * * *

* * * * * * *

* * * I beg leave to state that my husband, a disabled emergency Army officer, passed away very suddenly from the old trouble which has made him an invalid since his service in the Army. It was a great disappointment to him that the long-delayed legislation affecting men who served in this capacity had not reached fulfillment, and I hope you may yet be successful. * * *

WOMEN'S ORGANIZATIONS URGE IT

If it were a discrimination against our sacred dead, would the women's organizations of the country indorse this retirement measure as they have?

SMOKE SCREENS

This legislation in its present form has now been actively before the Congress for the past seven years. Now that its passage is imminent, a smoke screen arises. The assertion is made that the average person, veteran or Congressman, does not understand the provisions of the legislation and that if such persons did understand these provisions they would then oppose the measure.

Let us examine this mistaken argument. During the past seven years an active controversy has engaged both Houses of Congress over the legislation in its present form. Surely all Members of the House and Senate, and all disabled officers have understood its provisions.

Members of the American Legion are conceded to have understood the following from the inception of this legislation. Certainly Members of Congress have understood:

That the measure proposes to give retired pay to the disabled emergency Army officer at the same rate as the eight other classes of officers;

That this proposed rate exceeds the rate the disabled emergency officers are now receiving; and

That following its enactment the nine classes of disabled officers will receive a higher rate of pay than the regular and emergency disabled enlisted men.

No opponent will state that he has not understood the foregoing clearly from the beginning. Therefore, if he formerly supported the legislation but now opposes it, he can not justly attribute his change of position to a belated discovery that the disabled officer would receive more pay than the disabled enlisted man, because he has known this from the beginning.

His change in attitude must, therefore, be attributable to some reason other than "discrimination against the enlisted men."

THE DISABLED OFFICERS INDORSE PENDING MEASURE

The disabled officers have banded themselves together in an association entitled "The Disabled Emergency Officers of the World War." The organization of this association was slow in the beginning, as those eligible to membership were thinly scattered throughout the United States. Gradually the disabled officers in hospitals began forming themselves into chapters, until on December 31, 1920, they had a national organization of 720 members.

This membership had increased to 1,402 by December 31, 1921, in spite of 28 deaths; to 1,954 by December 31, 1922, with 30 deaths; to 2,005 December 31, 1923, with 19 deaths; to 2,051 December 31, 1924, with 32 deaths; to 2,052 December 31, 1925, with 40 deaths; to 2,159 December 31, 1926, with 97 deaths; and to 2,387 December 31, 1927, with 123 deaths. An emergency Army officer having a permanent disability of a compensable degree is eligible to membership in this organization. It will therefore be seen that in spite of 368 deaths since 1920 the membership of this association is numerically almost equal to the number eligible to retirement under the bill stated by the Veterans' Bureau to be 3,030.

The legislation now before the Congress is indorsed by this disabled emergency officers' association, as it meets the two chief questions involved. These are their recognition as disabled officers, and, secondly, the pay of retirement on the basis of rank.

These officers understand the provisions of the measure thoroughly. They believe that they are reasonably just and have backed this measure since July 11, 1921, when it was first reported by the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate.

They believe, and rightly, that their separate retired list which the War Department has insisted upon will be an honor roll, second to none, upon which any disabled American officer might well feel proud to have his name inscribed.

WHERE THE SUPPORT COMES FROM

The conscience of the Nation has been awakened to the injustice done these disabled officers, and millions of persons through their various organizations have called upon the Congress to abandon their delay and enact this just measure.

In this connection the following nationally known organizations have adopted resolutions requesting congressional action on the retirement measure:

Resolutions indorsing this legislation were also adopted by the Naval and Military Order of the Spanish-American War and by the Military Order of the Gold Star.

Following are copies of the resolutions passed by the major veteran organizations in their last national conventions:

AMERICAN LEGION

Whereas the American Legion at each of its national conventions has overwhelmingly voted to have enacted into law legislation for the retirement of emergency Army officers permanently disabled in line of duty during the World War so as to place them on the same footing as to retirement as the other eight classes of disabled officers who are now on the retired lists; and

Whereas the American Legion has previously indorsed the principles of this long-pending legislation; and

Whereas measures similar to the Tyson-Fitzgerald bills of the Sixty-ninth Congress which would have granted this justice will be introduced in the Seventieth Congress: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the American Legion in convention assembled at Paris, France, this 21st day of September, That we hereby reaffirm our previous action on this legislation and urge its enactment by the Seventieth Congress.

DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS

Whereas the disabled emergency officers of the Army are denied the privilege of retirement for physical disability that is allowed all other disabled officers, and such treatment is a discrimination against them, and a treatment not administered to the other eight classes of disabled officers who served during the World War; and

Whereas such treatment is shamefully discriminatory and grossly unjust, and has been so recognized by various organizations of veterans of the World War and other wars, by the legislatures of 12 States, and by many political, social, and civic organizations who have indorsed proposed legislation which would, if enacted, correct this injustice; and

Whereas the Disabled American Veterans of the World War have at six of their annual national conventions petitioned Congress to adopt corrective legislation in this regard, and each passing day has more strongly confirmed them in their view that the discrimination complained of is grossly unjust, and is contrary to the spirit which animated the call to the colors to which the disabled emergency officers responded; and

Whereas bills known as the Tyson and Fitzgerald bills were introduced in the Sixty-ninth Congress, but failed of ultimate passage, though a majority of both Houses favored them; and

Whereas legislation having the same purpose in view will be presented to the Seventieth Congress: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Disabled American Veterans of the World War, in seventh annual convention assembled at El Paso, Tex., June 20 to 25, 1927, do hereby heartily reaffirm the action taken at previous conventions, indorsing the privilege of retirement for disabled emergency officers on an equal basis with all other classes of disabled officers of the World War now on the retired list, and do most earnestly urge upon the Congress of the United States appropriate legislation to secure this result; and

Resolved further, That this resolution be printed and copies of the same be transmitted to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, and each Member of the Senate of the United States and each Member of the House of Representatives of the United States.

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS

Be it resolved by the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States in its twenty-eighth annual national encampment assembled at Providence, R. I., September, 1927, That they again reiterate unanimously their resolutions of past years in favor of the retirement of the disabled emergency officers of the World War on the same basis and under the same privileges of the officers of the Regular Army, without regard or reference to any stated disability; and be it further

Resolved, That we can not but look with disfavor upon any attempt to sidetrack this worthy and equitable measure and decided discrimination between the Regular Army Establishment and between men who offered their lives in the emergency and percentage of battle casualties, as well as in numbers, far exceeding that of the Regular Establishment; and

Whereas a poll of the Members of Congress indicated sentiment in favor of the passage of this measure by a vote of 5 to 1, and the criticism can only be laid at the doors of the steering committees of Congress for failure to act upon this measure; and

Whereas Congress by the enactment of the selective service act of 1917 acknowledged all officers, both of the Regular, National Guard, and National Army, to be on one single phase; and

Whereas this became effective by General Orders, No. 75, of the War Department, series 1918; and

Whereas of the nine classes of officers who saw service during the World War, the disabled emergency officers are singled out to be the only class which has not been recognized or provided for by way of retirement; and

Whereas practically every veteran, military, and patriotic organization, as well as countless State legislatures and chambers of commerce, have passed resolutions pleading with Congress to right this wrong: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Veterans of Foreign Wars, That we petition Congress to pass this measure without regard or respect to any percentage of disability; and be it further

Resolved, That the Veterans of Foreign Wars make this legislation a matter of their special interest during the coming year, and that each department place the matter squarely before the members of their community so that they might know the situation and bring the matter to the attention of their Members of Congress, to all of which the Veterans of Foreign Wars pledge their undivided and hearty support.

MILITARY ORDER OF THE WORLD WAR

Whereas the Military Order of the World War has, in national convention, repeatedly indorsed legislation which would grant retirement privileges and pay to emergency Army officers disabled in line of duty during the World War, placing them on an equal footing with all other branches of the military and naval forces; and

Whereas bills to remove the present discrimination against this one remaining class of disabled officers of the World War have been pending in the National Congress since the armistice; have twice passed the Senate; have been repeatedly approved and duly reported by the congressional committees concerned; and a large majority of the Senators and Representatives have expressed themselves as favoring the enactment of the proposed legislation; and

Whereas bills similar in text to the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill of the Sixty-ninth Congress will again be presented to the Seventieth Congress: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Military Order of the World War, in seventh national convention assembled at Baltimore, Md., October 5–7, 1927, hereby reaffirms its stand on this meritorious legislation by again heartily indorsing the principles of the proposed legislation; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, to all Members of Congress, and to the national headquarters of the Disabled Emergency Officers of the World War.

The following American Legion departments adopted resolutions in favor of legislation for the retirement of disabled emergency Army officers at their 1927 conventions:

Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Connecticut, District of Columbia, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nevada, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin, and Wyoming.

THE PRESS INDORSES IT

The leading newspapers of America indorse the measure. These include not only the great metropolitan dailies in every section of the country, but the smaller papers which serve the rural communities of the country, including the farm journals and weeklies.

The following newspapers and periodicals have run editorials favorable to legislation granting retirement to permanently disabled emergency Army officers of the World War. Some of these have run two, three, and four editorials, and, no doubt, papers other than those listed have run similar favorable editorials:

In order to show the feeling of the press toward the pending legislation the following editorials are quoted, being similar in tone to hundreds which have appeared in newspapers throughout the country:

[From the Christian Science Monitor]

However much one may approve of President Coolidge's economy program, it does not seem justifiable to use it as an excuse for preventing the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill, putting the disabled emergency Army officers on the same retirement pay as the Regulars, from coming to vote in the Congress. Regular officers who were disabled in the line of duty during the World War have been allowed to retire on 75 per cent of their war-time pay. Likewise, emergency officers in the Navy and the Marine Corps. But emergency officers in the Army have been cut off with a small disability pension. The Tyson-Fitzgerald bill aims to remedy this discrimination, which is keeping close on 2,000 disabled emergency Army officers in want. Less than $2,000,000 a year would be required to put them on the same footing as their brother officers. Surely, then, this bill should be rapidly pushed forward to passage.

[From the Chicago Daily Tribune]

An emergency officer is one commissioned for the war emergency. The emergency officers of the Navy and Marine Corps in the late war were granted retirement legislation. The Regular and provisional officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps have been granted retirement legislation. The disabled emergency officers of the Army have been denied it for seven years. Identical bills to correct this discrimination providing for the retirement of the latter class of officers who are disabled in the performance of duty 30 per cent or more are now pending on the Senate and House Calendars, having been reported favorably by the Military Affairs Committees of each House. This measure has the approval of virtually all the veterans' associations, notably the American Legion, but it is feared that a minority in Congress may obstruct action so that the measure will be swamped in the short session.

The Veterans' Bureau estimates that there are 2,079 disabled emergency Army officers who would be reached by this bill. They include many men decorated for gallantry. They represent largely the combat leaders, captains, and lieutenants, and 93 per cent of the officers killed in action came from this class that alone of all the nine classes of officers in the three services has been denied recognition.

The cost of this provision does not matter. The Republic owes them proper provision, whatever it will cost. But the Veterans' Bureau estimates that it will mean approximately only $1,334,988 annually, and this Nation is not in such straits that it must deny these neglected men the aid they deserve. It is both injustice and bad public policy longer to discriminate against them.

[From the Washington Post]

For the third time since the close of the war the Senate Committee on Military Affairs has indorsed a policy of justice to the only officers of the American Expeditionary Forces for whom retirement provision has not yet been made. The committee has directed a report on the bill to make "eligible for retirement" certain officers with those forces who incurred physical disability in the line of duty. There were nine classes of officers of the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps who fought in the World War. Of these eight have been made eligible for retirement, and the only remaining class not thus treated are those who were commissioned in the "emergency army" and were disabled "in the line of duty." When the bill was introduced, there were living 1,986 men who served in the emergency army who would be beneficiaries under its terms. Twenty of these have since answered to the last muster roll and are beyond benefiting from any action which Congress may take.

Twice since 1921 the Senate has passed a similar bill by majorities of 3 to 1. Three times the House Committee on Military Affairs has reported a similar bill favorably, but on each occasion the existing parliamentary situation was such that action by the House was not taken. The bill extends the retirement benefits only to emergency officers who are rated as more than 10 per cent disabled, and it gives to those men simply the same consideration as was shown to their comrades in the other eight classes who performed similar services for their country, but were more fortunately situated on the rolls of the War and Navy Departments.

[From the St. Louis Globe-Democrat]

For some reason that is not understood by the public, disabled emergency officers of the Army who served in the World War are denied retirement with pay, while eight other classifications of officers who perhaps did no more valorous service have been made eligible to such retirement. According to compilation by the Veterans' Bureau on March 31, 1925, only 2,079 disabled emergency Army officers would have been eligible for retirement at that time.

Why is this discrimination permitted? And who is responsible? Emergency Navy and Marine Corps officers, Regular Army, Navy, and Marine Corps officers, and provisional Army, Navy, and Marine Corps officers have been granted disability retirement privileges. Why has the case of the emergency Army officer been treated differently from the cases of the eight other classifications?

This discrimination in reward appears particularly strange when it is shown in a report of the national legislative committee of the American Legion, made a matter of congressional record last June, that the majority of the then Members of the House and Senate were favorable to legislation placing the emergency Army officers on the same plane with their brother officers of the eight other classifications. In the Senate, according to Member letters to the Legion, 70 Senators were supporting, 6 were friendly, 5 noncommittal, and 15 opposed to the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill extending the relief to emergency Army officers. House Members supporting the bill numbered 276, with 74 classed as friendly, 60 noncommittal, and 16 opposed.

The American Legion has been assidiously working seven years for the passage of relief measures for disabled officers, and a measure granting emergency Army officers the prayed-for justice has been actively before the Congress for five years. Friendly and supporting Members of the House and Senate "are prevented from voting * * * by the use of parliamentary procedure invoked by a small group of powerful opponents who occupy key positions," says the American Legion report. In the meantime some 2,079 platoon, company, and battalion commanders who led their men in the most desperate fighting the Nation has ever known are denied privileges and relief that have been granted their brother officers who fought beside them. The measure ought to be brought to a vote at this session.

[From the Pittsburgh Press]

A great wrong against emergency Army officers disabled in the World War will be righted, except as to 30 officers who died from their wounds during the last year, if Congress passes the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill.

It is almost unbelievable that the Government has made no provision to allow retirement pay to disabled emergency officers, although officers of the Regular Army who were disabled in the World War have been retired on 75 per cent of their war-time pay. The emergency officers and the Regular Army officers performed the same kind of service in the World War and suffered the same from wounds and hardships.

To make the case even worse, disabled emergency officers in both the Navy and Marine Corps receive the same retirement pay as the regular officers.

The discrimination is senseless. The Tyson-Fitzgerald bill was reported favorably from the Military Affairs Committees of both Houses of Congress in the last session; but, asserting a desire for economy, the House and Senate leaders did not allow the bill to come to a vote.

To again refuse to pass the bill on the economy plea would be rank injustice. There are 1,800 disabled emergency Army officers and the estimated amount of money necessary to give them retirement pay would be $1,190,000 a year, less than 1 per cent of the money being received each year by the United States from our war debtors. It is also well to remember that Secretary of the Treasury Mellon has estimated that our tax payments can be reduced $250,000,000 next year.

[From the Dallas Morning News]

Various veteran organizations will urge upon the coming short session of Congress passage of the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill, now pending in the two Houses. The recent American Legion convention in Philadelphia indorsed the bill and placed it upon the priority list of its objectives at the next Congress.

The unanimous agreement of veteran associations upon legislation does not necessarily assure its justice or utility, since the ex-soldier is not always unselfish and the leverage possessed by organization must always be considered along with the things he may urge by resolution. But in the present instance, even though there may be legitimate arguments against the bill, it can not be denied that legislation is sought to remove a discrimination that exists against a given class of men who have served their country, and it is a matter of record that Congress is only asked to carry out its own pledge.

The Tyson-Fitzgerald bill provides for the retirement pay of 75 per cent of the compensation paid before discharge to emergency officers of the Army who incurred during the war permanent disability of 30 per cent or more. At the present time it affects slightly in excess of 2,000 disabled emergency officers.

The majority report of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, as presented by Congressman FITZGERALD, points out that there were nine classes of officers who served during the war and that eight of these (Regular officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps; provisional officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps; and emergency officers of the Navy and Marine Corps) have been granted by Congress the privilege of retirement for disability incurred in line of duty, leaving only this one class of emergency officers not yet provided for.

Against the objections advanced by the minority of the committee is the argument that compensation based on earning capacity is the fairest standard of recompense and is accepted by courts in damage cases.

This is the principal objection of the minority report, which points out that it is not fair to the enlisted man to give the disabled officer higher pay nor to emergency officers of less than 30 per cent disability. That argument, however, should have also applied to enlisted men in the emergency and temporary classes already benefited by Congress. The minority report also argues that, even if there is an injustice in discrimination, it can not be cured by adding another unjust burden on the country.

A point referred to by the American Legion convention at Philadelphia that has been overlooked by Congress is that these disabled emergency officers entered the service under a solemn pledge of the country which has not, in their case, been kept. In the selective conscription law as passed by Congress and approved by President Wilson May 18, 1917, section 10 of article 7 read in part:

"That all officers and enlisted men of the forces herein provided for, other than the Regular Army, shall be in all respects on the same footing as to pay, allowances, and pensions as officers and enlisted men of the corresponding grades and lengths of service in the Regular Army."

Nine-tenths of the men who took commissions never read or thought of the provisions of that paragraph at that time. Their service was voluntary and unselfish. Should censure attach to the little group of 2,000 who were disabled in service now that they find an unfulfilled pledge upon the statute books of their country?

The Tyson-Fitzgerald bill has been twice passed by the Senate. In all justice it should be made law by the affirmative vote of the House.

[From the New York Evening Post]

Twice has the Senate passed the bill providing for the retirement of our disabled emergency Army officers, each time by an overwhelming vote, and twice has the House—or, rather, an obstructive minority of the House—refused to allow the bill to come to a vote in that body. There are nine classes of officers who were disabled in the World War. For eight of these Congress has enacted retirement legislation. Included in the eight are the emergency officers of the Navy and the emergency officers of the Marine Corps. Only the emergency officers of the Army have been neglected.

Discrimination could not go further. If it reflected the prevailing feeling in Congress, it would be an indictment of the national sense of justice. But it does not represent the general feeling either at Washington or through the country. It merely testifies to the fatal effectiveness of the abuse of parliamentary tactics.

The willingness of a few Congressmen to punish American citizens for the heinous crime of having served their country in a time of crisis, to their own injury, imposes upon the majority of the House, and especially upon the leaders, the duty of asserting the right of the majority to rule. The emergency officers of the Army have waited long enough for simple justice.

[From the Kansas City Times]

Here is one illustration of the slow and uncertain procedure of Congress when a matter demanding attention is before it: Officers who participated in the World War were divided into nine classes—that is, Regular, provisional, and emergency officers in the Army, in the Navy, and in the Marine Corps. The Nation's obligation to make some provision for such of these officers as were disabled through performance of duty was recognized shortly after the close of the war. The result was that eight of the nine classes of disabled officers were placed on the retired list, with moderate compensation privileges. Only the Army emergency group was left out, the emergency officers of both the Navy and Marine Corps having been provided for.

Why discriminate against the single group, one out of the nine? No satisfactory answer has been forthcoming. There are only about 2,000 disabled officers involved in this one class. But they deserve equal treatment with the rest. Most of them are men past middle age; many have dependents, and a considerable number were drawn into Army service from the professions where remuneration had been limited. A bill now pending in Congress is designed to make necessary provision for this limited class of World War veterans. It is known as the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill. Twice it has passed the Senate; four times it has been reported favorably by a House committee. Yet, due to one of those deep mysteries that now and then enshroud action of a branch of Congress, the measure has never been allowed to reach a vote in the House.

Arguments of economy do not hold, because of the small number of veterans concerned and the limited expense that would be necessary to place them on the retirement list. Arguments from principle similarly are valueless, since the same type of recognition now sought long ago was accorded the eight other classes, two of them emergency classes. Nor is any impairment of the rights of enlisted men involved. The best evidence of this is the fact the American Legion, in which enlisted men strongly predominate, has called for enactment of the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill or its equivalent in every convention it has held for the last six years. Belated justice ought to be done these officers.

[From the Los Angeles Examiner]

Two officers fought side by side in the American Army. Both were disabled in the line of duty.

One was a Regular officer. He was allowed by Congress to retire on 75 per cent of his war-time pay. He is comfortable for life, as he should be after offering his life and sacrificing his health in the Nation's service.

The other man, likewise wounded and permanently disabled, was an emergency Army officer, a civilian who had come up through a citizens' training camp. He performed the same war-time service as the Regular officer and got the same war-time pay. But when he was crippled he found Congress had made no provision for him to retire on 75 per cent of war-time pay. All he got was a small disability pension. Instead of being comfortable for life he was in want.

This is the situation of 1,800 disabled emergency Army officers. They are the sole class of officers who are thus unfairly treated. Retirement pay is allowed not only to disabled Regular Army officers, but to disabled emergency officers in the Navy and Marine Corps.

The Congress which meets to-day should remedy this injustice by passing the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill, putting the disabled emergency Army officers on the same retirement pay as the Regulars. The bill would have passed last session if Senators and Congressmen had had a chance to pass it, but the dominant steering committees in House and Senate prevented it from coming to vote on the alleged ground that it violated the President's economy program.

Nobody will believe that the President wants to economize on a single class of disabled war veterans selected for persecution. If the country were impoverished we ought to sell bonds to raise the $1,990,000 a year which it will cost to care for these men the few years they are still with us. But we are not impoverished; Congress finds a Treasury so full that it can refund $250,000,000 to the 1925 income-tax payers.

The Tyson-Fitzgerald bill should promptly be reported out of committee to both Houses of Congress, given a preferred place on the calendar, and passed.

[From the Colorado Springs Gazette]

The American Legion puts at the head of its legislative program for the coming session of Congress a bill authorizing retirement for disabled emergency Army officers. The Legion has been fighting the battle of the disabled ever since it was organized in St. Louis some eight years ago. It has won most every case except this one and it intends to press for action on the matter until justice is accorded, and what is asked is no more than justice.

Nine classes of officers fought in the World War—regular, provisional, and emergency officers in Army, Navy, and Marine Corps. Regular and provisional disabled officers in all three services were granted retirement privileges as a matter of course. Emergency officers in the Navy and Marine Corps were quickly accorded the same treatment. They held equal status in war; they deserve to hold equal status in peace. The disabled emergency Army officer alone is denied retirement and the fact amounts to rank discrimination. The Legion insists that this injustice be corrected.

Nothing is asked that has not already been granted in other like cases. The request does not violate any established principle; in fact, it is in keeping with long-established policy with respect to the armed forces. The effort is not made to claim for the able-bodied emergency officer any of the privileges that go with regular service in the Army. The claim is advanced in behalf of disabled officers only and a disabled emergency officer rates the same consideration that is shown a disabled regular officer. His disability by reason of service is as certain; his incapacity to earn a living is no less; his material needs are no easier to meet. The disabled emergency officer rightfully can advance every claim that is put forward in behalf of regular or provisional officer, and when he is denied equal treatment he is denied simple justice and made the object of rank discrimination.

The Legion is on firm ground when it insists that the Government correct this condition and it is to be hoped that Congress will not be long in meeting the request.

CONGRESSMEN FAVOR THE RETIREMENT PRINCIPLE

The attitude of an overwhelming majority in both Senate and House is favorable toward retiring the disabled emergency officers, and these bodies would pass the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill with a bang if allowed to vote upon it.

Here is the way the Members of the Senate and House stand at present on the measure, as shown by their own letters written recently on this subject:

	Supporting	Friendly	Noncommittal	Opposed	No word or vacancies	Total
Senate	74	5	8	8	1	96
House	268	83	63	10	11	435

This analysis shows the situation. It is the actual attitude of the legislators, given over their own signatures.

These friendly and supporting Members of the House and Senate have been prevented from voting upon this measure which they favor by the use of parliamentary procedure, invoked by a small group of powerful opponents who occupy key positions.

THE CONGRESS WILL ENACT IT

The measure has twice passed the Senate (50 to 14 and 63 to 14), and will pass again by a greater majority when brought to a vote. It will pass the House by an overwhelming majority when a vote is taken upon it. It is the desire of the Congress and the Nation to enact this legislation.

WASHINGTON WAS RIGHT

Washington was right. The sound national policy which he established of rewarding all officers at half pay, on the basis of rank, has been followed for all war disabled officers without regard to their branch of service for the greater part of our national history.

Many false premises and syllogisms are employed by opponents to bolster up their fallacious conclusions. One is that the disabled emergency Army officer should not be retired, because he planned to remain in the Army for the duration of the war only, at the termination of which he anticipated resuming his civilian occupation.

THE WAR LASTS TILL DEATH

But when this emergency officer becomes permanently disabled, helpless, because of his war disabilities, his plans for after the war have gone awry. Will any thoughtful person contend that "the war is over" for a person permanently disabled? The war for him lasts until his death. He can not resume his civilian occupation with assurance of success, for competition is keener in civil life than in the peace-time Army. His family is still dependent upon him. His disability is permanent. Why, then, should his financial recompense for disability be only temporary, as compared with all other classes of officers with like disabilities, whose financial recompense has been made permanent through retirement?

Sound national defense policy requires clear vision on this subject, such as Washington possessed, but which lesser leaders fail to catch. Do those who would depart from our historical national policy desire in the event of another war that the officer personnel be restricted solely to men of wealth, to men of independent incomes, who, because of their financial independence, can maintain themselves and their families in the event of their serious disability?

The failure to recognize the family responsibilities of the disabled emergency Army officers might well affect our national defense through confining our leaders of combat troops to the wealthy sons of the affluent class.

A measure so in accord with America's historic policy, so urgently needed, so fundamentally just, will ultimately be enacted into law, and I firmly believe that this will occur at this session of Congress.

It is almost unbelievable that the class which furnished 90 per cent of the combat officers of the World War and suffered 93 per cent of the officer battle deaths, should be singled out for especial neglect.

DYING OFF RAPIDLY

Almost 400 of these brave men have died since this legislation was first presented to the Congress. It is now nearly 10 years after the war. The ages of these disabled officers who still survive compare favorably with the ages of the present Members of Congress.

How would these Congressmen view the situation, if, with broken and maimed bodies, they were forced to support themselves and their families upon a few dollars a day, when they realized that the shattered body and reduced income was due solely to their patriotism—to their willingness, their desire, to risk all and play a man's part in defense of their country?

WEARY YEARS OF WAITING

These crippled officers have now waited 10 long, weary years. Years spent in pain for many, in discomfort for others. All have been definitely weighted down in "life's handicap." These 10 years have been years of penury, years of scrimping and saving, years of forced economy on the necessities of their families. Do you think that these officers alone have paid? Ask their wives and children whether they have been well housed, sufficiently dressed, properly educated, adequately fed, during this 10-year period of weary waiting, years during which the country has teemed with prosperity. It isn't the disabled officer alone whom Congress has forced to pay for the privilege of defending our country in its hour of danger.

WILL FIGHT TO THE END

The three thousand and odd disabled emergency officers who have thus far been neglected by their supposedly grateful Government are not discouraged by the failure of the Congress to act. They have naturally been disappointed over the inability of the Members to vote on their bill, and they have been saddened at the thought that, while the legislation was being held up during the past sessions of parliamentary procedure, their comrades were dying of their war disabilities, and have therefore been permanently denied the justice so rightly due them from the Nation they protected at the cost of their own lives.

Would you expect discouragement from the men—the combat officers—who led the troops in the fiercest fighting in which the American soldiers have ever been engaged, and whose fortitude and ability finally overwhelmed the greatest military machine which the world has ever known?

No. These brave men, though badly crippled and disabled, are not discouraged. They know that their cause is just and that huge majorities in the House and the Senate will vote for their measure when they are allowed to do so. They also know that a vote can not be permanently prevented by the parliamentary procedure which adversaries have invoked in the past. They know that the American Legion, three-quarters of a million strong, is actively backing the measure. They know that the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled American Veterans, the Military Order of the World War, and all other recognized veterans' organizations are with them in this fight for justice. They appreciate the loyalty of their former comrades and they know that their comrades will not desert them in their hour of need, but will push on steadfastly until the final victory is gained.

A MILITARY COMMITTEE BILL

The Tyson-Fitzgerald bill was not drawn by the American Legion, as has been stated. It was drawn by the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate, which reported it July 11, 1921. The War Department opposed the Legion's retirement bill and the Senate committee, therefore, amended the Bursum bill to meet the War Department's chief objections. In the nine years that the officers' retirement measures have been pending in the House and the Senate, this is the only form in which the legislation has ever been reported by the committees of the House and the Senate.

HERE IS THE BILL

H. R. 500, Seventieth Congress, first session—In the House of Representatives, December 5, 1927

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation and ordered to be printed.

A bill making eligible for retirement under certain conditions officers and former officers of the World War, other than officers of the Regular Army, who incurred physical disability in line of duty while in the service of the United States during the World War

Be it enacted, etc., That all persons who have served as officers of the Army of the United States during the World War, other than as officers of the Regular Army, who during such service have incurred physical disability in line of duty and who have been, or may hereafter be, rated in accordance with law at not less than 30 per centum permanent disability by the United States Veterans' Bureau, shall, from date of receipt of application by the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, be placed upon, and thereafter continued on, a separate retired list, hereby created, to be known as the emergency officers' retired list of the World War, with the rank held by them when discharged from their commissioned service, and shall be entitled to the same privileges as are now or may hereafter be provided for by law or regulations for officers of the Regular Army who have been retired for physical disability incurred in line of duty, and shall be entitled to all hospitalization privileges and medical treatment as are now or may hereafter be authorized by the United States Veterans' Bureau, and shall receive from date of receipt of their applications retired pay at the rate of 75 per centum of the pay to which they were entitled at the time of their discharge from their commissioned service, except pay under the act of May 18, 1920: Provided, That all pay and allowances to which such persons or officers may be entitled under the provisions of this law shall be paid solely out of the military and naval compensation appropriation fund of the United States Veterans' Bureau, and shall be in lieu of all disability compensation benefits to such officers or persons provided in the war risk insurance act of October 6, 1917, and amendments thereto, except as otherwise authorized herein and except as provided by the act of December 18, 1922: Provided further, That all persons who have served as officers of the Army of the United States during the World War, other than as officers of the Regular Army, who during such service have incurred physical disability in line of duty, and who have heretofore or may hereafter be rated less than 30 per centum and not more than 10 per centum permanent disability by the United States Veterans' Bureau, shall, from date of receipt of application by the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, be placed upon, and thereafter continued on, the emergency officers' retired list of the World War, created by this act, with the rank held by them when discharged from their commissioned service, but without retired pay, and shall be entitled only to such compensation and other benefits as are now or may hereafter be provided by law or regulations of the United States Veterans' Bureau, together with all privileges as are now or may hereafter be provided for by law or regulations for officers of the Regular Army who have been retired for physical disability incurred in line of duty: Provided further, That the retired list created by this act shall be published annually in the Army Register.

SEC. 2. No person shall be entitled to benefits under the provisions of this act except he make application as hereinbefore provided and his application is received in the United States Veterans' Bureau within 12 months after the passage of this act: Provided, That the said director shall establish a register and applications made hereunder shall be entered therein as of the actual date of receipt and in the order of receipt in the Veterans' Bureau, and such register shall be conclusive as to date of receipt of any application filed under this act. The term "World War" as used herein is defined as including the period from April 6, 1917, to July 2, 1921.

NUMBER OF BENEFICIARIES AND COST

The United States Veterans' Bureau has compiled the following table showing the number of beneficiaries under the proposed legislation and the cost of retiring them:

$388,137.50×12=$4,657,650, annual cost of retirement.
$216,436×12=$2,597,232, annual compensation.
$4,657,650−$2,597,232=$2,060,418, annual increased cost of retirement.
This statement excludes 960 arrested T. B. cases receiving a statutory $50 award where the tuberculosis has been evaluated according to the rating schedule at less than 30 per cent permanent partial.

An examination of the above table shows that the total annual cost of retiring the 3,030 eligibles will be $4,657,650, but when the $2,597,232 they now receive annually as compensation is deducted it makes the increased annual cost of retiring these officers only $2,060,418. In connection with these statistics it must be remembered that the death rate among men wounded, or who have suffered great physical strain, is exceedingly high and that they will die much sooner than the ordinary expectancy of life figures would indicate.

Compare this cost of relieving these badly crippled and maimed officers with the $635,000,000 Government surplus which was on hand the end of the last fiscal year. To consider the financial relief through tax reduction to be given the taxpayers is to agree that the small cost of this just relief measure for the crippled officers should not stand in the way of its enactment into law.

In hearings on this legislation during previous sessions, Members of Congress expressed themselves in the following terms with reference to the cost of the measure:

The time to figure the cost of this measure or any other war measure was in April, 1917. This is one of the necessary, inevitable costs of the war, and I do not care whether it goes into five, six, or seven figures. It will have to be met eventually. There is no Member of Congress who was in the Sixty-fifth Congress who was not determined that the boys who went across and fought in the World War should be properly cared for. You will find that expression in the RECORD in the discussion of every appropriation bill at that time. (Representative LAGUARDIA.)

The Congress of the United States rightly did not quibble over expense when it came to putting these men on the firing line. (Representative JEFFERS.)

Statistics given in The War with Germany, by Leonard P. Ayres, chief of the statistics branch of the General Staff of the Army, an official publication, show that war expenditures during the final 10 months of the conflict averaged over $44,000,000 a day. This, when taken into consideration with the fact that the additional cost to the Government to retire the disabled emergency officers, who played such a conspicuous part in winning the war, is but a little over $2,000,000 a year, makes the sum involved insignificant. Or, in other words, the $2,000,000 added cost to retire these gallant men, if assessed annually among our population of 110,000,000 people, would figure down to a postage stamp.

HISTORY OF THE LEGISLATION

The nine-year history of this legislation in the Congress is in reality the history of a series of efforts on the part of its opponents to kill the legislation in committee. The Legion, and friendly legislators on their part, have endeavored to overcome this form of strategy through obtaining a vote upon the measure on the floor of the Senate and the House.

The opposition of the War Department, and the influence of this opposition upon the Military Affairs Committees of the Senate and House, have been the chief obstacles to retirement and the determining factors in the amendments which have modified the original form of the legislation and caused the Legion and the other veteran organizations to indorse the present Tyson and Fitzgerald bills.

During this nine-year struggle in committee each side has given ground. The War Department no longer opposes the legislation officially. This is chiefly due to the Legion's acceptance of certain of the War Department's demands for amendment to the original retirement measure.

Now that the legislation is about to be enacted into law and the nine-year fight for the disabled emergency Army officers won, some opponents now say, "You have modified the form of the original measure; therefore I am opposed to the legislation in its present form." We shall see whether this assertion is backed up by sound reasoning, as the measure cares for the officers who have been severely disabled permanently.

SIXTY-SIXTH CONGRESS

Straight retirement for disability, such as has been extended to the other eight classes of officers, was the original purpose of the Legion, and legislation was requested in this form from the Congress in 1919. The War Department thereupon began vigorous opposition to this straight retirement measure. On July 17, 1919, the Secretary of War wrote a letter to the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the House, to which the legislation had been referred, expressing the War Department's disapproval of the measure and opposing the retirement under the same conditions as received by officers of the Regular Army. The Military Affairs Committee of the House thereupon refused to report the measure.

The Stevenson bill was then introduced in the House on December 3, 1919. The form of this bill was altered in the hope that it would be referred to a committee other than the House Military Affairs Committee, which was still holding up the original retirement measure.

This Stevenson bill provided compensation for the emergency officers who incurred disabilities that officers of the Regular Army received on being retired for like disabilities. Notwithstanding this change in form, the Stevenson bill was referred to the House Military Affairs Committee.

However, on February 28, 1920, the Military Affairs Committee was discharged on the bill and it was referred to the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House; on March 2, 1920, this committee was discharged and the bill referred to the Ways and Means Committee; and on March 11, 1920, this latter committee was discharged and the bill again referred to the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee.

The War Department opposition to the legislation continued, notwithstanding the change in the form of the measure. On March 13, 1920, the Secretary of War wrote a letter to the chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, estimating that 19,910 emergency officers would come under this bill, and receive annual payments of $31,099,420. This preposterous estimate being contained in an official letter, the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee hesitated and deferred action on the bill.

NAVY ACTS INDEPENDENTLY

In the meantime the Legion had been in contact with the Navy Department on the question of the retirement of the disabled emergency officers of the Navy and Marine Corps. More progressive than the Army, the Navy realized the justice of the legislation and its value as sound national defense policy.

Accordingly, in May, 1920, the Secretary of the Navy wrote a letter to Congress requesting the enactment of legislation to retire the disabled emergency officers of the Navy and Marine Corps and submitted a draft of the amendment he proposed. Congress immediately responded to this request and provided retirement for the disabled emergency officers of the Navy and Marine Corps in the act approved June 4, 1920. This act of Congress removed the discrimination against these two classes of officers, leaving the disabled emergency Army officers as the only class discriminated against out of the nine classes of officers who fought in the World War.

In the meantime no action was obtained from the House Military Affairs Committee on the retirement measure or from the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee on the Stevenson bill. As a matter of fact, the House Military Affairs Committee did not report its bill and never has to this day reported a bill affecting the disabled emergency officers.

On January 26, 1921, Mr. STEVENSON introduced a bill slightly amending his former measure, which was also referred to the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House. The committee reported this bill favorably on February 2, 1921. The session was then drawing to a close. No action was obtained on it on the floor of the House, and the measure died a month later with the expiration of the Sixty-sixth Congress on March 4, 1921.

SIXTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS

The Stevenson bill was again introduced in the House and again referred to the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. No hearings were held, and the committee took no action on the measure.

On April 11, 1921, the Johnson bill was introduced in the House and referred to the House Military Affairs Committee. This bill provided retirement as extended to the other eight classes of officers. No hearings were held by the House Military Affairs Committee on this retirement bill, in spite of repeated requests on the part of the veterans.

The Bursum bill was then introduced on May 4, 1921, in the Senate. Like the Johnson bill it provided retirement as extended to the eight other classes of officers. War Department opposition to the measure continued. This opposition influenced certain members of the Senate Military Affairs Committee, to which the measure was referred. The friends of the legislation on the Senate committee, in order to obtain a favorable report, amended the measure so as to meet the chief points of opposition raised by the War Department in the two years it had fought the legislation.

THE AMENDED BURSUM BILL

Under the straight retirement measure—accorded the other eight classes of officers—a disabled officer is examined by a board of Regular Army officers, some of whose members must be regular medical officers. If the board finds that the officer's disability has unfitted him for active duty with troops in the field, the board recommends his retirement for life at three-fourths of the pay and allowances he is then receiving, and he is placed on the regular retired list for life.

Under the Bursum bill as reported by the Senate military Affairs Committee on July 11, 1921, the following amendments were made to meet the War Department's opposition:

First. Examination for retirement would be made by civilian medical officers of the Veterans' Bureau instead of by a Regular Army retiring board.

Second. Eligibility to retirement was increased to 30 per cent permanent disability instead of ability to perform active duty with troops in the field.

Third. The Veterans' Bureau was required to pay the emergency officers retired in this manner instead of the War Department.

BURSUM BILL REPORTED

As amended in this form, the Senate Military Affairs Committee reported the Bursum bill favorably to the Senate on July 11, 1921, the first time a Military Affairs Committee had reported the legislation.

BURSUM BILL PASSES SENATE

In spite of the amendments, opposition from the War Department continued, and friends of the measure were unable to bring it to a vote in the Senate until February 21, 1922, when it passed the upper body 50 to 14, and was forwarded to the House, where it was immediately referred to the House Military Affairs Committee.

HOUSE COMMITTEE STILL WITHHOLDS APPROVAL

Following a long series of efforts on the part of the Legion, the House Military Affairs Committee finally granted hearings on the Bursum bill. At these hearings the case of the disabled officers was presented fully. More than a score of them appeared and exhibited their battle wounds as mute advocates for the legislation. Every recognized veterans' organization appeared in behalf of the measure.

In spite of the efforts of the friends of the bill, War Department influence still prevailed. The House Military Affairs Committee held up the bill for more than a year, declining to report it out. A petition signed by 235 Members of the House—containing more than a majority of each party in the lower body—was finally presented to the House Military Affairs Committee requesting the report of the measure. This the committee declined to do, and the bill died with the expiration of the Sixty-seventh Congress in March, 1923.

CONFERENCE OF VETERANS' ORGANIZATIONS

During the summer recess of 1923 the veterans' organizations were faced with the following problem: The legislation had been actively pushed for four years, but in all that time the Military Affairs Committee of the House had refused to report a bill and the Senate Military Affairs Committee had declined to report any measure which did not conform to the chief War Department objections.

The question to be decided therefore was, Shall straight retirement legislation be pushed—which could not be gotten out of the Military Affairs Committees—or legislation conforming to the War Department objections, which could at least be gotten out of the Senate Military Affairs Committee?

Accordingly a conference was called in the city of Washington during the summer of 1923, attended by representatives of all reputable World War veterans' organizations, to consider the form of the legislation to introduce in the coming Congress. This conference was attended by duly accredited representatives of the American Legion, the National Guard Association, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled American Veterans, the Disabled Emergency Officers of the World War, and the Military Order of the World War, and a designated representative of the General Staff of the Army.

THE BILL WAS AGREED UPON

Sessions were held for three days. The form of the legislation was discussed at length. The representatives of the veterans' organizations present finally agreed unanimously to push the measure in the form it had passed the Senate in order to meet the major objections of the War Department, for no progress could be made unless the Senate Military Affairs Committee would report the measure.

It was recommended that the permanent disability rating for which retirement should be granted be reduced from 30 per cent to 20 per cent. At the request of the General Staff representative it was further agreed that the retired list should be kept in the Veterans' Bureau, although it should also be published in the Army Register. In other respects the bill agreed upon by the conference was substantially the same as the Bursum bill in the form it had passed the Senate.

PASSES THE SENATE AGAIN

This new bill was prepared and officially indorsed by the veterans' organizations and introduced in the next Congress where it was again considered by the Senate Military Affairs Committee. That committee reported it favorably, but put back the former permanent disability rating for eligibility to 30 per cent. This provision was retained when the bill passed the Senate February 20, 1925, 63 to 14, and forwarded to the House.

NEW HOUSE COMMITTEE REPORTS BILL

In the meantime, at the request of the Legion, the House had created the House Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation. They asked that the Bursum bill be referred to this committee instead of the unfriendly House Military Affairs Committee, and the House accordingly agreed. This friendly veterans' committee had already favorably reported the Lineberger bill, similar to the Bursum bill, which was being held up in the Rules Committee of the House.

The House Veterans' Committee immediately reported the Bursum bill so that it would displace the Lineberger bill. A hearing was granted by the Rules Committee of the House on the question of granting a rule to allow the House to vote upon the bill which had already passed the Senate. The Rules Committee failed to grant the desired rule.

KILLED BY THE LEADERS

Efforts were made during the last six days of the session to obtain recognition from the Speaker, so that the measure might be voted upon in the House under suspension of the rules. The Speaker refused to grant the recognition, and the measure again died, after being passed by the Senate, with the expiration of the Sixty-eighth Congress, March 4, 1925.

FIRST SESSION SIXTY-NINTH CONGRESS

At the close of the first session of the Sixty-ninth Congress the situation on the Tyson and Fitzgerald bills was as follows:

The Fitzgerald bill (H. R. 4548) had been introduced in the House of Representatives December 9, 1925, by ROY G. FITZGERALD, legionnaire, of Dayton, Ohio, Representative from the third congressional district of that State. Hearings were thereupon held by a subcommittee of the World War Veterans' Committee of the House as follows: Representative FITZGERALD, chairman; Representative THADDEUS C. SWEET, of Phoenix, N. Y.; and Representative LAMAR JEFFERS, legionnaire, of Anniston, Ala. Following a favorable report from the subcommittee to the Veterans' Committee, that committee favorably reported the bill on March 13, 1926 (Rept. No. 536), the measure being immediately placed upon the Union Calendar of the House. A minority report opposing the measure was signed by Representative JOHN E. RANKIN, of Mississippi; Representative BIRD J. VINCENT, of Michigan; Representative JACOB L. MILLIGAN, of Missouri; and Representative S. J. Montgomery, of Oklahoma, all members of the Legion.

On March 29, 1926, Chairman ROYAL C. JOHNSON, legionnaire, of South Dakota, introduced House Resolution 193, to provide a rule for consideration by the House of the Fitzgerald bill under the five-minute rule, the debate to continue for not to exceed five hours. The resolution was referred to the House Rules Committee. Two hearings were held upon House Resolution 193 by the House Rules Committee, May 4, 1926, and June 22, 1926, at the latter hearing ROBERT G. SIMMONS, of Nebraska, BIRD J. VINCENT, of Michigan, JOHN E. RANKIN, of Mississippi, and RALPH E. UPDIKE, of Indiana, all legionnaires, arguing against a report on the measure. The session adjourned July 3, 1926, without action on the part of the Rules Committee, the bill still remaining upon the Union Calendar of the House.

The Tyson bill, S. 3027, similar to the Fitzgerald bill, was introduced in the Senate February 1 by Senator LAWRENCE D. TYSON, legionnaire, of Knoxville, Tenn. The measure was immediately referred to the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, which held hearings upon the measure on March 5, 1926. On March 25 the Tyson bill was favorably reported to the Senate by this committee, Report No. 483, and the bill placed upon the Senate calendar. Although Senator TYSON made repeated efforts, he was unable to obtain Senate consideration of the measure, and the session ended with the Tyson bill being Order No. 486 under Rule VIII of the General Orders of the Senate, standing sixth on the list of orders.

SECOND SESSION SIXTY-NINTH CONGRESS

The problem confronting final enactment of the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill at the short session, Sixty-ninth Congress, was the time element involved, and the ability of opponents to turn this situation to their advantage through blocking its consideration by parliamentary tactics.

The Senate procedure under leadership of Senator TYSON consisted in the straight attack, pushing the measure at all times, and endeavoring to obtain a vote wherever possible.

The House procedure differed in that the consent of the leaders in control of the legislative program there, had to be won if a House vote was to be obtained. These steps consisted in the following:

First. Obtaining a rule from the House Rules Committee which would designate the conditions under which a vote would be had.

Second. Favorable action by the House Steering Committee on this rule, which would recommend preferred status on the measure to the majority leader and the Speaker.

Third. Decision on the part of the majority leader upon a definite time for House consideration of the bill, and lacking this—

Fourth. Consent of the Speaker to recognize the bill's spokesman so that it might be brought up and considered under suspension of the rules.

THE SENATE FIGHT

Senator TYSON began aggressive action as soon as the Congress convened in December, 1926. At that stage of the session the Tyson bill could be reached only on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, although during the morning hour of the Senate, which under the Senate rules follows an adjournment of the upper body, the motion could be made that the bill be considered by the Senate, notwithstanding the lack of unanimous consent. Under these circumstances the Senate would vote on the question of considering the measure during the remainder of the morning hour and debate upon the bill would be had. Under the rules the morning hour of the Senate lasts for two hours, but as the Senate usually recesses instead of adjourning, the morning hour does not occur daily—in fact, occurs only about twice a week and lasts only two hours.

When consideration is obtained on a measure through the method just outlined, a vote upon its passage must be had before the end of the morning hour if final action on the bill is to be obtained. The unfinished business of the Senate automatically comes up for consideration at the expiration of the morning hour, and consideration of the unfinished business can only be laid aside through unanimous consent.

As the short session progressed the Senate situation disclosed that the extended debate upon the measure continually indulged in by opponents was for the purpose of delaying its consideration, and was not an endeavor to bring further and necessary information to light on the merits of the bill. Senator TYSON accordingly decided that he would not speak further upon the measure after his opening statement in its behalf had been completed, and that he would request the Senate friends of the measure to follow a similar procedure. This method left it up to the opponents to consume whatever time existed for the bill's consideration. This they did continually, repeating their time-worn, threadbare arguments against the measure, and when running out of these, with which the Senate had grown familiar during the seven years in which the measure had been considered, resorted to other delaying tactics, such as demanding roll calls, to consume time, and thus block a Senate vote.

An analysis of the Senate record for the session in this connection shows the following:

December 17, 1926: Tyson bill automatically came before the Senate on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. Consideration objected to by Senator REED of Pennsylvania, thus preventing a vote.

January 8, 1927: Consideration under unanimous consent objected to by Senator BINGHAM, of Connecticut, and Senator KING, of Utah. Senator TYSON thereupon moved that, notwithstanding the objection, the bill be considered, the Chair ruling that such a motion was in order. Senator BINGHAM then announced that he would appeal from the ruling of the Chair. After much debate had been consumed upon this latter motion, it was apparent that no further time during the morning hour existed for consideration of the measure, and both motions were thereupon withdrawn.

January 11, 1927: Senator TYSON during the morning hour moved consideration of the Tyson bill, Senator BINGHAM thereupon demanding a quorum call, which consumed considerable time. Senator TYSON then delivered a masterful address in behalf of the measure, opponents consuming time by interruptions and questioning, including another demand for a quorum call by Senator BINGHAM a few minutes before 2 o'clock, at which time the morning hour expired, before a vote could be had upon the measure.

January 17, 1927: Senator TYSON requested unanimous consent for consideration of the bill, to which Senator BINGHAM objected. Senator TYSON then moved that consideration be had, the objection notwithstanding, but after considerable debate this motion was withdrawn when the approaching end of the morning hour made it apparent that a vote could not be had.

January 31, 1927: Senator TYSON requested unanimous consent for the bill's consideration, Senator KING objecting. Senator TYSON then moved that consideration be had notwithstanding. After considerable debate the Vice President ruled that this motion was out of order on Monday.

February 7, 1927: At a special night session of the Senate, held to consider unobjected bills on the Senate calendar, Senator TYSON requested unanimous consent for the bill's consideration, Senator REED of Pennsylvania objecting. Senator TYSON then moved that the bill be considered, the objection notwithstanding. A vote was taken upon this question and the Senate decided 44 to 4 that the bill be immediately considered. Senator Wadsworth then spoke against the measure for considerable time, followed by Senator REED of Pennsylvania, who read into the RECORD a long letter written two years prior—which he had read into the RECORD at that time—from an alleged official of a so-called veterans' organization opposing the measure. It was subsequently shown that the author of this letter had since been sentenced to serve three months in the city jail of Los Angeles after being convicted of having solicited funds from the public for a defunct veterans' aid organization.

This was a remarkable situation. Only one opposing letter could be produced in two years, and that letter from a man sentenced to jail in connection with veterans' affairs! Senators friendly to the measure exerted every effort to obtain a vote at this time, but the opponents continued their delaying tactics and the hour of adjournment was finally reached with the opponents still talking, a vote upon the measure thereby again being prevented.

February 22, 1927: At a special night session held for consideration of the veterans' loan bill, Senator TYSON moved to attach the Tyson bill as an amendment to this measure. Senator REED of Pennsylvania filibustered against this action. Under the unanimous-consent agreement the special night session would adjourn at 11 p. m. At 10.55 p. m. Senator TYSON withdrew his amendment. Senator REED, however, continued his filibuster and prevented a vote upon the veterans' loan bill that night.

February 23, 1927: Unanimous-consent agreement was reached to consider the Tyson bill from 3 to 4 p. m. on February 24. Senator TYSON immediately circulated a cloture petition so as to obtain a vote upon cloture for the bill at the hour set aside for its consideration.

February 24, 1927: Senator TYSON presented his cloture petition. Adoption of this by the Senate required two-thirds vote. Under the rules the vote was to come without further debate upon February 26.

February 26, 1927: Cloture upon the Tyson bill was lost by a vote of 51 to 36. It lacked 7 votes necessary for the number to invoke cloture. Senators voted upon this cloture petition as follows:

For, 51: Ashurst, Bratton, Capper, Copeland, Couzens, Curtis, Edge, Ernst, Ferris, Fletcher, Frazier, Glass, Goff, Gooding, Hale, Harris, Hawes, Heflin, Howell, Johnson, Jones (Wash.), Kendrick, Keyes, McKellar, McLean, McMaster, McNary, Mayfield, Means, Neely, Oddie, Pittman, Robinson (Ind.), Robinson (Ark.), Sackett, Schall, Sheppard, Shortridge, Simmons, Smith, Stanfield, Steck, Stewart, Swanson, Trammell, Tyson, Walsh (Mass.), Walsh (Mont.), Watson, Weller, Willis.

Against, 36: Bayard, Bingham, Blease, Borah, Broussard, Bruce, Cameron, Caraway, Dale, Dill, Edwards, Fess, George, Gerry, Greene, Harrison, King, La Follette, Lenroot, Metcalf, Moses, Norbeck, Norris, Nye, Overman, Phipps, Pine, Ransdell, Reed (Pa.), Reed (Mo.), Shipstead, Smoot, Stephens, Wadsworth, Warren, Wheeler.

An analysis of the foregoing vote on cloture for the Tyson bill shows that 26 out of the 36 Senators who voted against it had voted favorably during the year on the question of cloture when it was being considered in connection with other measures. These Senators, together with their favorable cloture votes on other measures, are as follows:

[1] Vote on Boulder Dam.
[2] Vote on McFadden banking bill.
[3] Vote on migratory bird bill.
[4] Vote on World Court.
[5] Vote on prohibition reorganization.
[6] Vote on public building bill.
[7] These 11 Senators voted favorably on the passage of the former Bursum bill, a similar measure, in addition to having voted in favor of cloture for other measures during the past year.

Ten Senators who voted against cloture on the Tyson bill have a prior record of invariably opposing the cloture rule. They were BLEASE, BORAH, BROUSSARD, DALE, EDWARDS, LA FOLLETTE, NYE, REED of Missouri, SHIPSTEAD, and WHEELER. All of these, excepting BORAH, have been supporting the retirement measure.

REASON FOR CLOTURE DEFEAT

The foregoing analysis shows that one of the reasons for the failure to obtain the two-thirds majority necessary for cloture was due to the invariable rule followed by nine Senate friends of the measure, who vote against cloture under all circumstances, regardless of their personal attitudes toward the measures involved. While the favorable votes of these nine friends would have won the victory, the primary cause for defeat was the surprise defection of the 11 Senators who have voted favorably heretofore on the passage of the measure and who in addition were not opposed to the principle of cloture, but have, on the contrary, voted in favor of cloture on other measures during the year.

THE HOUSE FIGHT

As pointed out, a different set of circumstances confronted the Fitzgerald bill in the House. The fight in the Senate had been for the most part in the open. The fight in the House, however, had been conducted under cover. A whispering campaign consisting of cloakroom admonitions and conferences, designed to undermine the bill's strength in the House, was conducted throughout the session with unremitting energy and vigor. The primary object of this campaign was to intimidate the leaders in control of the legislative machinery so that they would decline to allow a vote upon the measure. Failing this, the whisperers hoped to undermine the actual House strength of the bill so that in the event the leaders allowed a vote, which seemed probable, that the actual support of the measure would be weakened.

WHISPERING STRATEGY

The strategy of the whisperers consisted in the threat of proposing double-edged amendments from the floor of a highly confusing character which, if adopted, might thwart the purpose of the legislation. They were primarily designed to place Members of the House in an embarrassing position. It was the intention of the whisperers to place the Congressmen in the predicament where a favorable vote on their amendments would be embarrassing, as well as an unfavorable vote. This strategy was designed to prevent pressure by Congressmen on the House leaders to force a vote on the bill. While the whisperers did not succeed in alienating many votes through this cloakroom attack, it has been claimed that they caused a number of its supposed friends to weaken in their desire for a roll-call vote on the measure.

The chief of the double-edged amendments through which the whisperers hoped to embarrass the Congressmen and confuse the issue before the House, was to propose that the bill be amended to grant a disability rating of total permanent to all enlisted veterans now rated as permanently disabled more than 30 per cent. The object of such an amendment is clear. It is a continuation of the effort which certain Congressmen have been exerting to alienate the sympathy of the former enlisted men from the former officers, and to create a feeling among the Congressmen that a vote against such an amendment would immediately bring down the wrath of all former enlisted men, who outnumbered the former officers 20 to 1.

The fact that such a proposal—30 per cent permanent disability, to be made the equivalent of 100 per cent permanent disability—has never been proposed by any veterans' organization and has never been considered by any committee of the House or the Senate, so that its cost, its effect, or the necessity for its enactment are absolutely unknown, has not so far deterred the whisperers from their announced intention of forcing a vote upon their proposal.

It is unnecessary to point out that the enactment of such an amendment might overturn the entire structure of our carefully developed Veterans' Bureau laws for the relief of the disabled, and that the Legion itself could not properly take a stand for or against such a proposal without a thorough study concerning its probable necessity, effect, and cost.

SNELL GOOD AS HIS WORD

In spite of this whispering campaign, the Members of the House steering committee and the House Rules Committee finally concluded that the Fitzgerald bill was just in principle, and that the House should not further be denied its right to register its will upon it. Early in the session Chairman SNELL, of the House Rules Committee, stated that his committee would report a rule providing consideration of the measure, following the disposition of the annual appropriation bills. Chairman SNELL was as good as his word. On February 15 the House Rules Committee voted to report the rule on the Fitzgerald bill, and House Resolution 427, in compliance with this, was reported to the House on February 16 from the House Committee on Rules. This resolution provided that general debate confined to the bill should not exceed two hours, to be equally divided and controlled by those favoring and opposing it. That, following this, the bill should be open to amendment under the five-minute rule, and that when the question of amendment had been disposed of, that the previous question should be considered as ordered, and a vote be had upon the passage of the measure.

It should be noted that this was the first time in the nine-year fight for this measure that a rule for its consideration had been granted by the House Rules Committee.

Action on the Fitzgerald bill was then deferred awaiting the Senate action on the Tyson bill, the House leaders having taken the attitude that it would be useless for the House to act upon the Fitzgerald bill unless the Senate passed the Tyson bill, the House leaders assuming that the Fitzgerald bill could be acted upon without notice at any time up until adjournment of the session.

The Senate filibuster against the Tyson bill meanwhile continued. Then two days prior to the date set for adjournment, another Senate filibuster was on in full swing, which continued to adjournment and prevented Senate passage of all additional legislation.

Friends of the measure, nevertheless, desired the House to register its attitude upon the Fitzgerald bill. Representative Fitzgerald conveyed this information to the House leaders, which resulted in the meeting of the House steering committee. This body after considerable discussion recommended that the House be allowed to consider the Fitzgerald bill that night, as adjournment was scheduled for noon the next day. Unfortunately, a House filibuster developed at the night session against the immigration bill, then under consideration, and this debate was unduly prolonged. The only hope then remaining was to obtain recognition from Speaker LONGWORTH for House consideration of the measure under suspension of the rules. Mr. LONGWORTH declined to grant this. Representative TILSON, of Connecticut, the majority leader, thereupon asked unanimous consent that the House stand in recess until 9.30 the next morning. Mr FITZGERALD thereupon objected, his plan being to insist upon the House continuing in session until action on his bill was had. However, at this point, Chairman SNELL of the Rules Committee presented a privileged report from the Rules Committee, House Resolution 455, which provided that immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it should be in order to move that the House stand in recess.

Mr. SNELL moved the previous question on the adoption of the rule, the previous question was ordered and the resolution agreed to, and the House thereupon stood in recess until 9.30 the next morning, to adjourn at noon on that day without transacting further business.

In this manner was the retirement legislation killed during the short session.

THE FIGHT GREW MORE BITTER

Friends of the retirement bill should reflect that the fight for this meritorious measure became more intense as time went on. Its opponents were few in number but great was the power of obstruction. The chief weapon lay in the rules of the Senate and the House, which enabled a vote to be prevented by parliamentary tactics. To this was added the whispering campaign and the threatened amendments designed to confuse the issue and embarrass those who would vote upon them.

JUSTICE WILL BE GRANTED SURVIVING DISABLED OFFICERS

More than 123 of our disabled emergency Army officers have died during the past year, died while their opponents filibustered and whispered against their relief legislation. The united strength of the Legion is back of this measure—a strength which opponents have failed to divide—and justice to the disabled officers will be written into the law of the land.

REREFERENCE OF A BILL

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, with respect to the rereference of the bill which was requested a few moments ago by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER], of course, that has been done now; but I have heard since then that perhaps the Committee on Military Affairs has taken some action on the bill.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge there has not been any action taken. If the gentleman will permit me, this matter was brought to my attention by the officers of the Canal Zone here in the department and I think the Speaker will bear me out in the statement that it was clearly a wrong reference.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Judging from the title of the bill and the fact that it is not a military hospital, it would seem the bill did belong where the gentleman asked that it be referred; but under the rules of the House, if the Committee on Military Affairs has acted on the bill, it is probably too late to discharge it from consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no information on that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am not sure that I am correctly informed, and my informant was not absolutely certain about it.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I believe I am the only member of the Military Affairs Committee here present, but I am not aware that the bill has been considered by the committee. I must confess that there was some doubt in my mind whether the hospital was not a military hospital and did not belong to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I might suggest that where these bills are once referred and it is desired to change the reference, there ought to be a conference between the chairman of the committee who desires to obtain jurisdiction and the chairman of the committee that wishes for the change. I asked the gentleman from New York if there had been any such conference and he tried to reach the chairman of the committee, but he was not able to do so.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, in view of what the gentleman from Tennessee has said I am perfectly willing to withdraw my request.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings be vacated and let the gentleman call it up in the morning.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RATHBONE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a brief editorial from the Chicago Daily News on the agricultural situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, following my usual policy and procedure, I object.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by replying to an editorial recently carried by the Washington News under the caption of "Religious tolerance and District of Columbia Sunday closing laws," and also by inserting some brief quotations and an item from the Literary Digest on Sunday observance.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. TILSON. Are they the gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. LANKFORD. As far as the reply to the editorial they are my own remarks, except the clipping from the editorial, and I also give quotations from McKinley, Roosevelt, and others on Sunday observance, and one from the Literary Digest.

Mr. TREADWAY. Reserving the right to object, I think the gentleman better cut out that part of his request, limiting it to his own remarks.

Mr. LANKFORD. The article in the Literary Digest is in accordance with my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TREADWAY. I shall be obliged to object.

TOMBIGBEE RIVER BRIDGE, MISSISSIPPI

Mr. EDGE obtained the floor.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Jersey yield to me?

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. STEPHENS. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of calendar No. 150, the bill (H. R. 5657) granting the consent of Congress to the Board of Supervisors of Monroe County, Miss., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tombigbee River at or near Aberdeen, Monroe County, Miss.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I am not sure that any business can be transacted under the pending unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Any business can be transacted by unanimous consent. This is a request for unanimous consent. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Mississippi?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE MERCHANT MARINE

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 744) to further develop an American merchant marine, to assure its permanence in the transportation of the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 9, after the word "authorized," insert the following proviso:

Provided, That all offices, employments, and positions under the United States Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation, except offices and employments calling for the exercise of executive, initiative, or discretion and positions calling for manual or menial services, shall be subject to the provisions of the Federal laws relating to the Federal classified civil service.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE]. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I have already discussed certain features of the bill at some length. I now desire to present a very brief summary of my objections. The attendance during the debate has not been large and I am convinced many Senators have a wrong conception of the measure.

It really accomplishes but one object—the policy of permanent governmental ownership and operation of the merchant marine. Nothing more—nothing less.

Senators, during the debate, have apparently gathered the idea that the bill guarantees the rebuilding or replacing of the Government fleet. It does nothing of the kind. It merely announces such a desire. Only appropriations by Congress can bring a building program about and they could be made without the passage of this bill.

The measure, however, is a very important one inasmuch as it halts the gradual turning over of the fleet to private operators through its ultimatum that every member of the Shipping Board, seven in all, must vote "aye" before a spar or a sail can be sold, a requirement heretofore unheard of in administrative control.

Proponents of the bill are frank enough to admit this means perpetual Government ownership and operation unless Congress at some future time should reverse the policy thus provided. In my judgment, with the Shipping Board so intrenched, such a repeal will be practically impossible.

The Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] on Friday referred to the large number of ships operating from the Gulf, 116 I think, at a loss of over $5,000,000 per year, and the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] observed that 60 per cent of American cargoes came from that section. However, the losses are in no way confined to that part of the country.

I contend that if this bill becomes a law and Government ownership and operation is thus perpetuated, the loss will become greater and greater through the waste and extravagance of noncompetitive governmental administration.

However, if 60 per cent of our exports are from the southern section, and I have no reason to question the statement, then I can not understand, with all that available cargo, why shipping there can not be made to pay if it ever could under Government administration. With so much business at hand, I believe private operators could make a profit. But, under this bill, we, of course, will never sell the ships. Some Senators have in effect admitted they want to make it impossible to sell the ships, apparently so they can retain and allocate them without resistance in the future, and notwithstanding the loss involved.

The suggestion made, I think by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], that a future Congress will insist on selling all the ships sounds very well, but I can not see on what logic the assumption is based. The Shipping Board is losing a tremendous amount of money now and yet we are perpetuating it. Does the Senate believe that by losing twice as much money, Congress will suddenly change its policy? As stated, the Federal shipping department will be then so firmly established and intrenched any change will be much more difficult than at present.

If there was no other way out, there might be some excuse for saddling this terrific burden on the taxpayers, but private ownership and operation, if properly encouraged, is ready to take hold at any time. Still opponents of that type of encouragement prefer paying out many more millions in deficits, not to reckon interest or cost of replacement, than any scientific subsidy or subvention would ever cost.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. EDGE. I ask for five minutes on the pending amendment, as provided under the arrangement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is entitled to five minutes on the pending amendment.

Mr. EDGE. The real force behind this bill is unconcealed Government ownership and operation, nothing else. I am not criticizing those who believe in that policy, but I can not understand Senators who frankly say they do not believe in it, but will vote for this bill in order to save the merchant marine. All that is necessary to save the merchant marine is to vote for appropriations to be wisely spent at the proper time, not to vote for perpetual Government ownership even before we consider appropriations.

By passing this bill we serve notice on private operators that we are now permanently entering the field with an unfair competition they can not meet. By the passage of this compulsory unanimous-consent clause, we strike an irreparable blow at all private initiative in shipping. Why not meet the desire of practically all Senators and provide through appropriation and liberal loans a balanced merchant marine and at the same time permit a method of selling and avoid the responsibility of permanent operation? The aim of this bill seems to put the cart before the horse.

The very fear that ships will be sold seems to inspire some Senators to support this bill. When ships are sold they are not withdrawn from service. It would be far better to insert a clause making it compulsory that they remain in service for a reasonable time or to fix a minimum price rather than to close forever the door to private initiative and operation.

In my time I wish to draw the attention of the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], if he has not already seen it, to an article in a New York newspaper of this morning to which he will probably refer if he has seen it. The article states that one of the large operators in New York, Mr. Herbermann, announces to the Shipping Board in a telegram that he is prepared at once to build three large liners in the United States for overseas service if the amendment which the Senator from New York or a similar amendment providing for long-term mail contracts is agreed to as a part of this bill. I ask that the extract to which I refer may be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HERBERMANN READY TO BUILD THREE LINERS IN UNITED STATES—WIRES SHIP BOARD PROPOSAL IS CONTINGENT ON PASSAGE OF COPELAND BILL PROVIDING FOR MAIL CONTRACTS

Henry Herbermann, president of the Export Steamship Corporation, telegraphed the Shipping Board yesterday that he was prepared to construct at least three 18-knot combination passenger and cargo liners if the Copeland bill or similar legislation providing for the payment of long-term mail contracts is enacted. Aid would also be sought from the construction loan fund, created for the purpose of promoting shipbuilding in American yards.

The telegram addressed to the shipping commissioners follows: "We contemplate placing order for three combination passenger and cargo vessels with a speed of 18 knots for operation between New York and Alexandria, Egypt, with calls at Gibraltar and Algiers en route. This new construction conditional upon the passage of Copeland bill or similar legislation providing long-term mail contracts and loan from construction loan fund to partly finance new construction. We estimate three vessels of this type would maintain fortnightly service between New York and eastern Mediterranean. We are also willing to consider new construction for the New York-West Coast of Italy services under similar conditions."

PRIVATE MARINE FORECAST

This proposal of the Export Line bears out the contention of private ship operators that enactment of either the Copeland and Wood bills, or a combination of both, would make possible the maintenance and development of a permanent merchant marine under private ownership.

Mr. JONES. I understand the pending amendment is intended practically to include in the civil service only the clerical force under the Shipping Board.

Mr. BRUCE. The amendment does not include any officer in a position calling for the exercise of executive, initiative, or discretion, nor does it include the position of laborer nor the position of seaman, nor any position on passenger ships requiring menial service; in other words, it relates only to positions of a clerical or ministerial character.

Mr. JONES. I shall interpose no serious objection to the amendment, but I suggest that it be read for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the amendment.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That all offices, employments, and positions under the United States Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation, except offices and employments calling for the exercise of executive, initiative, or discretion, and positions calling for manual or menial services shall be subject to the provisions of the Federal laws relating to the Federal classified civil service.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. FLETCHER. My recollection is that under legislation which we passed last year we struck out the word "Emergency," leaving the title of the corporation simply "the Fleet Corporation."

Mr. JONES. The word "Emergency" should be left out.

Mr. FLETCHER. The word "Emergency" should be stricken out, because I think it has been eliminated from the title of the corporation.

Mr. BRUCE. I was not aware of that fact. I will modify my amendment in that respect. What is the present name of the corporation. I will ask the Senator from Florida?

Mr. FLETCHER. Its present designation is the Fleet Corporation.

Mr. BRUCE. I will ask that the amendment be so modified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland modifies his amendment as indicated.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I regret that I have not found available sufficient time to make as careful a study of the pending measure as I should like to have done, but I wish to say that I feel that our experience in the matter of extending civil-service requirements to employees of the Government has been such as to lead me for one to make up my mind that they should not be further extended. I think our recent experience in extending the civil service law to employees engaged in the enforcement of the prohibition law has been such as to show that, as a rule, it is unworkable and undesirable.

Mr. President, I wish to say just in a word that I am not inclined to favor either the proposed amendment or the bill itself. My views are practically in accordance with those expressed in the paper prepared by the United States Chamber of Commerce which I hold in my hand and which I desire to present for the RECORD. I think that Senators generally have been furnished with copies of this memorial, and it will not, therefore, be necessary to have it read at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the memorial will be printed in the RECORD.

The memorial is as follows:

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington.

THE MERCHANT MARINE ISSUE IN CONGRESS

To Members of the Senate:

No body of citizens has more reason to want a strong American merchant marine than the members of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. This is a purpose to which the national chamber since its beginning has devoted much effort.

It is our firm belief, however, that a Government owned and operated merchant marine can never permanently serve the needs of the Nation. Accordingly, we are very much opposed to the Jones bill, S. 744, which would extend Government ownership and operation.

We are told that we can not have a private merchant marine without a Government subsidy and that Congress will never vote such a subsidy. Therefore, it is argued, the only alternative is a Government ship program such as is embodied in the Jones bill. With that conclusion we can not agree.

We realize that Members of Congress are striving earnestly for a sound and practical solution of our shipping problem. The shipping venture of the Shipping Board has cost tremendously. If the principle of the Jones bill is adopted, expenditures at a great rate will continue indefinitely. Facing that situation it is hard to believe that Congress will definitely refuse to consider constructive plans that would not only save money for the taxpayers but also would lead to a firmly established, privately owned merchant marine.

The national chamber believes this can be accomplished by private enterprise through trade route and mail contracts embodying the healthy principle of competition. Such a plan can not succeed, however, until the Government definitely adopts a policy of withdrawal from the shipping business.

Specifically, the national chamber opposes the Jones bill because—

(a) It would embark the Government upon a new program for use of the taxpayers' money in merchant-ship construction for Government operation;

(b) It would prohibit sale of Shipping Board ships except by unanimous approval of the Shipping Board, which, in view of the attitude of some members of the board, would be the practical equivalent of stopping all sales of commercially useful ships; and

(c) It would not further the establishment of our shipping in private ownership and operation, the only basis on which a permanent and successful merchant marine can be maintained.

By referendum 9 (item 4), referendum 48 (item 7), and by resolution of the fifteenth annual meeting in May, 1927, the chamber definitely advocates maintenance of the trade-route services and mail lines needed in the interest of our foreign commerce and the national defense. The resolution referred to states:

"We view with grave concern and are opposed to proposals that the Government should enter upon a new program of building merchant ships and are opposed to Congress placing added restrictions upon the authority of the Shipping Board to dispose of ships to private parties. Such a policy as proposed is against the public interest and national welfare.

"The Government has already sold many of the principal trade routes, and these are being successfully operated under private ownership. Additional shipping services needed for the development of the Nation's foreign commerce can also be transferred to and successfully maintained by private enterprise through trade route and mail contracts let whenever possible on a competitive basis.

"The explicit statement made before the transportation session of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States on May 4, 1927, by Chairman O'Connor of the Shipping Board, that the board does not contemplate the investment of public money in new ship construction, and his clear statement at that time that the board is determined to dispose of all ships and trade routes to private enterprise at any sacrifice, if with reasonable assurance of continued service on those routes, accord with the adopted principles of the chamber, and at this time it is necessary only to impress upon the Shipping Board the need of energy in placing this shipping in private operation and with such support as is necessary to make private operation effective."

The proceedings of the transportation session of the annual meeting which adopted that resolution have been quoted from several times during the debate in the Senate. In order that the full text of these proceedings may be available I am sending you a copy herewith. Also inclosed is a copy of the national chamber's referendum 48, on the merchant marine, in which attention is especially invited to pages 12 to 18 outlining the methods by which the merchant marine can be successfully placed on a permanent basis of private ownership and operation.

The first consideration of business in seeking the rehabilitation of the merchant marine is the service that shipping renders in furthering the disposal of our surplus agricultural and industrial products. The United States is an exporting Nation. If it is to progress, it must compete with all comers in the markets of the world. Moreover the World War made apparent the extent of our dependence on adequate supplies of essential raw materials from abroad, and the interest of American industry in having American-flag shipping service to meet these needs. An efficient, economically operated merchant marine is our first arm of commercial defense.

Business requirements call for the maintenance of essential trade routes in the interests of the laborer, the farmer, the miner, the investor, the exporter, and importer—all who are in any way engaged in the production, manufacture, and transportation of American products.

Why should Government be expected to attempt to meet these requirements itself when business is so well qualified to provide the necessary service?

There is nothing new or mysterious or difficult about the process. It consists in calling for bids for the maintenance of these essential trade routes and mail lines on a contract basis by private parties, either with their own ships or with ships to be bought from the Government. The Government under such a plan would pay for the maintenance of the service a stated sum annually, instead of, as at present, not only paying a percentage of freight money to Shipping Board agents but also covering losses that arise from ship operations amounting annually to millions, besides the overhead costs of the Fleet Corporation and other expenses. The net result would be that all the services now maintained by the board could be continued, but with greater efficiency. The Government would be eliminated from the shipping business. Local interests would be enabled to take over many of the services. A long step would be taken in the establishment of a successful, privately owned merchant marine. We believe another result would be a saving of millions annually to the Treasury of the United States and expenditure of taxpayers' money for ship construction would be wholly unnecessary.

We hope that Congress will decide for private enterprise as against continuation of Government ownership. Definite abandonment of the Jones bill in favor of constructive measures as outlined above would give new hope to American citizens who are working for the upbuilding of our private American merchant marine.

On behalf of the great body of American business men who make up the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, I respectfully bespeak your support of measures in accordance with the well-established American tradition of private initiative.

LEWIS E. PIERSON, President.

JANUARY 28, 1928.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in my opinion, the civil-service system has not justified the predictions of its advocates, as it has been applied in the various branches of the Federal Government. Those who supported the early civil service law had high hopes of its accomplishments and prophesied beneficial results from its administration. A dispassionate review of the workings of the civil-service system as applied to the Federal Government, will furnish, as I believe, substantial arguments against its validity; and convincing proof that it has miserably failed to promote the public welfare. Those who advocate it postulate an unchanging condition from that which obtained at the time of and prior to the passage of the law. They assume a status quo condition with respect to the Government and governmental activities, forgetting that progress attends to the social and political activities of the world. Concede that under the so-called spoils system there were injustices and inefficiency, no one is justified in asserting that injustices and inequalities have not existed and still persist in those branches of the Government where the civil service law applies.

There is inefficiency to-day in the Government service. There always will be inefficiency and incompetency under a civil-service system. The application of the civil-service principle to governmental affairs makes for bureaucracy, with its evils; it makes for caste, a bureaucratic caste, which has always been opposed to democracy and hostile to genuine social and political reforms. Any policy which breeds caste is wrong, and the civil-service system is developing a governmental caste which is not consonant with the application of liberal principles and the democratic spirit in governmental activities.

The number of employees in the Federal Government is double the number required for the performance of the duties imposed by law. Of course, there are thousands of employees in the Government service who render valuable and efficient service. They are handicapped in the fine work which they are doing by the inefficient and the incompetent and by the chains which the civil service law forges. Initiative, responsibility, freedom in the development of innovations and improved methods and new policies—these qualities are indispensable if there is to be efficiency and accomplishment in the Government service, as well as in private business. But the civil-service system and bureaucracy stifle ambition, suppress initiative, hamper the adoption of improved methods, and create obstacles which prevent proper development and effective achievements.

I have talked with scores of men and women in various branches of the Government service who appreciate the limitations and restrictions imposed by civil-service requirements and governmental regulations. There is not sufficient encouragement, no proper incentive, no certain recognition of ability and worth and service under existing conditions; and inevitably the result is that persons in this category are restrained and ultimately feel compelled to submit to conditions which they can not change.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] is ambiguous, as I read it, and is not susceptible to uniform interpretation by those who will be called upon to administer the law. It can not be determined from its phraseology who will be included within its terms and who are excluded, but it is quite certain that the eagerness of Government officials who may administer the law will bring within its terms all employees of the Government whom it is possible to include within its provisions; and if all the employees of the Shipping Board or the Fleet Corporation are not brought within the terms of the amendment, if it should be adopted, then supplemental legislation will be sought, because the appetites of those who seek the extension of the civil-service system are insatiable, and measures will be projected and contests made until this branch of the Government, as well as all branches, will be brought within the powerful grasp of the Federal bureaucracy, resting in part upon the civil service law. One reason why the costs of the Government are so great grows out of the inefficiency and incompetency of Federal employees and officeholders, and the failure of the Government in those activities becomes more apparent when it engages in business enterprises and undertakes the performance of obligations and activities which come within the realm of individual endeavor. The success which has come to the business men of our country is attributable to the adoption of efficient business methods. The great industries of our country have achieved their unparalleled success because of executive ability of those in command and the freedom of those in authority to devise new policies, initiate reforms, select competent officials and employees, and remove dead weights and blights which were developed.

The successful business organizations of our country are daily changing their business policies, introducing reforms, improving their methods. Scientific investigation is conducted by trained experts with a view to introducing economies and improved methods. Employees are encouraged to suggest reforms and changes. Promotions follow industry and energy and efficiency. The brakemen of to-day on the railroads may be superintendents on the morrow. The messenger boys in the banks become presidents of great financial institutions. Mr. Ford's remarkable success is due primarily to his organizing genius, but in a great measure to the efficient management that he has adopted in his plants. The same may be said of the railroad organizations which have achieved success, as well as many other business corporations which have made themselves known to the country.

Life tenure in office is more compatible with monarchial institutions than with democratic government. In my opinion, it were better in a government such as this that there should be a reasonable rotation in office rather than an inflexible system which gives life positions to hundreds of thousands of employees, which will soon, as bureaucracy grows, pass beyond the million mark. A civil-service system means pensions, retirement privileges, and Government bounties, and when the civil-service system is applied to governmental activities in industrial fields and in business activities its imperfections will become more glaring and its evils will defy contradiction.

The Senator from Maryland desires governmental ownership and operation of hundreds of ships and the control by the Government of the merchant marine of this Republic. He and others must know, who are familiar with the shipping business, that it is a highly competitive business; that success attends it only when men of vision and courage and genius control; when they have a large degree of freedom, unhampered by incompetent overlords and not handicapped by inefficient and incompetent associates and employees. The Government can not economically and wisely operate merchant vessels. Great Britain's success and Germany's success as maritime nations resulted from private initiative and because the heavy hand of bureaucracy was not placed upon the organizations and individuals who were pushing the trade and commerce of those countries into all ports of the world.

Mr. President, the bill under consideration, if it should be enacted into law, is foredoomed to failure; that is, it will not develop a merchant marine worthy of this Republic. Under this bill, if it becomes a law, hundreds of millions will be taken from the Federal Treasury and wasted and squandered in feeble and futile attempts to maintain a merchant marine. The evils of paternalism, of socialism, and bureaucracy will be manifest and those evils will grow and multiply until hundreds of millions from the Public Treasury will be squandered and the public will arise in their wrath and wipe out this paternalistic experiment and policy which is now so eloquently championed upon the floor of this Chamber.

But, Mr. President, there is not that frankness attending the discussion of this measure which I think should exist. There are some advocating it who say that it is not designed that the Government shall permanently own and operate vessels in foreign trade. They say it is necessary for the Government temporarily to operate ships which it now owns and build a number of other vessels as a proper complement to the present fleet. But, as I understand their position, when routes have been established and sufficient vessels are being operated to carry the greater part of our foreign trade, then the Government may dispose of its ships and transfer its interests therein to corporations and private persons.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair regrets to say that the time of the Senator from Utah has expired.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I will occupy five minutes in discussing the bill.

There are others supporting the measure before us on the ground that it does mean governmental ownership. They seem to rejoice in the adoption of a policy which puts the Government irrevocably into private business. For some reason unknown to me they seem to think that bureaucracy is more efficient than democracy; that paternalism is more beneficent than individualism; that the Government can better control the business and private affairs of the people than they themselves can control them. In other words, Mr. President, as I interpret their position, it is that the people are incompetent to handle their own affairs, to carry on business, to develop trade and commerce, and to discharge the responsibilities that belong to a dynamic and progressive people.

Some Senators, if I have understood them correctly, welcome the Government's advent into the industrial activity and life of the people. They fail to distinguish between the Federal Government and its duties and limited powers and the sovereign States and the municipalities therein. States, of course, may do that which the Federal Government may not do, and municipalities may own and control certain public utilities, perhaps, to advantage of the people.

The people within the cities are familiar with their needs and can watch over their public officials, but any argument that justifies the operation of public utilities by municipalities has no place in this discussion and furnishes no sufficient reason for the General Government to engage in private business. The people have been unwilling to permit the States in which they live to embark upon socialistic and paternalistic enterprises. They have perceived that the genius and spirit of democracy were opposed to paternalism, to the assertion by the Government of authority over the industries and private affairs of the people. Inefficiency, waste, extravagance, and corruption have uniformly attended in all ages the control by governments of industry and business and activities which belong to the field of private endeavor. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TYSON], who addressed the Senate yesterday, eloquently declared that we have come to the parting of the ways, and that the most important question that had come before Congress for many years was now presented for determination. He indicated that this bill committed the Government to the ownership and operation of the merchant marine; that we were departing from the policy that has characterized this Government from the beginning.

Mr. President, the Senator is right. This bill seeks to prevent private ownership and operation of ships in foreign trade and to plunge the United States into the great sea of governmental ownership and operation of our merchant marine. It is obvious that no amendment will be permitted by those in control in the Senate which will permit private ownership of the merchant marine ships. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] so interprets this bill. The very fact that he is seeking to give life positions to thousands of individuals, putting them under the aegis of the civil service law indicates that he regards this bill as committing absolutely and irrevocably the Government to the ownership and operation of ships in foreign trade. I can not understand how Senators reconcile their position in favor of this bill with their life-long convictions in favor of democracy.

Mr. President, where will the end be? History is replete with examples of departures from political standards and governmental policies—departures leading from individual freedom, liberty, and action in private matters and business activities. One usurpation by a government has generally been followed by another. The conference upon the government of one duty, right, or privilege belonging to individuals or to local communities whets the appetite of the transferee of such right and it will demand additional powers and authority until finally it absorbs the liberties of the people. Governments have become top-heavy and fallen because of the gravitational forces set in operation which transferred from the people and from the local communities their rights and liberties.

Governments are not organized to go into business. This Republic is an example of the wisdom of a policy which developed the individual and permitted him unrestrained to engage in trade and commerce and business pursuits, and which restricted the Government to certain boundaries and forbade it to impinge upon the rights of persons or States.

Mr. President, we are by this measure departing from sound principles and wise policies. We are striking at the foundation of democracy and at the same time injuring our institutions and our individual life. There is too much opportunism in our politics to-day; too much expediency; too little regard for fundamental principles. An evil, real or fancied, becomes the basis for iconoclastic changes, and departures from the principles and policies which have made our country great. The shipping industry will take care of itself. American genius will meet every situation if not stifled and throttled by socialistic, governmental, and deadly paternalistic methods.

Mr. President, there are unmistakable evidences of the growing sympathy for socialistic nostrums. This bill is the outgrowth of this changing spirit existing in our country. If the Government owns and operates our merchant marine there are reasons to urge that it should own and operate transportation companies of our country. The railroads carry freight and passengers and ships carry freight and passengers. A considerable portion of our exports originate in the interior. They are carried by the railroads to the various ports of our country, and there shipped to foreign ports. It may well be argued that the transportation system, both of land and sea, should be placed in the hands of the Government; one subdivision is controlled by the Government. And if the Government owns and operates railroads and the merchant marine, where will its activities terminate? So argued the bolsheviks, and then took over all industries, as well as all property. Efforts have been made, and these efforts still persist, to have the Government take over anthracite fields, as well as the bituminous coal fields of our country.

It is a dangerous thing, Mr. President, to create bad precedents. It is reassuring, to me at least, that the President has indicated that he does not approve of this visionary and socialistic project. I hope that if it should finally reach him he will promptly veto it. I believe that the sober, sound judgment of the American people would applaud him for so doing. I can not believe that the mass of the American people are willing to have our country embark upon policies which I regard as destructive of progress, of initiative, and of political and industrial development; policies which are not progressive but reactionary and archaic.

I understand that some Senators favoring this bill are favorable to the candidacy of Secretary Hoover whose name is often mentioned in connection with the Presidency. Mr. Norman F. Titus, of Mr. Hoover's department, has stated that Mr. Hoover is opposed to any ownership or operation of any public utility, and wants private initiative preserved. Mr. Titus also states that—

> He [Hoover] advocates the development of a plan of some kind and wants the shipping industry to put its own house in order. It is evident that we all believe in self-government, not only in the sense that we have the right to elect our own representatives, but also by indirection—that we can run our affairs without the aid of Government.

And in a very able address delivered by Secretary Hoover on September 29, 1924, he opposed governmental ownership of utilities and stated that the—> wasteful distribution of the hundred and fifty million of capital invested annually in the Post Office, Reclamation Service, Shipping Board, rivers and harbors, and roads would not be a patch on the waste in appropriations when our legislative bodies get a chance to handle two billions per annum of new capital outlay.

Mr. Hoover eloquently declares against the evils of bureaucracy and states that the Government can not operate as economically as private enterprise. Referring to our experiment in the operation of ships, he stated:

> Our national shipping is a daily sample of all the arguments I have given, and more. We paid three billions of the taxpayers' money for a fleet—some part of it was truly for war purposes—but we have written it down 90 per cent in six years to $300,000,000; and if the accounts were based upon true costs with interest and depreciation we should find that we are losing over $100,000,000 of the taxpayers' money a year in operating it. Yet private shipping is earning profits. Nor is this the fault of the Shipping Board; it is inherent in the system.

Mr. President, I know that any opposition to this bill will prove futile at the present time in this Chamber. It will pass the Senate with all of its iniquities, and in spite of its economic unsoundness and its attempt to commit our Government to a policy at variance with the principles upon which this Republic was founded, and in violation of the spirit, if not the letter of the Constitution of the United States. There will be an awakening sooner or later, and if this bill should become a law, some day an indignant people will sweep it from the statute books and demand a return of this Republic to the paths of safety and to wise and just economic policies.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, unquestionably the administration of the law as it relates to the civil service has been in many instances defective and justifies criticism; but I am one of those who believe that civil service is essential, if not indispensable, to the administration of a government so large and complex as is the Government of the United States at this time.

It is certainly true that instances are known in which the principles of civil-service reform have been disregarded; but it is also true that if there were no classified service in the United States under the civil service law inefficiency, and probably corruption, would run riot in every department of the Government.

You may answer that that is true now, and undoubtedly to some extent it is true; but, to illustrate the force of what I am attempting to say, suppose there were no civil service law and no classified service, and all selections of employees in minor positions were determined solely by political influence. Whenever there occurred a change of administration you would have many, many thousands of new and inexperienced persons inducted into the Government service, and those who have established their right to continuous service would be discharged.

I merely want to say at this time that I am in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] because I believe that on the whole the effect of the civil service law has been to increase, rather than to diminish, efficiency in Government positions.

Just a moment with regard to the more important subject, the merits of the bill.

I think it has been demonstrated by those in charge of the measure, and who have given prolonged study to the subject, that if the United States is to maintain a merchant marine under present conditions this measure, or some similar measure, is necessary. I do not believe in, and I do not desire to perpetuate, Government operation of the merchant marine if the end can be accomplished through private ownership and private operation; but those who are assailing this bill, in my judgment, have almost totally failed to answer the arguments or to refute the conclusions presented by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] is of the opinion that this bill is entering upon a permanent policy of Government ownership.

I listened to the speech of the able Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] a few weeks ago, in which he discussed the history of the sale of these ships. It impressed me that something ought to be done to protect the property of the United States against its disposal in the manner in which it had been disposed of.

As I see this bill, the only difference between the situation as it will be after the bill is passed and as it is now is that it requires seven men to determine upon the sale rather than four. I think it is not an extraordinary request that at least seven men shall be called upon to determine the great policy of the United States with reference to the question of merchant marine. It is true that it requires a unanimous vote, but it is a very small body of men; and, even opposed to Government ownership as I am, I should not want to leave it to seven men or to four men to determine whether or not we should have Government ownership. We have the ships now; and if we determine not to keep them the Congress ought to determine the matter and not leave it to four men or to seven men. Of course, we do in this bill leave it to seven men, but we retard the accomplishment of it by requiring a unanimous vote. I should like to vote so as to leave the matter to Congress. I would not, if I had my way, permit sales except upon the action of Congress upon the report of the board.

I see nothing in this bill other than the increasing of the degree of unanimity which is necessary in order to dispose of the ships. If there is anything else in the bill other than that, I have been unable to detect it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. In other words, then, the only thing this bill does is to make it more difficult for the Government to get out of the shipping business?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is all?

Mr. BORAH. That is all.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I think I ought to correct the Senator on that. There is a very important provision in the bill which authorizes appropriations for the building of new ships.

Mr. BORAH. It is merely an authorization? There is no appropriation?

Mr. JONES. Oh, no; there is no appropriation. We could not do that in this bill.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Arkansas asks the question if the bill does not make it more difficult for the Government to get out of the shipping business. It does make it more difficult for the Government to get out. I do not think the Government ought to get out until the Congress of the United States itself determines that question. It is true that under this bill seven men may do so, but I would leave it so that Congress alone could determine the policy in that respect.

Mr. CARAWAY. As a matter of fact, does not the Senator know that that is exactly what this bill does? There will always be one man who will not vote himself out of a job. Out of seven there will always be one man who will want to hold his job.

Mr. BORAH. I should think, on the same line of reasoning, you would find one in four who would want to hold on to his job.

Mr. CARAWAY. We have done it so far.

Mr. BORAH. From the manner in which they were disposing of ships, as painted by the Senator from Florida, I think they were trying very hard to get out of a job.

Mr. CARAWAY. Possibly so. I am not defending anybody this administration appointed to office; but I desire to ask the Senator another question.

We are engaging now in a subsidy under another name, are we not, and intending to make it permanent? Is not that what this bill does?

Mr. BORAH. I think it points in that direction; yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. It points to paying about $45,000,000 a year as a subsidy to keep the merchant marine on the sea, does it not? Is not that the Senator's understanding?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know the exact amount, but it is something. Whatever it is, that is the effect of it.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is the substance of it. It may be, as some have pointed out, that it is the only way to keep ships upon the sea, and we may have to do it. I think, if we do it, we ought to do it with thorough knowledge of what we are doing; and those people who heretofore have been saying that under no circumstances would they vote for a subsidy ought to be made to realize that that is what they are doing; ought they not?

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, the situation is this: We have the ships. We are now in possession of them. They belong to the Government. The question here is, how we are going to dispose of them; whether we will dispose of them through the vote of four men or seven men.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Idaho has expired.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, it certainly afforded me the most intense gratification to hear what our Democratic leader, the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], had to say with reference to the amendment which I have offered to the pending bill. Along with many other things, it tends to show that he indeed has the breadth of view and the intellectual stature with which so many of his firm friends believe him to be generously endowed.

I was so infatuated as to believe that the time had passed when any Member of the Senate would rise to his feet and utter words of real disparagement of the Federal merit system of appointment.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator knows I have but a very short time; otherwise I would gladly yield to him.

As the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] intimated, it would be absolutely impossible to work the institutions of this country without chaos and confusion, and a vast volume of intrigue and corruption, but for this beneficent system of appointment.

Go back to the old spoils system of politics as it existed before the enactment of the Pendleton bill! That, indeed, in the vigorous language of the Scriptures, would be a dog returning to his vomit. Year by year during my lifetime the Federal merit system of appointment, in spite of all the selfish obstacles that have been sought to be thrown in its way, has been extended until now we have arrived at a time when it is considered nothing less than discreditable—I had almost said dishonorable—for a President of the United States, whether he be a Republican or whether he be a Democrat, to leave office without, by the exercise of an Executive order, giving a still larger scope to that system of appointment.

If we were to indulge the spirit of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], we might believe that we were back again in that Republican National Convention in which, when something was said about offices, the ravenous Mr. Flanagan, of Texas, arose and exclaimed, "Mr. Chairman, I should like to know what we are here for if we are not here for the offices." Such utterances show the degraded, sordid, and squalid consequences to which the spoils system of politics invariably leads.

The Senator from Florida told me only a few days ago that Mr. O'Connor, of the Shipping Board, had told him that for the lack of the merit system of appointment at one time there were 3,600 employees of the United States Shipping Board, that the number was subsequently reduced by the application of the squeezing process, with which we are all so familiar, to 1,600, and that in his opinion 600 would have answered all the purposes of the case. So in connection with the United States Shipping Board and the Fleet Corporation themselves, not to go any further, we have illustrations of the intrigue, the corruption, the demoralization, the degradation, the inefficiency, the waste that always result from the old system of patronage.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] said that he would not give his support to this amendment because we had had an example in the recent examinations of prohibition administrators and agents of what the merit system of appointment really means. Why, I ask——

The VICE PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

Mr. BRUCE. I believe I have five minutes on the bill; and that I have a right to go a little further in what I was saying with regard to the amendment before I reach the discussion of the bill.

I was one of the few Members in this body, civil-service reformer as I was, to vote against the placing of those prohibition administrators and agents under the merit system of appointment, because I thought, to begin with, that the duties of prohibition administrators and agents called for the exercise of faculties, and for the performance of duties, to which this merit system of appointment, flexible and adaptable as it is, was not adapted, assuming that there are any subordinate positions to which it is not suited; a thing which I am inclined to deny.

By what tortuous course of reasoning can the Senator from Colorado reach the conclusion that he does? It was that civil-service system, that very system which he disparages, which brought out in the most vivid and damning colors the unfitness in practically every respect of the existing personnel of the prohibition force for the duties of prohibition enforcement. Just think of it, 75 per cent of this whole body of men, whose conduct has so often been marked by the grossest profligacy, lawlessness, and corruption, were unable to meet successfully the highly practical tests given by the United States Civil Service Commission for the purpose of testing their efficiency.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRUCE. But for the fact that the civil-service system was made applicable to them, their shortcomings, their limitations, and their unfitness would never have been disclosed.

Mr. PHIPPS. Is the Senator aware that practically all of them failed because they were asked to answer hypothetical questions, which were not recorded, and the answers to which were not recorded?

Mr. BRUCE. I read those questions, and I think that they were most aptly and intelligently framed for the purpose of determining how far those men were or were not qualified for the duties which they wished to discharge.

Mr. PHIPPS. I know of cases where they did not record the questions or the answers.

Mr. BRUCE. Every one of the questions was a question asked as to what the prohibition agent would do under a given set of circumstances; and pray what duty is devolved upon a prohibition agent when in action except that of deciding, under a given set of circumstances, exactly what course he should pursue?

No; they failed because they had all been appointed as a result of the exercise of personal or political favoritism, or partiality, or of Anti-Saloon League influence, or of church influence, if you please, or in other words, of all sorts of influences except those that were really calculated to ascertain whether they were or were not fit for the positions they sought.

Mr. PHIPPS. May I say to the Senator that I know some who were appointed because they were recommended by the Anti-Saloon League and the Ministerial Alliance?

Mr. BRUCE. General Andrews testified that they were largely appointed at the instance of the Anti-Saloon League and similar influences in one form or another, and, of course, they were unfit, and, of course, had they been appointed by any other kinds of influence, without open competition, without competitive examination, without any real tests of fitness, they would have been just as unfit, perhaps.

A word with regard to the bill, and I am done. I recollect many years ago, when the first negro who ever practiced law in the State of Maryland was arguing a case in the court of appeals, he called on the court bailiff—an old white bailiff from southern Maryland, who, of course, had all the prejudices of his region—for a glass of water. As the bailiff passed by me he said, sotto voce, "I never thought that I would be toting water to a nigger." So I never thought that I would be voting for a scheme of Government operation; but I am compelled to vote for the pending bill because there is no other alternative, none whatever, so far as I can see. Our country has built up a great commerce throughout the world, including South American countries, and it is absolutely indispensable that our American shippers should not be compelled to rely for transportation upon foreign shipping interests, which would be in a position at any time to discriminate unfavorably against them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. BRUCE. There are many other things I would like to say on this subject, but under the time limitation there is nothing for me to do but to conclude.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I do not know to what extent and how far the civil service amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland goes. Before I support it, I would like to ask him some questions about it. I am a believer in civil service, but I can not disclaim having a great deal of sympathy for that young man who was being examined once for the position of rural mail carrier. One of the questions was, "What is the distance from the earth to the moon?" He replied, "I don't know the distance, and if that is part of my route, I don't want the job." I have always thought there was a great deal of sense in that answer.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I recollect when that canard was put out. The facts were run down by the Civil Service Commission, and it was discovered that the origin of the story was that an applicant for the position of assistant astronomer at the Washington Naval Observatory had been asked how far it was from the moon to the earth, a most appropriate question to be put to him.

Mr. SWANSON. I want to ask the Senator a practical question. The civil service law provides that appointments under it shall be prorated among the States according to population, except as to positions in the Government Printing Office and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. Under that law, I do not believe there has been a name certified for a clerical position from Maryland, the District of Columbia, or Virginia for about 10 or 15 years. If this amendment puts the employees of the board under the civil service law, and the offices are to be prorated among the States according to population, it seems to me it would result in the dismissal from the service of all the clerks in the Shipping Board who are from Virginia, Maryland, or the District of Columbia. I would like to know what the effect of the amendment would be.

Mr. BRUCE. It would not affect them at all. Its operation would be purely prospective. It would relate only to appointments made after the enactment of the law.

Mr. SWANSON. Does it mean that no man residing in Virginia, Maryland, or the District of Columbia can be certified for a position in the Shipping Board until the names on the eligible list from all the other States have been exhausted? I have not read the amendment.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator knows that under the general civil service laws each State has a quota, and because of the unfortunate proximity of his State and my State to Washington our quotas are exhausted. Is there anything unjust in that? After the State of Maryland has its quota supplied and the State of Virginia has its quota supplied, is it not only fair that things should be evened up a little bit by the distribution of Federal places among the other States of the Union?

Mr. SWANSON. I thought the idea was to get the best men, free of politics, irrespective of locality, the best, noblest, most efficient men in the world, to fill these positions. I do not see why a man who, better than everybody else, could fill a job, should be excluded because he comes from Maryland. If the Senator's amendment would result in prorating appointments to the Shipping Board according to absolute merit, as in the case in the Printing Office and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, irrespective of location, I am for it. If it makes utterly impossible the appointment of a man from Maryland, a man from Virginia, or a man from the District of Columbia, though he is the best man of all and stands the best examination, if he is to be excluded on account of his locality, I could not support the amendment. Therefore I ask the Senator, what is the effect of the amendment in that respect?

Mr. BRUCE. It does not differ at all from the general effect of the civil service laws. Under the civil service laws which have been in effect for the last 30 or 40 years, of course, appointments are equitably distributed among the different States.

Mr. SWANSON. Not in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and not in the Government Printing Office. If the Senator's amendment applies to the Shipping Board, the same principle that applies to the Government Printing Office and to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, I am for it, but I am unwilling to extend the civil-service provisions to other departments, when the best men in the world to fill the jobs are from Maryland, and are prohibited by the political distribution of patronage.

Mr. BRUCE. Much as I love the dear State in which I reside, I do not feel that it is just that she should have more than her fair share of the appointments under the civil service law.

Mr. SWANSON. Does this amendment apply to that situation or the other? Does it apply to the Bureau of Printing and Engraving?

Mr. BRUCE. It does not relate to the Bureau of Printing and Engraving at all.

Mr. SWANSON. Does it apply that principle to it?

Mr. BRUCE. No; it does not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Virginia has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland in my opinion is eminently right in this situation. I recognize the evils that result from civil service. I recognize that the system has its disadvantages and often very great inequalities that we would prefer did not exist, but the system as it is, sir, is better than no system at all. I feel, therefore, that the amendment ought to be adopted.

In another aspect I think the Senator from Maryland is entirely correct. This is not after all the application of the principle of Government ownership. It is a case of dire necessity, and being a case of dire necessity, the Government itself being the only place to which we may look to see a merchant marine nurtured, fostered, protected, conserved, and finally one of the character that we desire, to the Government itself we must go.

But, sir, let me call your attention to the sacrilege of some of these gentlemen who inveigh against Government ownership.

Why, sir, the very light that comes with its soft radiance from above and illumines the granite countenance of statesmanship in this body comes from an electric-light plant owned, operated, maintained, and conducted by the Congress of the United States. The very heat that warms the decrepit limbs in this body comes from a plant maintained, operated, conducted, and owned by the Government of the United States and the Congress of the United States. Sir, I have in my hand a magazine called Power. It speaks in most complimentary terms of what the United States Government is doing to-day with its plant and what the Congress is doing with its power plant and its heating plant in the city of Washington. What a terrible thing, how awful this is to those gentlemen who speak of Government ownership. Here they sit, sir, running a power plant in the city of Washington in opposition to and in competition with private initiative in this city, sir, that takes from the widows and the orphans, who own the stock and the bonds of private public-utility corporations, their wee bit of earnings from these great corporations. Here they sit, sir, these Senators and Congressmen of the United States, robbing widows and orphans who own the stock and the bonds of public-utility corporations, interfering with private initiative, in competition with the electric-light plant of the city of Washington. Here they sit doing it, sir, according to an official organ of electric power, at a lower cost and more efficiently than any private power plant in the city of Washington.

Oh, what an example these gentlemen set to the rest of the world; how they stifle industry and how they are stamping out competition in this land. Oh, sir, the sacrilege of it! You who are Senators and you who are Congressmen, who run this light plant and this power plant for the Capitol and who run it efficiently and economically in opposition to the private plants in the city of Washington and run it better than those plants, what a sacrilege!

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat will he permit me to ask whether he is speaking now for the Shipping Board or for Boulder Dam?

Mr. JOHNSON. I am speaking for those gentlemen who have shed their salty tears in this body over the idea that the United States should enter into competition with private initiative and with enterprise that is conducted by private corporations. You are doing it, sir, right now. Stop it, of course, for it is a terrible thing. It is sacrilege. It is treason.

Mr. BINGHAM. But the Senator has not said a word about Boulder Dam.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, having learned about the decrepit limbs of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] and having heard how the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is able to get about three times the appropriate quota that really belongs to his State in the civil service, I think it would be useful to have the amendment read which I understand is before the Senate.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the trouble is we have not any quota.

Mr. WILLIS. That is not my understanding. I understand the Senator's State and the State of Maryland and the District of Columbia have gotten practically all of the civil-service appointments. There is nobody left in their States to take those places. If he will look over the list he will find that every department is filled by people from Maryland, Virginia, and the District of Columbia. I ask for the reading of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the amendment, as requested.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, line 9, after the word "authorized," insert the following proviso:

Provided, That all offices, employments, and positions under the United States Shipping Board and the Fleet Corporation except offices and employments calling for the exercise of executive, initiative, or discretion, and positions calling for manual or menial services, shall be subject to the provisions of the Federal laws relating to the Federal classified civil service.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator one question.

Mr. WILLIS. It will have to be very brief, because my time is limited.

Mr. BRUCE. May not the state of things to which the Senator refers be due to the fact that the State of Ohio concentrates on such lofty positions as the Presidency while Maryland and Virginia are satisfied with only the small places? [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS. That is very persuasive, but notwithstanding I can not support the Senator's amendment.

Seriously I believe in the civil-service system. I believe in the merit system. But I am utterly unable to understand how this amendment could be made operative. Listen to it:

Except offices and employments calling for the exercise of executive, initiative, or discretion.

Just what does that mean?

Mr. SACKETT. Are those the offices held by Virginians and Marylanders?

Mr. WILLIS. I do not know. It does not appear here. It says "offices and employments calling for the exercise of executive." What is an office calling for "the exercise of executive"?

Mr. BRUCE. The chief of a bureau or division, or anyone exercising executive function.

Mr. WILLIS. I had not finished my question. The amendment goes on to say "and employments calling for the exercise of executive, initiative, or discretion." Who is going to determine that? How can we make that work out practically in the law? "Or discretion." What office is it that has discretion or does not have discretion?

We can not afford to legislate in such a fashion as that and adopt an amendment which we can not interpret. I am in favor of the civil service, but I think the amendment which the Senator from Maryland has proposed, if attempted to be carried into effect, would be utterly unintelligible, and, therefore, with great regret and notwithstanding my affection for him and his generosity, I shall be compelled to vote against the amendment.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, does the Senator from Ohio labor under the delusion that there is a fair enforcement of the civil service law?

Mr. WILLIS. I do not labor under a delusion. My opinion is very definite that there is a fair apportionment, and I do not criticize the Senator and his colleague, though I think his State has more than its share.

Mr. GLASS. I said a fair enforcement.

Mr. WILLIS. Oh, I did not understand the Senator. I thought the Senator said "apportionment." I would not like to condemn the whole civil service because there are some things in it that do not meet with my approval.

Mr. GLASS. I had gotten the impression that the Senator from Maryland acknowledges that the prohibition law is not enforced, and that because it is not enforced it ought to be repealed. Therefore I am somewhat surprised that the Senator from Maryland should offer an amendment to the bill relating to the civil service law, which is not enforced any more than the prohibition amendment is enforced—not a bit more. I have an utter contempt for the evasions and for the pretenses that I encounter here in the so-called enforcement of the civil service law.

I had one experience within a few weeks where a boy who had gone across the ocean and offered his life for his country and was shot to pieces, and had, in a competition for a position as rural carrier, stood first on the list, but was turned down for a bomb-proof artist by the Civil Service Commission and the Post Office Department. Then Senators talk to me about the enforcement of the civil service law! It is not enforced half as well as the prohibition law.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Virginia the name of that person and that rural mail carrier and what his route is, so that I may have an opportunity to verify the statement?

Mr. GLASS. He bears a very distinguished name. His name is Jefferson.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator is sure it was not Andrew Jackson?

Mr. GLASS. He was located in the State of Virginia, and he went across the ocean and was shot to pieces in defense of his country. He was first on the civil-service list after taking the examination and he was turned down for the lowest man on the list, who did not get shot, who did not even get across the ocean.

Mr. BRUCE. Perhaps he was shot so badly that he did not have the physical strength to discharge the duties of the position.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, yes; he had. He was not shot so badly but that he was enabled to take the civil-service examination, and he was first on the certified list.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I inquire who turned him down?

Mr. GLASS. He was turned down for the lowest man on the list. The Post Office Department turned him down.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no knowledge, of course, as to that particular case; but I would like to make the suggestion that when the Senator said the Civil Service Commission turned the applicant down, I have an idea that upon investigation he would find that all the Civil Service Commission did was to hold the examination and place the names on the list in their order.

Mr. GLASS. No; the Civil Service Commission did this: Under a mere technical pretense it gave military status to a fellow who did not get within 3,000 miles of France during the war. He did not even get to a military camp in this country. He went to school in Virginia, and by some sort of hocus pocus he was certified as having a military status, and the man who had really gone to war and was shot to pieces was turned down.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator said that the one who was turned down stood first on the list?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; he did.

Mr. NORRIS. Somebody made the selection, and that was not the Civil Service Commission. He was not turned down by the Civil Service Commission, therefore. Perhaps it was submitted to some Congressman or some Senator or some governor, who made the selection out of the three highest on the list, and he selected the other one for partisan or political reasons.

Mr. OVERMAN. Or some chairman of a committee. That is what happened in my State.

Mr. NORRIS. There is an illustration, I think, which demonstrates that the real spirit of the civil service law is not enforced; but it is a demonstration, in my judgment, that the evil which the civil service law was intended to obviate and do away with has not been removed but still exists to some extent and interferes with the proper and real enforcement of the civil service law and theories.

Mr. GLASS. If the Senator wants to know what really happened in that Virginia case——

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Senator will not take my time.

Mr. GLASS. What really happened was that the man in charge of the sale of patronage in Virginia wanted this other man to have the job.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly. That makes it plain. That is not the fault of the Civil Service Commission; that is the fault of our defective civil service law, which enables the dealer in patronage or other partisan traffic policemen to defeat what ought to be a real good civil service law but which is not so on account of that defect.

Mr. GLASS. But if the Civil Service Commission had not given military status to this "bomb-proof" artist, he could not have been appointed.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well; then some other "bomb-proof" artist would have been appointed, and they would not have selected the man who stood first on the list and who ought to have been appointed under a fair interpretation of the law. Such things occur because we have not as yet removed from the law the partisanship that we ought to take out of it. It is our fault that we have not passed the right kind of a civil service law. The law does not go the full length that it ought to go. The object of the civil service law is to eliminate the evils of partisanship and political corruption that otherwise sometimes come in the selection of public appointees.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me for just one moment, I desire to suggest that he knows that allowance has to be made for military status under the law itself.

Mr. GLASS. But it means a real military status.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Senators will not take up my time. I think we have got an idea of just what happened. A dealer in political patronage was the man who was to blame.

We ought so to amend the law as to exclude that kind of influence and enact a real civil service law that would take away from Senators and Representatives in Congress, from political chairmen, and from partisan dealers in corrupt politics the right to make selections or to have anything to say about the appointment of public officers. Then we should have a civil service law that would be more completely effective than it now is.

Mr. President, I think the evil of pie-counter methods of appointment to office and the old spoils system is well illustrated by what the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] has said. As I understand him, he is going to vote for or against this particular amendment according to whether it will let Virginia get in and secure some more offices or whether it will keep Virginia out. There is another illustration of the evil that we are trying to get away from in a fair civil service law.

Mr. SWANSON. No; if the Senator from Nebraska will permit me, I desire to say that I said I would not vote for a law that would discriminate.

Mr. NORRIS. That is, one that will not let Virginia get in.

Mr. SWANSON. No. Let me make my own answer and not have the Senator from Nebraska make it. I said I would not vote for a law which provided that a Virginian who passes the best examination and stands highest on the eligible list can not secure an appointment until the quota from Nebraska shall have been filled.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; in other words, Virginia, though it already has its quota, has got to have an additional quota; otherwise, we lose the vote of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. Oh, no. I say the best man ought to get the job.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, the best man ought to get the job; but he must come from Virginia. That is the position. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] well says, I think that even if the amendment should operate against his State, if that State has received her quota we ought to let other States have an opportunity to fill their quotas. That is the theory of the law.

Mr. President, I believe if we will consider the matter thoroughly and conscientiously we must reach the conclusion that if we should repeal the civil service law and should put all of the thousands of appointive places on the political pie counter we would have corruption running rank in Government offices; we would be unable to carry on the Government in any kind of a systematic and efficient manner. It would almost bring destruction and ruin to the Government. We ought to devote our time to improving the civil service law and getting rid of the defects which, I admit, already exist, rather than to cut it down and place all the offices from janitor on up in all the various departments of the Government on the political pie counter subject to sale, as has been described with reference to a rural carrier, in thousands of instances by the dealer in political corruption and in political offices.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska, I am sure, does not understand that I am in favor of repealing the civil service law?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I did not wish to intimate that.

Mr. GLASS. My complaint is that it is not properly enforced.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator that it is not always properly enforced, and one of the reasons, as I have said many times, is because the law itself is defective. I know that to be so from complaints which come to me from Nebraska and which doubtless come to other Senators. We hear of persons who claim that some particular person who obtained a promotion contrary to the rule got it because he or she had a "pull" with some Senator or with some Member of the House of Representatives or with some governor or with some political chairman somewhere in the United States. So the idea has become somewhat general that it takes a political "pull" to secure a promotion even under the civil service. I know that such statements are frequently exaggerated; I have often found when I investigated that they were exaggerated and were without foundation; but there is some reason for the complaint. I have no doubt there are many instances where such things have occurred.

The civil service law, of course, is imperfect, just as every law is imperfect which is enacted and administered by human beings, none of whom are perfect. There will always be cases where injury may be done and where there is not a fair enforcement of the law; but Senators ought to recognize, it seems to me, that if, because it is imperfect, because injustices arise from time to time, we should repeal the law and refuse to put these employees or other employees under the civil service, we would get into a position where we would be a thousand times worse off than we now are.

I think it has been generally known that, not being under the civil service, the Fleet Corporation and the Shipping Board during the last few years have constituted a sort of rendevouz for politicians where they could push their friends and get jobs for them. The Senator from Maryland has given us some information that it seems to me is very valuable. They had more than twice as many employees as they ought to have had because they were not under the civil service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BINGHAM in the chair). The time of the Senator from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, my only objection to the civil service law as at present administered is that it does not secure the most efficient employees. I think a civil service law that requires the commission to certify on a pro rata basis applicants who have an average of 70 in preference to applicants who have obtained an average of 90 is wrong. I think if we are going to have a merit system it ought to be a genuine merit system.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Has not the Senator already spoken on the pending amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair assumes that the Senator from Virginia is now speaking on the bill.

Mr. JONES. Very well.

Mr. SWANSON. As I have said, if we are going to have a merit system it ought to be a genuine merit system, and not a system under which appointments are distributed and pro rated on some other basis. I do not see, as I have said, why applicants who have averaged 90 in the examination should be set aside and preference given to applicants who have averaged perhaps only 70, because they come from a section of the country which has not its quota of civil-service employees. If we are going to have a merit system, I think the effort should be made to obtain the best results, and that can be only done by procuring the most capable and efficient men, not by a pro rata system. I think such a system as I have suggested would be the best one to follow and that under it we would procure the most efficient results.

My complaint of the present system is that it is not efficient. I do not know of anybody who has been certified from Virginia, Maryland, or the District of Columbia for almost 10 years.

People come from other States and acquire homes in Virginia, and are then charged up to Virginia's quota. To such an extent is this true that real Virginians have stopped taking the examinations. The present system has worked gross injustice. I repeat that not many real Virginians, not many real citizens of Maryland, and perhaps not many real natives of the District of Columbia are holding Government offices, but people come to those jurisdictions, acquire homes, and then are credited to them. I think if a young man from Virginia or Maryland or the District of Columbia or West Virginia or any of the near-by States is the most competent and capable and passes an examination of 95 he should be preferred over somebody who stands an examination of 70, and yet the man with the lowest grade is given the preference because he comes from a State which has not its quota filled. That is not an efficient and capable civil service, and that is my objection to the present system.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I am anxious to proceed with the bill, and will only take a few moments. I am glad the Senator from Maryland has submitted his amendment. I think we ought to have had legislation of this kind in the very beginning, and while the amendment may not accomplish all that the Senator from Maryland desires or all that we should like to have accomplished it will be helpful, and I hope it will be adopted. The Shipping Board and the Fleet Corporation during the last administration in a way furnished a political pie counter, and that sort of thing ought to be stopped.

Mr. President, I wish to offer for the RECORD in my time a letter from Fred Brenckman, Esq., Washington representative of the National Grange, with reference to the position of the National Grange on the pending bill. I ask that the letter may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NATIONAL GRANGE,
Washington, D. C., January 28, 1928.

DEAR SENATOR: We note that the Jones bill, amending the merchant marine act, is approaching a vote in the Senate, and wish to apprise you of the attitude of the National Grange, as expressed in the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted at our last annual session, held at Cleveland, Ohio, November 16–25, 1927:

"Whereas an adequate American merchant marine is vital to our prosperity and security as a nation; and

"Whereas private enterprise, under prevailing conditions, can not fully supply the need in transoceanic service: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the National Grange favors continued ownership and operation of merchant ships by the Government through the agency of the United States Shipping Board, as necessity demands; and be it further

"Resolved, That we favor appropriations by Congress to keep our merchant fleet modern and efficient."

It is probably true that some of the ships of our war-time fleet should be disposed of in the most advantageous way that may be open. But we do not approve of disposing of the better class of ships for such an inadequate return as a mere five-year guaranty of operation.

We are strongly of the opinion that the time has arrived when this country must adopt definite and constructive measures to put our merchant fleet on a sound and continuing basis, unless we are to witness a painful repetition of the experiences of 1914.

We favor the Jones bill and hope you may see your way clear to support it.

Yours respectfully,

FRED. BRENCKMAN,
Washington Representative.

Mr. FLETCHER. I also offer two editorials which were printed in the January issue of the Port of New York, one entitled "Government-owned ships in foreign trade," and the other entitled "Jute imports—A case in point." I ask to have them printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GOVERNMENT-OWNED SHIPS IN FOREIGN TRADE

If a majority of Democrats in Congress line up in favor of a Government ownership bill, as seems probable, and a majority of Republicans should join hands with them, as Senator W. L. JONES, chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee, has done, as did all of the Republican members of his committee, such a bill could be put through Congress by an overwhelming majority. We can not imagine the President vetoing such a bill, so supported.

Democrats and Middle West Republicans hitherto have opposed, and for 30 years have succeeded in defeating all attempts to obtain Government aid or protection for American ships in foreign trade. But they seem, now, to be willing to have the Government meet Shipping Board losses, so-called, occasioned through Government ownership, as for the past seven years such losses have been met, the period of such ownership having been prolonged because of the determined opposition of Congress to take money from the National Treasury to maintain American ships in foreign trade.

An effective policy of Government ownership should give the country lines of up-to-date ships, through new construction and replacements, adapted to the trade routes over which they operate, equal in every way to the foreign ships with which they have to compete. Could this country do anything less desired by foreign shipowners? Would not such ships give us merchant ships for national-defense purposes in war, and commercial purposes in peace, most acutely needed? Without Government aid what private interests could do that? Nobody dreams that any would or could. When it became obvious to all the world that our ships were in foreign trade to stay, cargoes would steadily gravitate to them, and they might become self-sustaining. That would be the time to dispose of them to private interests with greater assurance of their remaining permanently upon the seas.

Why should not we get, while the chance of getting it seems so favorable, a real, effective American merchant marine in foreign trade, especially when opposition to such a program might defeat all other efforts to secure such an American merchant marine? All such ships would be American-built, American-owned, managed wholly by Americans, officered and manned by Americans—a real American merchant marine; our people would become more and more experienced and skilled in operating them, and all the while the essential needs of the Nation in respect to an American merchant marine would be met.

JUTE IMPORTS—A CASE IN POINT

It is an elementary truism with Britons that purchasers of goods have a right to say how they shall be carried, when the truism is not put to the acid test of a try out. The truism is an abstract proposition, but a concrete case in point is now offered to the world which is at complete variance with the truism. Upwards of 650,000 tons of jute are imported into this country, necessitating about 69 sailings from India each year to bring it here. Of these, American ships enjoyed four sailings, and latterly have been asking for one-fourth the carrying, which seems to be modest, to say the least. The British Cunard-Ellerman-Bucknell Lines refuse to agree, as British lines are wont to do when they think they control, truisms to the contrary notwithstanding. So the Roosevelt Line of United States Shipping Board ships is determined to obtain at least 16 cargoes of jute annually for the United States, to secure which they have cut the freight rate from 35 to 25 cents a hundred pounds, quickly followed by a cut from $7.90 to $4.50 a ton by the Cunard Line. Vice Chairman E. C. Plummer, of the United States Shipping Board, in charge of traffic, announces for the board that it is prepared to cut the rate, if necessary, to 10 cents a hundred pounds.

Thus a locking of horns between the United States Government and a powerful combination of British shipping interests occurs. The contest, which we opine will result in American ships carrying at least one-fourth of the jute imported into this country, may be studied at close range. Needless to say, it will be watched with keenest interest, especially as showing to what lengths Uncle Sam will go in an ocean-freight-rate war to obtain a modest share of the carrying of our imports, and British shipowners to sustain what they probably regard as their rights—possession of all of the carrying.

Who knows? This may be the first gun in a contest to show whether John Bull really does command the trade and carrying of the world. Well, no one is better able to "tote his load" in such a contest than Uncle Sam!

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, while I am on my feet——

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FLETCHER. I only have a limited time.

Mr. WILLIS. I wish merely to ask a question in regard to the pending amendment. I understand the Senator from Florida to be supporting it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. WILLIS. Will he explain what is meant by the clause, "except offices and employments calling for the exercise of executive, initiative, or discretion"? What is such an office?

Mr. FLETCHER. My construction of that expression would be that it is intended to cover such positions, for instance, as the president of the Fleet Corporation, the vice president, the trustees of the Fleet Corporation, and other officials of that kind, experienced experts who are selected to conduct and manage the business. We paid at one time $95,000 a year salary to three men to take charge of the operation of the ships. Those men ought not to be subjected to civil-service examination. To one man we paid $35,000; to another we paid $30,000; and to a third we paid $30,000. In that way we obtained talent and experience in connection with the operation of ships. Those men ought not to be included in any requirement for civil-service examination.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further, I agree with his views as to what ought to be done, but I submit to him that this language which he says he is going to vote for conveys no such impression.

The exercise of executive, initiative, and discretion—

If any human being can tell what that means well and good; I can not.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it is intended to cover positions of the kind to which I have referred, calling for expert knowledge of shipping matters.

With reference to the suggestion with regard to the requirement of the unanimous vote of the Shipping Board for the sale of the ships, I want to say that every man and woman in the United States is a stockholder in the Shipping Board and the Fleet Corporation. That is a corporation in which the people of this country own the stock; they are interested in it. That corporation has a vast property in their control and under their management, property that cost millions of dollars. Therefore, in order to safeguard the rights of the people of this country in their property, we require that there shall be unanimous consent before that property shall be disposed of in any way, and that it must be used for their benefit.

If it costs to operate the ships a little more than we get out of them in the way of returns, we must bear in mind that we are keeping down freight rates on the ocean and saving the shippers of this country million of dollars every month more than the actual deficit. We save monthly to the people of this country by reason of having these ships in operation, and we are extending our commerce and expanding our trade over the world, and keeping our flag on the seas. That is the thing to be accomplished and it can not be accomplished in any other way than as pointed out by this bill.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I am in favor of this amendment. From my experience in the public service I have concluded that the civil-service system promotes, on the whole, merit and efficiency. Whatever mistakes have been made in the administration of the civil service have been due in large part to the influences of partisan public officials in positions elected or appointed to high places. The abuses that have occurred in the civil-service system are due not to the law or to the commission, but are due, as I said, to the attitude which the administrative officers take with the approval of those in high positions toward adopting subterfuges to escape the strict intent and interpretation of the law.

Undoubtedly mistakes have been made in the administration of the civil service law by the Civil Service Commission itself. Undoubtedly there are wrongs and at times grave blunders by those directing the system; but it seems to me that, on the whole, the civil-service system has tended to improve the public service greatly, and I would dislike very much to see a return in any degree to the old system which eliminated the civil-service requirements. We should seek to improve and strengthen rather than weaken the system that has greatly eliminated the evils of the spoils system.

Therefore I shall vote with special satisfaction and pleasure for the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 7. That in the allocations of the operations of the ships the Shipping Board shall distribute them as far as possible, and without detriment to the service, among the various ports of the country.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I simply desire to say that I do not think this amendment is necessary. I think the board has ample authority to do this now, but the amendment can do no harm, so I make no objection to it, and, so far as I am concerned, it may be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, on the desk is an amendment which I offered yesterday proposing to amend section 870 of the shipping act as found in the Code of Laws of the United States. May we have that amendment read, please?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the proper place in the bill:

That section 870 of the shipping act, as found in the Code of Laws of the United States, shall be amended to permit the loan of 75 per cent of the constructional cost of the ships for a period of 20 years, and at the rate of interest which is paid by the Government at the time upon money borrowed.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the Senate will recall that the law at present permits a loan up to 66⅔ per cent of the constructional cost under certain methods of protection of the Government. The period of the loan is for 15 years, and the amount of interest 4¼ per cent in foreign trade.

This amendment provides for an extension of the amount to 75 per cent of the cost of the ship, a 20-year period for the loan, and there is to be charged the current rate of interest, whatever that may be. It is now about 3¼ per cent.

Of course, the purpose of this amendment is to encourage the building of ships by private owners. I hope the matter will receive the favorable attention of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I think this amendment ought to be defeated. It amends a very important provision of the act of 1920, and that act, I think, was very liberal in itself.

I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I had assumed there would be no opposition to the amendment. I hoped there would be no opposition to it.

Mr. JONES. I make the point of order that the Senator can not discuss his amendment twice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. COPELAND. What was the statement of the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington raised the point of order that the Senator from New York, having spoken on his amendment, and having yielded the floor, is not at liberty to speak on it a second time.

Mr. COPELAND. If the Chair will bear with me for a moment——

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I will take the floor, and I should like to ask the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah has the floor.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator from New York to explain the amendment so that the Senator from Washington can understand it.

Mr. JONES. I object to that. I think that is contrary to the spirit of the unanimous-consent agreement, and contrary to the rules of the Senate.

Mr. COPELAND. Well, I am satisfied, Mr. President.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I confess that I do not agree with the Senator from Washington. I just came into the Chamber. I should like to learn just what this amendment is. May I ask the Senator from Washington whether he opposes the amendment because it provides for the loaning of money to those who in good faith construct ships?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, we have a law now which provides for the loaning of money to people who want to borrow it for the construction of ships. That was a very well matured provision in the law, and no substantial reason has been shown for changing it.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator from New York wherein the amendment improves the existing law, and what he hopes can be accomplished by his amendment if it becomes a part of that law that can not be accomplished under the present statute?

Mr. COPELAND. If the Senator heard what I said yesterday, he will recall that I presented here a ship-building proposal, which was made by the persons who built the Saratoga.

Mr. KING. I am familiar with the Wilder proposal.

Mr. COPELAND. The first request made by that concern was that the loan privilege be increased. It would make a difference of about $10,000,000 in the amount that the firm could borrow, which in itself is not so important. The rate of interest would be the current rate, and, of course, the Government would not lose a cent. We now have about $90,000,000 in the loan fund, and this amount will be increased automatically. As this concern, or any other undertaking to build ships, needs money, it will be there. That was the testimony of Chairman O'Connor before the Appropriations Committee the other day. The important thing about this amendment is that instead of the rate of interest being 4¼ per cent it would be 3⅛ or 3¼, which would make a tremendous difference in the overhead charges of the concern. You understand, of course, no appropriation need be made—the money lies in the loan fund of the Shipping Board.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator from New York ought to understand by this time that the proponents of absolute Government ownership and operation of a merchant marine dominate the Senate, and they are going to prevent any amendment to this bill that would encourage private ownership and private operation of a merchant marine. We are embarking upon governmental ownership, and we can not disguise that fact. All this talk about this being only temporary is mere camouflage, and there is a good deal of hypocrisy about it—no Senators, of course, being included within that observation, because they are all sincere.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield for a question.

Mr. EDGE. Do I understand likewise that the amendment increases the amount that can be borrowed from 66⅔ per cent to 75 per cent?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. EDGE. In other words, if I understand the amendment, if it should be adopted, with this program of perpetual Government ownership before us, it would at least mean that the taxpayers of the country could save 25 per cent, which would be furnished by private capital. Otherwise, as has been many times stated and announced on the floor during the debate on this bill, the Government will pay 100 per cent. If this amendment is defeated, in other words, the practical effect would be that we refuse to take 25 per cent from private citizens or corporations under an agreement that they will build ships and prefer to pay 100 per cent of the taxpayers' money.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as I stated a moment ago, the proponents of this bill do not want private operation. This bill is undoubtedly designed, as stated by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] this morning and in his speech of a few days ago, to commit the Government irretrievably to the owning and operating of the merchant marine; and any amendment, if it were clear as the noonday sun, that would indicate how we could have a merchant marine under private ownership would be rejected, in my opinion, by the Senate.

I regret exceedingly that we have passed out of the domain of private ownership in the shipping business and confess the incompetency of the American business man and the American people to run their own affairs, and that we have to build up a bureaucracy and crawl under the legs of bureaucrats because we are incompetent to run our own affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND].

Mr. EDGE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I desire to say that under the present law we have made exceedingly liberal and generous provisions for constituting this loan fund and providing for loaning upon a ship two-thirds of its cost at 4¼ per cent interest. That is exceedingly liberal. No private individual would loan over one-half the cost of the ship. The Government is now in position to loan two-thirds of the cost of the ship at this low rate of interest. That is exceedingly liberal. To make that 75 per cent would make it unsafe. Very likely a ship would depreciate in a year's time or in two years' time 25 per cent, in which case the Government would have to take back the ship if it had made a loan upon it.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator thinks the difference between 66⅔ per cent and 75 per cent is unsafe?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes, I do; absolutely unsafe, and I do not think the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am going to vote against this amendment, but I do not want to have my view misconstrued with reference to this Wilder proposition. I have heard something about the Wilder proposition, that they expected to build a good many ships if they could make certain arrangements, and so forth, and remove the matter from the subvention or subsidy class.

When I vote against this amendment to-day I should not like to have the Shipping Board construe my action as being opposed to any policy with reference to this project that is now before the Shipping Board. I think it is most unfortunate that this amendment is offered to this bill, because evidently it will be defeated and some persons will accept it as giving a black eye to the proposal of the Wilder people.

I merely desire to say that, because no doubt there will be others who will vote against the amendment entertaining the same views as I do.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from New York as to the provision for repayment of these loans.

Mr. COPELAND. The law is not changed. I take article 870 of the code, where the conditions are made for the repayment on the present basis, which is for 15 years. The provision is:

> If it is not to be repaid within two years from the date when the first advance on the loan is made by the board, the principal shall be payable in installments to be definitely prescribed in the instruments. Such installments shall be made payable at intervals not exceeding two years, and in amounts not less than 6 per cent of the original amount of the loan.

The law is not changed, except that the time is extended from 15 years to 20 years, the amount of money which can be advanced is made 75 per cent, instead of 66, and the rate of interest is reduced from four and a quarter, as prescribed in the act, to the current rate, whatever it may be.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, so far as the current rate is concerned, no private interest in this country should have the advantage of tax-free money. The Government can borrow on a three and a half per cent basis, provided the bonds issued are tax-free, but if the bonds were subject to taxation that rate would be about four or four and a quarter per cent, and I do not believe we should afford any commercial enterprise the advantage of a lower rate.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, if the Senator believes in Government ownership and operation, as I assume he does, and I honor him for his position, he is opposed to any plan which will permit private parties to get into the shipping business. Of course, the reason for the introduction of the amendment is to help private interests to build ships, to operate them, and in order to assist the enterprise, to give them cheap money.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I am not opposed to lending Government funds on a proper basis to a public-utility enterprise, providing such private enterprise would carry out its agreements; but, unfortunately, private enterprise will not carry out its agreements with the Government. They make an agreement, and then, after they have been favored, as in the case of the railroads, they come to Congress and ask that it be modified—lobby therefor.

Again, I am in favor of public ownership, but I believe that the only way to carry on public ownership successfully is for the Government to do its business in a thoroughly businesslike manner, and a loan, such as proposed, is not a businesslike loan.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOWELL. Seventy-five per cent of the cost of these ships is to be loaned on the basis of tax-free securities, and but 6 per cent to be paid back every two years. This is not, in my opinion, a businesslike arrangement in connection with the development of a merchant marine by private interests.

Mr. COPELAND. Will the Senator yield just a moment?

Mr. HOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. What about lending money to the farmer? Do we not do that?

Mr. HOWELL. Yes; the Federal land banks lend money to the farmer, and the farmer is paying now 5 per cent for that money.

Mr. FLETCHER. But they never lend over 50 per cent of the value of their property.

Mr. HOWELL. They never lend over 50 per cent of the value of their property, and the farmers have to pay up, or the loans will be foreclosed. But we propose here to secure loans for ships on this basis——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time on the amendment has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND]. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the Chief Clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who is absent. I understand that if present he would vote on this amendment as I am about to vote. Therefore I am at liberty to vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. FERRIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. In his absence, not knowing how he would vote on the pending amendment, I withhold my vote.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. In his absence, not knowing how he would vote on this amendment, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TYSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], who is absent. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KING (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE], who is absent. Not knowing how he would vote, I am compelled to withdraw my vote.

So Mr. COPELAND'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BINGHAM in the chair). The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 15, after the words "section 4," strike out the word "the" and insert the words "If the board becomes convinced that there is a," so it will read:

If the board becomes convinced that there is a necessity for the replacement of vessels owned by the United States—

And so forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, of course I do not labor under the hope that this amendment will prevail. But Senators seem to be hopeful that the pending bill is going to solve all the troubles of the Shipping Board and perpetuate a merchant marine. Of course, there is nothing so desirable as that provided for in the bill. There is not a constructive thing in the bill. All it does is to make it impossible to sell the ships.

I want to show why there is so much enthusiasm on the part of certain boards of trade and chambers of commerce about the bill and why certain persons in seaports of the country are in favor of perpetuating the ownership of this fleet in the Shipping Board.

I have here the report of the Shipping Board for the year ending June 30, 1926. I find that in that year the Shipping Board paid out to private parties for commissions for the operation of these ships the sum of $7,970,000. In other words, about $8,000,000 was paid out for this purpose. Those men got their money whether the United States made anything or not.

During the next fiscal year ending last June that sum was increased to $8,896,000. It had increased almost $1,000,000.

These private operators are making plenty of money out of the operation of the Shipping Board ships. They are happy, and Senators are imagining that by the enactment of the bill pending, somehow or other, we are to have an effective merchant marine. Nothing could be more opposed to the truth.

We do not get one single thing in the bill that is not in the existing law, except that it is made impossible to sell any ships. That means that the antiquated ships will continue to be operated by the Shipping Board for ever and ever, so far as we can tell. Of course, if the Senate wants to have that system prevail and that method continued, the thing to do is to vote down all amendments and pass the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, one is amazed at the revelations just given to the Senate by the Senator from New York, and yet, knowing the system which has prevailed and the incompetency and inefficiency of the board which has control of the ships, one is a little surprised at their moderation. It seems as if they have deliberately planned to evolve a system for the operation of the ships that would bring unsatisfactory results to the American people and great profit and benefit to those who seem to be the favorites of the Shipping Board.

I recall when Mr. Lasker was in charge of the Shipping Board. He came before the Congress and asked for $50,000,000 for the operations for the ensuing year, plus all proceeds derived from the sale of ships and other property owned by the board.

My recollection is that the year before and the fiscal year following his testimony the cost to the Government in meeting the deficits of the board was approximately $100,000,000. That was a direct loss. In addition, there was subtracted, of course, from the assets of the board tens of millions of dollars. We have spent more than $3,500,000,000 in building and operating merchant vessels. We had 2,600 or 2,700 ships. We now have about 800. More than a thousand were sold. All of the proceeds derived from the sale of these ships have been swallowed up by the Shipping Board and Fleet Corporation to-day aggregate in value less than $124,000,000. We might just as well face the fact that the Government has lost $3,500,000,000 in this experiment of Government ownership and operation of a merchant marine.

Attention has been repeatedly called to the M. O. 4 contracts and the frauds which were perpetrated under them. Men were paid large sums for operating the ships. They were permitted to organize corporations upon the side to sell to themselves as operators, at enormous prices, articles and commodities necessary in the operation of the vessels. I am told that while that evil does not exist to the extent that it did formerly, it has not been eliminated, and that in addition to the $8,000,000 paid last year to operators who incurred no risk whatever, they profited by selling supplies to themselves. Yet with this record of maladministration, of inefficiency, if not corruption, we are about to commit the Government to a continuation of a policy that has been condemned both by Congress and the country.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I hope the amendment will be defeated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask that the second amendment which I offered may be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The second amendment offered by the Senator from New York is on page 2, to insert in line 15, before the word "necessity," the words "If the board becomes convinced that there is a," and in line 20, to strike out the words "is hereby recognized and," so as to read:

If the board becomes convinced that there is a necessity for the replacement of vessels owned by the United States and in the possession or under the control of the board and the construction of additional up-to-date cargo, combination cargo and passenger, and passenger ships, to give the United States an adequate merchant marine, the board is authorized and directed to present to Congress from time to time—

And so forth.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, we have a chance to encourage the building of six master ships. We have a chance to build ships finer than any now afloat. Instead of smiling upon the offer and the suggestion of the advisability of building these ships, the Senate laughs at those private parties who make the suggestion.

I know perfectly well the fate of this amendment or any other amendment seeking to amend this useless measure. There is a firm and steadfast determination on the part of this body to pass the bill. I am aware of that. But I intend to take this one more chance to point out its weakness, because there are three or four Senators here who have not been present when the debate was proceeding.

The measure in the first section reenacts the first section of the present law. It does not add to it. It does not take from it. It reenacts what is already the law.

Leaving the second section for the moment, section 3 permits the Shipping Board to make any additional or ordinary repairs. They may recondition. There is nothing now which prevents the reconditioning of ships. That is the law. Section 3 adds nothing to it.

Section 4 permits the board to come before Congress and ask that more money be appropriated to build ships. They can do it now. There is nothing new about that.

Section 6 says that—all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed to the extent of any such inconsistency.

We do not have to repeal anything. Everything is left as it is. Nothing is taken from the present law and nothing is added to it. The only thing in the world in the pending measure is a provision that no ship may be sold except by the unanimous and affirmative vote of the board. For two weeks the Senate has occupied its time—and I have taken my full share of it, I admit—in reenacting laws that are already upon the statute books. The only other thing done is to let the country know that no more ships are to be sold and that private parties must not build or even suggest that they are to build ships.

They are to be scared away. "Stop, look, and listen" is the sign put up by the second section of the bill. All citizens of our country who seek to build ships are given the warning that their efforts are useless and that we do not want them to help. We have reached that decision.

However, those in opposition have put the facts before the country. If I mistake not, the country will say that the passage of this bill to-day is the wrong thing and that the Senate has taken a step backward. We have not planned to build up the American merchant marine, but we have planned to destroy it. I can see nothing else in the pending bill than the destruction of the American merchant marine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, we have heard a good deal said during the discussion of the bill about certain prominent shipping interests of the country being interested in the development of an American merchant marine under private control. The Senator who now occupies the chair [Mr. BINGHAM] stated, in the course of one of his speeches in this connection, that there were several citizens, whom he named, "concerned in"—I use his language—"and connected with Transoceanic Corporation." The citizens and interests named are of high repute and excellent standing in the community. Some of us were rebuked for inquiring into the extent of interest and the good faith of those supporting the proposed project. However, I took the trouble to send a telegram to four of those named by the Senator who now occupies the chair. I sent them yesterday the following telegram:

JANUARY 30, 1928.

Mr. THOMAS H. ROSSBOTTOM,
Panama Railroad Steamship Co.,
New York City, N. Y.:

You are stated to be concerned in and connected with Transoceanic Corporation proposing 35-knot Atlantic liners. Is this true, and have you indorsed this proposition technically and financially? Kindly reply immediately.

DAVID I. WALSH, United States Senator.

To three of these telegrams I have received answers, which I send to the desk and ask the clerk to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., January 30, 1928.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate:

Telegram received. I am not concerned in nor connected with Transoceanic Corporation, either financially or in any other way. I was asked to act with Mr. Howland Gardner, of the Eastern Steamship Co., and with Mr. Oakley Wood, of the Barber Line, as a committee having operating experience to look over and comment upon figures prepared by or for Brown-Boveri Co., showing the expected operating expenses of a six-steamer fleet. Basing our consideration entirely upon the hypothesis laid down for us that the steamers would be of the size, speed, and capacity necessary to make the itineraries fixed by the Brown-Boveri Co., and expecting that hypothesis without any investigation on our part, we told them the extent to which we considered their figures of operating expenses should be modified. We did not concern ourselves with the practicability of the scheme nor with any figures showing estimated revenues or probable results of operation.

T. H. ROSSBOTTOM.

QUINCY, MASS., January 31, 1928.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate:

Neither my corporation nor myself have any financial interest in the Transoceanic Corporation. I consented, with other engineers, to serve on a committee of propulsion to give technical advice to the Transoceanic Corporation.

S. W. WAKEMAN.

NEW YORK CITY, January 31, 1928.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Reference wire Transoceanic Corporation, have passed and approved of technical questions involved in boiler room. Other technical questions outside our province. Am not personally interested financially. As company and individuals heartily indorse this steamship proposition.

C. W. MIDDLETON.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I have no further information, but I wish to call attention to the fact that those who answered the telegrams that were sent state that they are not concerned nor connected financially with the Transoceanic Corporation. I will let the telegrams speak for themselves.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and is open to amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, on behalf of the present Presiding Officer, who asked me to propose an amendment that he has offered, I submit an amendment. I will say that while I do not think the amendment, if adopted, would accomplish anything at all, I have no objection to its adoption, and the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] has also stated that he is perfectly willing to allow it to be incorporated in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 17, after the word "construction," it is proposed to insert the following: "either by the board or by private companies or corporations owned and controlled by citizens of the United States."

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] is in the chair, and while I shall not venture to speak for him, but on my own account I shall make a brief reply to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

It certainly makes no difference to the Senator from Connecticut, and I know it does not make any difference to me whether the company represented by Mr. Wilder shall build these ships or whether some other company shall do it. The principle is the same. The Brown-Boveri Co., of Chester, Pa., has just completed for the Government the Saratoga, a $35,000,000 plane carrier. The other day we were thrilled by the fact that the Los Angeles, a great airship, settled upon the deck of the Saratoga. That boat is made to receive and send away planes; a hundred of them can be carried by it.

The company that built that great ship has come here with a proposition. We are not interested in this particular company. We are interested in trying to make the Senate see that every such company should be encouraged.

So far as my amendment providing a stabilization of the rates for carrying the ocean mail is concerned, I presented it at the last session of Congress. It has been pending before Congress for three years. So far as concerns the request that Mr. Wilder has made for a modification of the loan act, a similar request has been made by every one interested in building and operating ships.

Last year the Shipping Board appeared before the Committee on Commerce of the Senate on a proposition to sell the United States Lines. Everybody who testified stated that there were certain changes which must be made in our law before private capital could become interested. More liberal loans, cheaper money, and the assurance of long-term mail contracts on the part of the Post Office Department were universally regarded as essential.

I am sure that the Senator from Massachusetts would not desire to have the Senator from Connecticut embarrassed at all, because I know the position of the Senator from Connecticut is exactly the same as my own. We do not care, I do not care, who makes the bids; I do not care who builds the ships. But I want to see the ships built.

If the testimony of the experts in the shipping line may be depended upon, they can not be built unless existing laws are modified. Existing laws are not going to be modified by the passage of the pending bill. Existing laws will be simply repeated and reaffirmed by the passage of the bill. All in the world that this bill, should it become a law, would do would be to defeat the sale of any ship or line of ships and put upon the Shipping Board the impossible task of going on year after year in the operation of these old hulks until finally they will be worn out and sunk to the bottom of the ocean. Then the American merchant marine will be disposed of. If that is the desire of Senators, all they have to do is to pass the pending bill and time will do the rest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] on behalf of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, also on behalf of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], who occupies the chair, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to which I have no objection. It only calls for what we could call for by a Senate resolution.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 22, after the comma, it is proposed to insert the following:

together with such proposals, if any, which have been made to the board by private companies or corporations owned or controlled by citizens of the United States for the replacement of these vessels and their permanent operation under the United States flag in foreign trade.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to be added to section 6. I hope the Senator from Washington will accept it, because, as I have interpreted some of his remarks, he insists that this bill does not commit the Government irrevocably to Government ownership and operation of ships. I ask that the amendment may be read. Frankness, however, compels me to state that he has written a report and made some speeches which prove that he is for Government ownership of the merchant marine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 12, after the word "inconsistency," it is proposed to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed as committing the United States to the policy of permanently owning or permanently owning and operating a merchant marine, but, upon the contrary, it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to promote in all proper ways the establishment and maintenance of a privately owned and operated merchant marine.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I can only repeat that Senators who have affirmed upon the floor that they did not believe in a permanently owned or a permanently owned and operated merchant marine must vote for this amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Would the Senator be willing to limit his amendment to the first clause? The remainder of the amendment calls upon us to determine here and now the policy of the Government. I ask to have the amendment again read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be again stated.

The Chief Clerk again stated the amendment.

Mr. KING. I am willing to strike out the portion of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. President, I am sure that with the elimination of the latter part of the amendment it will commend itself to all Senators who do not believe that the United States should depart from its historic policy, which is also a sound political and economic policy, and engage in an undertaking which is sure to end in disappointment. The National Government was organized not to engage in trade and commerce or to own and operate railroads and ships. The amendment merely declares what has been stated by a number of Senators, that the pending bill does not commit the Government to the policy of permanently owning or permanently owning and operating a merchant marine. Senators who so interpret the bill or who are opposed to the United States owning and operating ships for trade and commercial purposes will vote for the amendment. Those who seek to rivet Government ownership of a merchant marine upon the United States and who favor an unsound and dangerous socialistic scheme will vote against it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Utah to accept the suggestion offered by the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KING. Yes; I accept the suggestion to strike out the latter part of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the objection to the amendment is that it will be used by those who advocate speedily getting out of the shipping business and disposing of the ships as a reason for giving the ships away and sacrificing the property of the Government. It would afford a foundation for that kind of activity if we should adopt the amendment.

One mistake we made in the merchant marine act of 1920 was to say that the primary purpose of the act was to establish and maintain an American merchant marine to serve our commerce in time of peace and as auxiliaries for the Navy in time of need but ultimately to be passed into private hands. In the administration of that law the last provision has been emphasized, and there has been an effort consistently and persistently to dispose of the ships without regard to whether or not such sale meant the establishment and maintenance of an adequate merchant marine. The idea has been to lay stress upon the last provision, namely, that the merchant marine should ultimately be passed into private hands, and the board proceeded to do that, sacrificing the ships, giving them away, scrapping them, and that sort of thing. If we adopt this amendment as a part of the bill, those who have advocated that policy and have insisted on it and have put that construction on the act of 1920 will put a similar construction on this action if Congress shall finally adopt the amendment.

There will be time enough to talk about disposing of the ships and to take care of that suggestion when we shall have established a merchant marine. We can deal with that question hereafter; it is not necessary to emphasize it at the present time.

Mr. KING and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield first to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Florida has advocated the passage of this bill with much vigor and eloquence. Has he not consistently stated in support of its provisions that this bill, as he interpreted it, did not commit the Government to the policy of owning and operating a merchant marine? If that is true, why should he not be willing to accept the amendment and so declare?

Mr. FLETCHER. The bill provides a way for selling the ships. I have insisted on that time and time again. It does not say that the Government is to keep all the ships which it now has and keep all the lines now in operation and refuse to dispose of them on any terms or conditions whatever. It provides, on the contrary, for a way of doing that when we have accomplished the main purpose of establishing and maintaining an American merchant marine.

I insist, however, that as long as we keep saying here that we are going to transfer these ships into private hands, that will be seized upon by the people who have dangling before their eyes confidently the prospect of a subsidy, and private enterprise will hold off.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Florida has expired.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have secured my consent to vote for this bill because, as I understood, it did not commit us permanently to governmental ownership and operation of the merchant marine. I was willing, in view of the fact that we are now the owners of the ships and operate them, to take that view of the matter; but I am not willing to vote down an amendment when the question is squarely raised, and I think it might strengthen the bill in the vicissitudes with which it will come in contact after it passes the Congress.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, in my judgment there is nothing in the bill which justifies any such declaration as is proposed in this amendment. The policy of this country with reference to whether or not we shall have a Government permanently owned merchant marine will rest entirely within the jurisdiction and power of Congress.

I hope that the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I am not one of those who apologize at any time for standing by my Government. I have listened to-day to denunciation and condemnation of almost every Government enterprise. I have heard the Post Office Department condemned for its inefficiency; and yet the Post Office Department is the most efficient business of its magnitude in the world to-day.

There is no set of employees more loyal to their employer than those in the Post Office Department. I do not believe any of those who condemn Government ownership and operation of utilities of any kind want to sell the post office to any private enterprise.

Also the Panama Canal, one of the greatest enterprises in the world, is operated efficiently, perhaps more efficiently than any private enterprise of its magnitude in the world, and operated by the Government.

We ought to be proud of these things. The fact that the Government is inefficient in any degree is due to the corrupt mixing of business in government. If we could get rid of this corrupt business in government there would be no trouble in having the Government efficient all the way through.

What is the object of this amendment? It is to embarrass the Government establishment of this merchant marine. The reason why I am voting for this bill is because in its terms, as it stands now, it does give us something like a reasonable chance to start and to establish this merchant marine. There is no such thing as committing the Government to a permanent policy, anyway. This Congress has no power to pass any law that the next Congress can not repeal. Then what is the use of all of this sort of play? Why not at least give our Government an even and fair chance to go ahead and establish this enterprise upon a businesslike basis? A business man would demand something like stability from the very start. Why embarrass the proposition with these dogmas and declarations, such as the Senator from Utah has proposed in this amendment?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. KING. The Senator believes in the dogma of Government ownership and operation of railroads and of the merchant marine and other activities now controlled by private initiative, does he not? I am sure the Senator will answer that question affirmatively, and therefore I will ask him another question.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have no objection to Government and municipal ownership of the public utilities. They are a public function. It is the duty of the Government to do those things, and in nearly all of them when they are turned over to private enterprise the Government surrenders to that private enterprise certain Government functions, like eminent domain and the taxing power. I have no objection to the Government doing its duty to its people.

I found the State of Louisiana, for instance, owning and operating 11 miles of dock front in the city of New Orleans. I found every dock connected with every railroad station in the city by a belt-line railroad operated and owned by the city of New Orleans; and I did not find a business man in that city who was willing to surrender those utilities, or any of them, to private enterprise. In Chicago, however, I found a different situation. There every one of those fronts had been grabbed by some private enterprise, and the public had no chance and will have none until the Government interferes and gives the public a chance.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, does not the Senator differentiate between the Federal Government, with its limited and enumerated powers, and the power of the States and municipalities to govern their own internal affairs?

Mr. BROOKHART. Not at all, when the proposition is a big national proposition like this one of establishing a merchant marine for the whole people and within the constitutional powers; and I think the time is not far distant when all this talk and accusation against the efficiency of the Government is going to disappear. There is not a business in this country that is pointed out as efficient but that has charged the people of this country enormous and unconscionable profits; and when you take that into consideration and compare it with Government efficiency, you will find that the Government has outstripped this so-called efficiency of private business.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I congratulate the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], because he has pending here a bill that is going to do just what he wants done. This is a bill to put the American merchant marine permanently in the hands of the Government and have it operated permanently by the Government; so the Senator from Iowa is entirely consistent in voting for this bill.

If the bill did not mean exactly what I have intimated in these sentences, there would not be any objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah, because this bill reaffirms the primary object of the law. If the second object, to put the ships into private hands, were also in the heads of those who propose the bill, they would be perfectly willing to have this amendment made; but if the object of the pending measure is to put the Government permanently in the shipping business, in ownership and in operation, this amendment should be voted down. On the other hand, if we intend ultimately to turn over these ships to private operators, then the amendment should be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. EDGE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FERRIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. As he is absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TYSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MOSES (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD]. Learning from the roll call that that Senator has not voted, I transfer the pair to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. FLETCHER (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], and will let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 42, as follows:

So Mr. KING's amendment was rejected.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I am convinced that we are thoroughly whipped, and I congratulate the Senator from Washington, and ask permission to recall the further amendments which I have presented.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendments will be withdrawn.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I wish to address myself very briefly to the merits of this bill.

One would think, from the discussion which has gone on in this Chamber, that we were undertaking a new venture. I want to call attention to the fact that we went into the business of Government ownership and operation of a merchant marine during the war. When we found ourselves in need of ships to transport our troops and take care of our commerce, we found no privately owned ships to commandeer. We were forced into Government building and operating of ships. We took over the railroads, and after the war returned them to their owners. When the war was over we had no one to return ships to, but instead the problem of deciding what to do with the merchant marine which we built during that period and put upon the seas. There were two courses open to us, one to dispose of the ships by selling them to private interests and the other to proceed to operate the ships under Government control.

We have been doing both. We have been selling some of our ships to private interests, and we have discovered the spectacle of these private interests appearing before committees of the House and Senate during these 10 years stating that they will not be able to construct ships to take the place of those that are wearing out in operation, and whether they say it or not, we have before us the spectacle of not one vessel being ordered by these private owners for operation in the foreign trade of the United States. The published records of these hearings indicate forcefully one thing, and that is that a permanent American merchant marine—and, Mr. President, by permanent, I mean replacement, the two terms are synonomous in this connection—is impossible unless Government aid is given to the individual operator, owner or shipyard. Such aid has not been and will not be given by the Congress.

In the absence of such aid, what are we to do?

Because we can not give a subsidy, because we will not give a subsidy, must we see the merchant marine of the United States vanish from the oceans of the world? Because one remedy is impossible, are we forced to the conclusion that no other remedy can be applied?

Mr. President, the period since the war has witnessed in foreign countries the most remarkable development in the shipbuilding art that has taken place in any similar period in the history of the industry; that is, the construction of a huge number of modern motor cargo liners. It has witnessed the construction of a large number of passenger and cargo vessels of the highest type. In other words, during this period, the nations of the world, led by Great Britain and Germany, have practically reconstructed the competitive portion of their merchant marine engaged in liner services throughout the world. We see to-day the picture of not one but many lines of ships operating at speeds of 13 and 14 knots, and within the year modern cargo vessels have been ordered in foreign countries with a speed of 16 knots.

What does this mean? It means that the nations of the world realize that success in the overseas cargo-carrying trade will go to that nation which possesses vessels having high speed, large carrying capacity, and are thus able to render a higher type and better service than their competitors.

What has the United States done during this 10-year period? I advert to an earlier statement that I have made, and repeat it here; there has not been constructed in the United States one cargo liner or passenger and cargo vessel for the foreign trade.

The merchant marine act of 1920 is utterly meaningless if this be its result. What we have witnessed during the last 10 years is the very reverse of a permanent American merchant marine. Our vessels, unsuited in most part for the competitive overseas trade, have been struggling along. We have taken a small step in undertaking to recondition some of them and install Diesel engines, but practically we are outclassed on the trade routes of the world by the ships of our competitors.

Mr. President, the time has come for us to take a definite position. I favor a permanent, not a temporizing marine policy. Permanency, to my mind, Mr. President, implies vessels operating by Americans to-day, next year, 20 years later—vessels being built to-day, next year, 20 years later—so that a continuous process of renewal and rejuvenation will be going on in order that the merchant marine may be self-perpetuating, and thus permanent.

Unless the Shipping Board can insure that when they dispose of vessels other vessels will be built to make good the obsolescence of those sold, there is no authority for them to sell, because permanency is lacking. There is no way in which permanency can be secured without the construction of ships to meet the needs of replacement arising from wastage, obsolescence, and loss.

Mr. President, from the purely commercial standpoint we must have a merchant marine. This is a country of about 120,000,000 people. Its wealth is estimated at four hundred billion; its annual import and export trade is nearly ten billion. In other words, the value of our trade and wealth are so vast that it is inconceivable that we will say that we will entrust the carriage of this vast commerce to the delivery wagons of our competitors.

In addition, we have another very important aspect of this question—that of national defense. Due to our lack of a merchant marine, we paid out $3,000,000,000 for the creation, at war prices, of a merchant marine as submarine bait and paid enormous prices to foreign countries to transport our troops. Not only did we have to spend this huge sum, but under the circumstances in which the vessels were designed and constructed, it was impossible and impracticable to obtain types of ships which would be of real value after the war in the trade routes of the world.

Mr. President, I believe that Congress and the people of the United States have definitely resolved in overwhelming majority that they will insist on having a merchant marine, and that the Stars and Stripes shall not vanish from the oceans of the world.

I do not suggest we should assume an arrogant position in the trade of the world. I am only asking that a fair proportion of the commerce of these United States be carried in American flag ships, but I am prepared to insist to the uttermost that this proportion shall be at least 50 per cent, and I am prepared to do anything that will insure a permanent merchant marine of the "best equipped and most suitable types of vessels."

In conclusion, Mr. President, I desire to record that I am strongly in favor of a permanent American merchant marine, and the inevitable corollary of such a statement—replacement and new construction—and I sincerely believe that this body is carrying out the mandate of the people of the United States, which is, first, a permanent American merchant marine, publicly owned if necessary, but a merchant marine consisting of ships, self-perpetuating through replacements.

A great many Senators, including myself, would prefer private operation, but we do not prefer this theory at the expense of the American merchant marine. If Senators vote against the proposal now before this body, in my judgment, they vote against a permanent American merchant marine, because, so far as we can see at this time, and so far as the records of Congress indicate, the permanent American merchant marine in private hands in the foreign trade is an impossibility.

CHARGES OF RADIO MONOPOLY

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I had not intended to say anything in reference to the pending bill, but simply to content myself with voting against it. But when the Senate places itself upon record refusing, as I see it, to say that this bill is not intended to lead us to a permanent Government-owned merchant marine I can not refrain from saying that I shall vote against it because I do not believe that it is good democracy. If I am not very much mistaken, we had a Senator in my State read out of the Democratic Party, whether right or wrong, for casting a vote in the Senate for just such measure. He went home and retired to private life. I have no objection to being retired to private life, but I do not want to be retired by voting for what my people have repudiated.

I further vote against the bill because I do not believe it is right to say that a unanimous vote should be required to get rid of this trash called ships which I understand the Shipping Board has in control. In that connection I wish to say that on February 18, 1927, I made some remarks in reference to the bill then pending to create a radio commission, which appear on page 4153 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 68, Part IV, and also inserted an article from a paper, which I do not wish now to take the time of the Senate to reread. But I desire to call special attention to my remarks on pages 4154 and 4155 of the RECORD of the same date, and I would like to ask if there is not somewhat of a prophecy contained in my remarks on that occasion.

In connection therewith I ask leave to insert an editorial from the Washington Post of January 7, 1928, and an editorial from yesterday morning's Washington Post.

The following is an extract from a letter from a firm of very prominent business men in the city of Philadelphia, dated January 26, 1928:

> Radio is rapidly drifting toward a gigantic monopoly, and no one favoring such a monopoly should be permitted for a moment to serve on the commission.

I also wish to have inserted an open letter to Congressman WHITE of Maine, which was printed in the Long Beach Sun, dated January 10, 1928, and a letter to myself of the same date from a citizen of Long Beach.

I am not surprised at the turn things have taken. I am possibly the only Senator in this Chamber—or was at that time—who registered a protest against the final passage of the conference report on that iniquitous measure.

I predict that the same result is going to come from this more iniquitous measure that happened in the case of the radio measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina?

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, January 7, 1928]

CHARGES OF RADIO MONOPOLY

Long-smoldering resentment toward the Federal Radio Commission on the part of the independent broadcasters has broken out. Ever since organization of the commission the small broadcasters have feared a monopoly of the air. D. W. May, manager of station WTRL, Midland Park, N. J., yesterday threw down the gauntlet to the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee, meeting to consider the nominations of Sam Pickard, of Kansas; Chester H. Caldwell, of New York, and Harold A. La Fount, of Utah, to be members of the commission, with the accusation that the commission is creating a monopoly through the National Broadcasting Co. chain.

It was anticipated generally that the commission would have a stormy career. When the radio law was enacted last March the ether was crowded to the point of suffocation. As various methods of bringing order out of chaos were experimented with, it became increasingly apparent that the only genuine relief lay in reduction of the number of stations. Finally the commission announced this as its policy, the reduction to be guided by the provision in the law granting preferential treatment to such stations as best served the public good.

The small stations feel that they are being discriminated against—that refusals to renew licenses have been directed against the independents. On the other hand, the commission insists that its only criterion has been the public benefit.

In the meantime, Mauritz A. Hallgren takes up the cause of the independent broadcasters in an article contributed to the current issue of The Nation. He says, in part:

"A review of the licenses granted in the last few months shows that almost without exception applications received from the Radio Corporation of America group have been approved, while those from dissentient concerns have usually been listed for future hearing. Lately the Federal Radio Commission has put into effect a new wave-length reallocation scheme under which as many as 300 of the 685 broadcasting stations in the country may be refused license renewals after the first of the year. Already 25 licenses have been forced off the air. Most radio experts readily agree that this move may eventually clear away much of the interference in and overcrowding of the available broadcasting channels; but it is nevertheless noteworthy that none of the Radio Trust's stations has been among those which have fallen by the wayside."

Under present law the commission's executive powers will cease on March 15. Thereafter it will be merely a court of appeal with which broadcasters dissatisfied with rulings of the Department of Commerce may lodge their complaints. Legislation is to be introduced giving the commission another year of life, in the belief that it is better qualified, as the result of its year's experience, than any other body to deal with the intricate problems of radio control. Should such bills fail of enactment, however, the commission, as an appellate body, will continue to occupy a position of authority. Through it the charges of monopoly can be freely aired and thoroughly investigated.

[From the Washington Post, Monday, January 30, 1928]

WHAT IS THE RADIO TRUST?

Newspaper headlines and congressional hearings are calling attention to the evolution of the "Radio Trust." A group of corporations centered chiefly about the Radio Corporation of America is alleged to be trying to monopolize the air. The Radio Corporation was formed by the pooling of the wireless patents of the General Electric Co., the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co., and the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., as well as a number of smaller companies. This combination has been supplemented by the organization of a broadcasting company which controls the country's most important radio chains. Other companies have been formed by the same interests to control other important radio fields. If these interests are not seeking a monopoly of the most revolutionary art of this modern age, what constitutes monopoly?

It is charged that this Radio Trust is seeking in six ways to monopolize the air:

1. By obtaining for the broadcasting stations on its "chains" the lion's share of the best wave lengths, which have been cleared for them by the Federal Radio Commission.

2. By controlling through the wire system of one of its principal organizers all of the "hook ups" between chain stations, as well as the "hook up" between the transmitters, whether chain stations or independents, and the programs broadcast from outside of their own studios.

3. By a monopoly of the manufacture of all broadcasting machinery, thus requiring broadcasters to get licenses from the "trust" before they can have their stations built or equipped.

4. By a claimed monopoly of patents for radio-receiving apparatus under which they collect dividends or royalties from the manufacture of three-fourths of the receiving sets built in the United States.

5. By an attempt to obtain a control of the important short-wave channels whose development has only begun.

6. By acquiring control of inventions relating to television, telephotography, distance actuation, and other radio discoveries.

In all the investigations of the Radio Trust which have been made by the Congress, the Federal Trade Commission, and the courts the sponsors for combine have contended that it was created at the request of the Government, under the stress of war necessities. If this be true, the Radio Trust would be one of the most dangerous burdens bequeathed by the war.

The country is entitled to know more about it before a monopoly is permitted to intrench itself.

ADVERTISING BY RADIO HIT IN LETTER TO CONGRESSMAN ANENT FEDERAL COMMISSION

C. Wood Arthur, engaged for a number of years in Government research work at Washington and now in southern California in the interest of "community radio stations," yesterday dispatched by air mail to Congressman WALLACE WHITE at Washington a letter commenting upon the latter's bill to extend the life of the Federal Radio Commission to March 15, 1929. Mr. Arthur, who resides at 1065 East Ocean Boulevard, wrote as follows:

"MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: A Los Angeles newspaper of Sunday contains the inclosed statement from you, to the purport that the Radio Commission has failed to accomplish the intention for which it was formed. If you are properly quoted, and I assume that you are, I wish to congratulate you upon your fairness to the public in announcing the truth, knowing that you are partially responsible for the creation of that body.

"The statement of the failure of that body, coming as it does from your pen after the careful attention you must have given the record of the work of that body since its inception, which you so loyally fought to bring into being, is of especial importance to those who are looking for real radio control.

"However, now that you have intimated that the result of the work has fallen short of the orders given the commission by the Congress, why ask to continue the personnel of the commission for a greater time?

"Had the conferee compromise enactment included the suggestion made to both yourself and Senator DILL, that 'direct advertising over the radio be (as was enacted by the Canadian Parliament in its 1926 session) made a misdemeanor,' the overcrowding of the air in congested commercial sections and the supplying of radio communication in the form of entertainment, education, and general information in isolated communities would have been brought about.

"This suggestion, however, was met by yourself and Senator DILL with the objection that 'certain large interests depended upon direct advertising to continue on the air,' when suggested by myself and delegation in the interest of the public.

"May I now ask you, after a year's experiment under the White-Dill conferee compromise, just who those interests referred to were? May I not also assume that the great increase in certain radio stock on the New York Stock Exchange from 51 points to 103 points might not represent the interests of those who would suffer if the advertising clause had been included in the bill?

"If this is true, has the commission not followed out the intent and purpose of the enactment? Or may I suggest that there are certain small community stations which are serving the public without filling the air with advertisements, which are objectionable to the interests of those large interests, whom the White-Dill compromise bill feared to hurt, and that the commission has failed, in that it has not got rid of them during the last year?

"Thinking people, and especially those who watched the nightmare dream of the Senate during the 'filibuster' session between the banking bill and the farm relief bill, know that little, if any, real public relief thinking was done by that body before the law was enacted.

"Now, that you have turned your mind to the real welfare of the radio regulation question, would it not be heroic to give the matter a little deeper thinking as to how the suffering radio-set owners may be relieved from advertising programs that fill the air because the interests must not suffer?

"Is it not time that the community stations of our country, which are working in the interests of home talent and education, be given some real attention and encouragement from governmental radio control?"

1065 OCEAN BOULEVARD,
Long Beach, Calif., January 10, 1928.

Hon. COLE BLEASE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Herewith I am sending you a copy of an open letter addressed to Congressman WALLACE WHITE, partial sponsor of the White-Dill conferee compromise radio law.

The Congressman complains that the commission has made a failure and asks in a bill in the House that its term may be extended.

During the 12 months of operation of that commission the stock of the Radio Corporation of America has increased from 51 points to 103 points, as suggested by me in a letter read in the Senate prior to the passing of the bill. Herein there has been no failure.

The air is still overcrowded with stations, who have kept the air filled with advertisement rather than entertainment and education.

No case has been brought before the Supreme Court to answer the question as to the right of the United States Government under its Constitution to control the air.

But there seems to be a policy of lese majesty in the commission. A small community broadcasting station operator was telling me this morning that he had been giving the community service from his station. That he had never taken a dollar for advertising or other forms of radio communication, and that his station, because of the wide scope of service, needed a better wave length, but he could not get it from the commission. That he did not dare make a complaint lest he offend the commission and lose his license.

This in America, too. It appears as if the Senate of the United States had at last created a monopoly to sustain a monopoly.

It would seem to me as an American citizen, whose father, grandfather, and great grandparent have fought in every war for liberty since the days of tax on tea, that the day might soon come when private or special privileges would be looked down on and that the rights of the little man as well as the corporation be guarded by those who represent us.

Your friend and admirer,

C. WOOD ARTHUR.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I do not want to take up the time of the Senate in debating the radio question, but I want to say to the Senator from South Carolina that the only protection this country has against a radio monopoly, which, in my judgment, in its absence would have been consummated ere this, is the radio law that was passed last February.

Mr. BLEASE. Then, Mr. President, God help the free air that He has given to the American people!

Mr. DILL. At a later date I shall attempt to discuss the editorial which the Senator has asked to have inserted in the RECORD. I want simply at this time, in passing, to say that this editorial points out the efforts being made to form a radio trust, but the power is in the commission, and further power is proposed for the commission, that will make impossible the creation of such a trust.

THE MERCHANT MARINE

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 744) to further develop an American merchant marine, to assure its permanence in the transportation of the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I have already indicated, both by my votes and by what I have said on this floor, my attitude toward this measure. It is very evident to every student of this question that if we are to have a merchant marine we are restricted to one of two measures, either a ship subsidy or the Government establishing a merchant marine—at least demonstrating whether or not we can have one.

If the question were to come on whether we would have a merchant marine maintained by subsidizing private individuals or a merchant marine established by the Government and maintained for all the people, I want to declare here and now that I would vote for the Government project. I am a good enough Democrat to believe that equal rights to all and special privileges to none is the very fundamental of this Government. If we have to take out of the Treasury money to pay to private individuals in case they lose, and allow them to pocket the proceeds in case they make a profit, that is a special privilege that we are not warranted in granting, whereas if the Government runs the business and there is a loss, all the people lose, and if there is a gain it goes into the Treasury, and all the people benefit.

I am voting for Government ownership and operation in the dilemma in which we find ourselves of making a choice between the Government running and controlling the merchant marine because private interests say they can not and will not, or turning it over to private individuals and making good their losses and allowing them to pocket the profits.

Besides that, Mr. President, by the exigencies of war we came into possession of the splendid nucleus of a merchant marine. We taxed the people, we bought and built the ships. Now that we have them it is our duty to experiment with them, not alone in certain favored ports but in all the ports of this country—north, east, south, and west. South of the thirty-seventh parallel of latitude, when the emergency of war was upon us, there was scarcely a port out of which sailed an overseas ship.

This remedy may possibly remedy the horrible congestion which threatened the life of America when the war broke. I happened at that time to be chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee. In one or two ports all the freight of the country, all of the munitions and the elements we had gathered together for the prosecution of the war, were so congested that we could not get our loaded freight cars in nor the empties out, while along 3,000 miles of our coast line adequate ports were idle and left without the splendid contribution that they might have given for the distribution of our war supplies. No, Mr. President, there is not a man on this floor but knows that this is an emergency which we should take hold of just as the bill requires us to take hold of it and relieve proud America of the shame of not having our flag on the seas of the world.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I heartily concur with nearly everything the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] has said. I am going to vote for this bill, because I want to preserve the ships that we have. I want to use those ships for the benefit of American farmers, manufacturers, and other citizens interested in reasonable freight rates. I brought to the attention of the Senate once before the method employed by the Shipping Board to dispose of the ships. I pointed out where they had ships that cost the Government $800,000 which had been sold for $2,100. I pointed out an instance where they sold a ship for $1,600 which cost, I believe, $400,000 or $500,000, and the man who bought it had it insured and lightning struck it, and he collected $35,000 from the insurance company. I want to take our ships out of the hands of such magnificent business men who are selling them to the Shipping Trust for a song.

I heard the able and eloquent Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] suggest that he would be willing to give the ships away. I am not willing to do that. I do not want to put the Government in business, but I refuse to sit silent here and permit the ships of the Government to be given away or bartered for a little or nothing to those interested in the shipping business. This fleet of ships cost the Government $3,000,000,000, and here we have some advocates who would leave many of these ships as they now stand—idle—just being kept up by the Government, until the Government might reach the point where it would be willing to give them away.

No doubt the Shipping Trust would be happy to see that occasion come. I am not in favor of that. I had rather put the Government in the business of operating these particular ships than to submit to such a thing as that. I do not want to put the Government in business; but before I will allow the Shipping Trust to rob the Government of its fleet of merchant ships, I will vote for such a measure as this. Of the two propositions which confront us, as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] said, this is the only wise and proper course to pursue, and I shall vote for the bill for that reason.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there are no further amendments to be proposed to the bill as in Committee of the Whole, it will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. WILLIS. I have asked for a separate vote on the amendment inserting section 2 of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question then is, with the exception of the one amendment mentioned, on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, agreeably to the notice I gave in discussion yesterday, I am going to ask the Senate for another vote on the amendment to the amendment, on page 2, lines 7 and 8, to strike out the words "unanimous vote" and insert in lieu thereof the words "vote of four."

The effect of the amendment, as I have previously stated, and as I think is well understood, would be to provide that by a majority vote of the Shipping Board of seven members ships or other property in the custody of the Shipping Board may be disposed of.

To me it is unthinkable, whatever may be our convictions on the question of private ownership and private operation, temporarily or permanently, that we should establish a bureau of the Government on the basis of requiring a unanimous vote to actually transact any part of its business. It appeals to me that that innovation in itself, apart from all the theory we have discussed and the practical results we have discussed, is a most dangerous departure in the administration of the Government. I do not know of any board of directors in private enterprise, or any bureau or any court or tribunal of any kind except, as suggested by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] in the debate a few days ago, perhaps the League of Nations, where it is required that a unanimous vote shall be recorded in order to transact any part of the business of the tribunal.

I think Senators should give careful thought to the innovation that we are proposing to establish in the Government. Personally, I oppose Government ownership and administration of affairs which private capital can and does usually administer. I think it is a wasteful effort to conduct business by the Government which can be better conducted by private interests.

I recognize also the problem we are facing to-day and that we must face for some time to come—public administration of the merchant marine. On several occasions I have been prepared to vote for liberal appropriations in order to make the necessary replacements to balance the merchant marine, but after that is done it is proposed to lock the door, to nail down the windows, and rivet the nails so that nobody in the future, unless some future Congress should change the policy of the Government, can do anything about it. We are asked to saddle this tremendous debt upon the people of the country, which is in my judgment unthinkable. So I want another vote on the one real issue which is contained in the bill. Stripped of all its whereases, stripped of all its hopes for the future of a merchant marine, it comes down to the one innovation requiring a unanimous vote of a board of the Government to transact business.

All this discussion about the sale of ships, Mr. President, contemplates that they are taking the ships away from the sea. When we sell a ship, we simply transfer its ownership from the Government, losing money, to some private operator who, I hope, can make money. The merchant marine is administered just the same. Ships are on the sea just the same. If we sold every one of the ships or if, as the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] said, we gave them away, it would be the best proposition the country could engage in. So before we enter for all time upon the policy of Government ownership, Government administration, unequitable, unscientific deficits, which have been $40,000,000 to $50,000,000 and which will in the future come up to $60,000,000 or $70,000,000 or perhaps $100,000,000, before we spend the taxpayers' money in that unequitable way, let us give a little more thought to the scientific side of the situation, as suggested by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], rather than to an unscientific deficit.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I desire to make just one brief observation on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE]. Senators will recall that the subject was rather fully discussed the other day; that I offered an amendment to his amendment, then pending; and that my amendment to his amendment was adopted. That led to some confusion in the minds of Senators, I think. Therefore I shall not offer my amendment to the amendment now pending, but if the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey providing for a vote of four members of the board shall not be adopted—and I hope it will not be—I shall then offer an amendment to substitute "five" instead of his proposed "four." My belief is that in a matter of such great importance as the sale of these ships we ought to have a two-thirds vote of the board. If the pending amendment fails, I shall then offer an amendment to provide for a majority vote of not less than five.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I desire simply to say that if we are going to continue Government operation of our merchant marine, it seems to me most important that we should not be looking back over our shoulder, so to speak, at private ownership. The only effect of doing that is to eufeeble Government management.

Of course, the overwhelming majority in the Senate in favor of the bill indicates that there has been the most thorough consideration by the Senate of all the alternatives which are suggested by the bill. The Senate has come to the conclusion that there is really no other alternative except private operation, maintained by a subsidy, and the history of Congress for many years past evidences inflexible opposition on its part to ship subsidies. Effort after effort has already been made to sell our ships. That fact seems to be more or less lost sight of in this discussion. Wherever sales have been made they have been made at an enormous loss to the Government; and there is every reason to believe that a large percentage of all the ships which have been sold by us will pass under the British or other foreign flags. So really there is nothing left for us to sanction except Government operation. Therefore I do approve most strongly of the idea that if there is to be any sale of these ships it should be pursuant only to unanimous action on the part of the board. Otherwise we will have uncertainty, irresolution, nay, even paralysis, creeping into the operations of the Shipping Board under the bill. Hence I feel bound to register my opposition to the amendments of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, the bill as it stands provides that not one ship now owned by the Government may be or shall be sold without the unanimous affirmative vote of the members of the Shipping Board. As the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] pointed out, there is not existent to-day on this rolling earth any tribunal, any legislative body, with the possible exception of the alleged League of Nations body, which has any such a restrictive provision governing its conduct of business. We might just as well propose that no bill, however meritorious, should pass the Senate except by the unanimous vote of the Senate as to suggest that no business in the way of selling even one poor sinking, rotting ship shall be transacted except by the unanimous vote of that board.

It may be idle to appeal to the experience of men, to the knowledge of Senators; but I do make a final appeal to intelligence and not to prejudice, to business capacity and not to partisanship, that we ought not to hamper, to hamstring, to control a board, by ourselves set up, so that it would be absolutely paralyzed and impotent to do a manifestly proper and wise thing.

Upon what theory which appeals to the intelligence of men is it that we are to say to our own appointees in whom we lodge discretionary power that they shall not do what every one of us would consider wise to do unless they shall be unanimous in favor of that action? We should repose at least a modicum of confidence in the membership of a board set up by the Congress; I submit that this proposition to prevent the sale of any ship, good, bad, or indifferent, without the unanimous vote of that board ought not to meet the approval of a majority of 96 Senators of a Nation such as ours.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, if we do not retain in the pending bill the provision requiring the unanimous vote of the members of the board on any proposal involving the sale of ships, the measure, in my opinion, will become absolutely futile, and will not accomplish the objects and the purposes desired by those who favor its passage.

In 1920, when we were considering what is now known as the merchant marine act, I pointed out that under its provisions while there were some who claimed that the primary purpose was that of the maintenance of an American merchant marine, under the policy outlined under the provisions of that measure the Shipping Board would not only be justified in proceeding but it would naturally feel that it was its duty to proceed to dispose of the ships as rapidly as it could, of course, considering the policy of the establishment of an American merchant marine.

The provisions of the bill which we are considering in no wise change or alter the law of 1920, except in the particular that it provides that ships may not be sold without the vote of the entire membership of the board. If we eliminate that requirement for a unanimous decision on the part of the board, what do we have confronting us? We have the old law confronting us. Section 5 of that law provides:

SEC. 5. That in order to accomplish the declared purposes of this act, and to carry out the policy declared in section 1 hereof, the board is authorized and directed to sell, as soon as practicable, consistent with good business methods and the objects and purposes to be attained by this act, at public or private competitive sale after appraisement and due advertisement, to persons who are citizens of the United States, except as provided in section 6 of this act, all of the vessels referred to in section 4 of this act or otherwise acquired by the board. Such sale shall be made at such prices and on such terms and conditions as the board may prescribe, but the completion of the payment of the purchase price and interest shall not be deferred more than 15 years after the making of the contract of sale. The board in fixing or accepting the sale price of such vessels shall take into consideration the prevailing domestic and foreign market price of, the available supply of, and the demand for vessels, existing freight rates and prospects of their maintenance, the cost of constructing vessels of similar types under prevailing conditions, as well as the cost of the construction or purchase price of the vessels to be sold, and any other facts or conditions that would influence a prudent, solvent business man in the sale of similar vessels or property which he is not forced to sell. All sales made under the authority of this act shall be subject to the limitations and restrictions of section 9 of the "shipping act, 1916," as amended.

So if we give no protection to the policy which many of us seem to favor by requiring a unanimous vote, then, acting under the old law, the board will naturally feel that it has authority to go ahead and proceed to sell the ships.

I voted against the act of 1920 for that very reason, and I then stated in a speech which I made at the time that under the provisions of the law which we were then proceeding to pass, although we declared that the prime purpose was that of establishing an American merchant marine, under the machinery and the procedure which we set up in the proposed act for the establishment of a merchant marine, it was apparent that it was the intention and policy of the Congress that it should be established through private ownership, and, therefore, that the ships should be transferred as rapidly as possible to private hands. The provisions of that law still remain. The only way we can check them in the provisions of the pending bill is to require a unanimous affirmative vote before the vessels may be disposed of.

So I hope that that provision will remain in the pending bill. If it does not remain in the bill, all the discussion and consideration of it will have been absolutely futile; and those of us who believe that our American merchant marine must be maintained, and, if necessary, through the Shipping Board and through the Government, will have been entirely defeated in our object and our purpose that that shall be the policy of the Government. I hope that the provision for unanimity of decision will be retained and that we shall not change that feature of the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the vote which has been taken to-day, evidencing the great strides which socialism has made in the United States, will afford the utmost gratification to the communists of Russia. When in Russia a few years ago several prominent representatives of the bolshevik government stated that the United States was the leading capitalistic Nation in the world, but that the Government would soon take over the railroads and the ships, and, finally, all "key industries," and then it would be ripe for the realization of communistic idealogy and the communistic régime which they were attempting to establish throughout the world.

The only country in the world, as I now recall, that owns and operates its merchant marine is Russia, which is governed by a limited number of communists. We are taking bolshevik Russia as an example, and we may be surprised if its government does not wire congratulations to the distinguished chairman of the committee for his efforts to embark the United States upon a bolshevik policy.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me?

Mr. KING. I have only a few moments.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to call the Senator's attention to Canada and also to Australia.

Mr. KING. They are only dominions within the British Empire, and their activities in constructing and operating vessels in foreign trade are not important.

The Democratic Party was organized to preserve individual rights, to preserve the States from the usurpations of the Federal Government, to develop and maintain the spirit of local self-government. The philosophy of Jefferson opposed centralization of power; it regarded the individual as competent to deal with his own affairs. It opposed socialism and paternalism. It denied the General Government the authority or power to engage in business pursuits and enterprises unless they were inseparably connected with the proper functions of the Government itself.

I can not bring my judgment to support this bill—with due respect to those of different opinions. I am unable to comprehend how they justify this bill or find support for it upon the foundation which supports the principles and policies of Jefferson.

If two years ago it had been proposed by the Republicans that the Government of the United States should permanently own and operate the merchant marine of the United States, every Democrat, I believe, would have voted against the proposition. Yet to-day we find Republicans and Democrats joining and vieing with each other in supporting a measure which, I believe, is fundamentally obnoxious to Democratic principles.

Where will the end be? If the United States may own and operate ships it may own and operate railroads and the key industries and substantially all business enterprises of our country. Such a policy would destroy individual initiative, deter men from investing their capital in enterprises that will come into competition with those conducted by the Government, and lead to the paralysis of our industrial and economic life.

This bill will pass, but, as I said a few minutes ago, there is a man in the White House who, I think, has the courage and the conception of public duty that will lead him to promptly express his dissent.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah seems to think that those of us who support the pending measure will be congratulated shortly after its passage by the bolsheviks of Russia.

Mr. KING. No; I said the Senator from Washington would be congratulated.

Mr. HEFLIN. He would be congratulated on his success in getting the measure through.

I wonder what the patriotic people of America would think of us if we permitted American ships to be bartered away, as in the past they have been bartered away, for $1,600, $1,800, and $2,000 apiece, when their construction cost hundreds of thousands of dollars. I think it is not asking too much to require that the entire board shall be unanimous in deciding whether or not a ship shall be sold. I shall vote in favor of allowing the situation to remain as it is, with the additional safeguard of requiring the entire board to agree before a single one of these ships shall go out of the hands of the Government for such small prices as have been received in the past. I think it is ridiculous that any ships have been sold for such prices, and I want to stop such sales as soon as possible. I repeat, if it takes Government management to operate these ships, I am in favor of putting the Government into this business, rather than to give the ships away and lose three thousand million dollars.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE].

Mr. EDGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I inquire what is the amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, which the clerk will again state.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from New Jersey reoffers the following amendment:

On page 2, lines 7 and 8, strike out the words "unanimous vote" and insert the words "vote of four."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FERRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. I do not know how he would vote on this question, and therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], I withhold my vote.

Mr. TYSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. Not knowing how he would vote on this matter, I withhold my vote.

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 31, nays 52, as follows:

YEAS—31

So Mr. EDGE's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 7, it is proposed to strike out the words "unanimous vote" and insert the words "vote of five."

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, this is the amendment which was adopted by the Senate recently by a very considerable majority when this matter was under consideration. I am now offering it again, confident that Senators will vote for five instead of a unanimous vote, just as they did previously.

On this amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FERRIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

So Mr. WILLIS's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, at the end of line 8, page 2, I move to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the foregoing provisions requiring unanimity of action by the board in the sale of ships shall not apply to sales of cargo ships heretofore built.

This amendment has been suggested to me by a number of Senators, particularly by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER]. It is drawn to meet the objection, and a very proper objection, that has been made here upon the floor; namely, that by this provision as it now stands it would not be possible for the board to sell even any old ships.

We seek now to remedy that difficulty by providing that while unanimity of action shall be required for the sale of any new ships or any liners, it is not required for the sale of these old cargo ships that are practically out of use anyhow. The amendment gives the board a little more leeway in that direction. I believe it is a wise suggestion.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I make the point of order against this amendment that it was not proposed as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I want to be heard on the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is in order.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Ohio if this amendment would affect the three lines of ships on the Pacific coast which are now proposed to be sold by the Shipping Board?

Mr. WILLIS. I am not familiar with the facts as to those three lines. The amendment provides that the bill shall not apply to cargo vessels heretofore built. The Senator can apply it to the facts of the case he has in mind. I am not acquainted with the facts in that case and can not say whether those are cargo ships or liners.

Mr. ODDIE. They are cargo ships, but carry passengers. It seems to me that there is an inconsistency in this. The description is not clear enough. If it refers to those three lines of ships I shall certainly oppose the amendment, because those are the lines of ships that should not be sold under the present circumstances.

Mr. WILLIS. Answering the Senator's question, I think those ships would hardly be described as cargo ships. In the language of the sea, they would be called liners, instead of cargo ships. At all events, what we are seeking to reach here is a situation where the board will have the right to sell these old ships that are fast becoming obsolete.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, the three lines of ships to which I refer are not obsolete. They are at present under operation from various ports on the Pacific coast.

I move to strike out of the amendment the words "cargo ships" and to insert the words "freighters only."

Mr. WILLIS. I accept that amendment.

Mr. ODDIE. And the words "and not now in the service of the Shipping Board from Pacific coast ports."

Mr. MCKELLAR. May the amendment be read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment as it would read if amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. As originally proposed by the Senator from Ohio the amendment was, on page 2, line 8, to insert the following:

Provided, That the foregoing provisions requiring unanimity of action by the board in the sale of ships shall not apply to the sale of cargo ships heretofore built.

The Senator from Nevada proposes to strike out the words "cargo ships" and to insert the words "freighters only, and not now in the service of the Shipping Board from Pacific coast ports."

Mr. FLETCHER. I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. ODDIE. I withdraw that amendment and move to amend by adding the words "not now in the actual service of the Shipping Board," leaving off the words "from Pacific coast ports."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio accept the amendment?

Mr. WILLIS. I accept the proposed amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the amendment as modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the foregoing provisions requiring unanimity of action by the board in the sale of ships shall not apply to sales of freighters only not now in the actual service of the Shipping Board.

Mr. SACKETT. I offer as an amendment to strike out the word "not," because the Senator means just the opposite of the amendment as now read.

Mr. ODDIE. I accept the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio accept the modification?

Mr. WILLIS. I accept the modification.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the amendment as modified for the third time.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the foregoing provisions requiring unanimity of action by the board in the sale of ships shall not apply to sales of freighters only now in the service of the Shipping Board.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio why, if this provision for unanimity is a good one with reference to other vessels, it should be a bad one with respect to freighters. I do not see any logic in the notion that there is any real substantial distinction to be made between different classes of ships as respects this provision of unanimity. Is it not fair to infer that if a ship is not serviceable, unanimity of action by the Shipping Board in all probability would be readily obtainable whatever the class to which the ship belonged? I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. SACKETT. I offer as an amendment that the word "only" be stricken out.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will be defeated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified to the amendment.

The amendment as modified to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, inserting section 2.

The amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. COPELAND. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FERRIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], who is absent, so I withhold my vote. If the Senator from Ohio were present, he would vote "nay," and if I were permitted to vote I would vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). Again I have to announce that I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who is absent, so I withhold my vote. If the Senator from Wyoming were present, he would vote "nay," and if I were permitted to vote I would vote "yea."

Mr. TYSON (when his name was called). On this matter I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], who is absent, and I withhold my vote. If the Senator from West Virginia were present, he would vote "nay." If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FLETCHER (after having voted in the affirmative). I announce my general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS], and allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 53, nays 31, as follows:

INVESTIGATION OF CONDITIONS IN COAL FIELDS

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I had announced that I would to-day address myself to the resolution providing for an investigation of the coal fields of Pennsylvania and contiguous territory. The hour is so late, the Senate is so weary, we have done such a good job to-day, that I desire to announce that to-morrow, at the first opportunity accorded me, I shall take up the subject matter and address myself to it.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Concurrent Resolution 3, memorializing Congress to take over and assume flood control on the Mississippi River

Whereas flood control of the Mississippi River is obviously a matter of national interest and concern and falls within the legitimate scope of direct Federal action, the jurisdiction of the United States over the Mississippi River being paramount to that of the several States bordering thereon; and

Whereas the States bordering on the Mississippi River are wholly unable to cope with the flood situation and to prevent loss of human life and calamitous destruction of property caused by the overflowing of the river within their respective territories; and

Whereas in order to prevent further injury from floods emanating from the Mississippi River a governmental course or policy toward said situation should be adopted and immediate governmental action undertaken to restrain and control said floods: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Mississippi (the Senate concurring), That the United States Government be, and it is hereby, urged to take over and assume at the earliest practicable moment the function of flood control on the Mississippi River as a matter of entire and exclusive Federal action; and that the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, memorialized to at once enact such statutes as may be necessary, proper, or incidental to said course and to effectuate the said policy of exclusive Federal flood control in areas affected by the overflow of the Mississippi River; be it further

Resolved, That officially certified copies of this resolution be mailed and presented to the President and Vice President of the United States and to the Members of the Congress.

Adopted by the house of representatives, January 5, 1928.

Adopted by the Senate, January 9, 1928.

I, Walker Wood, secretary of state of the State of Mississippi, do hereby certify that the above and foregoing instrument entitled "Concurrent Resolution 3" is a true and correct copy of Concurrent Resolution 3 of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi at the 1928 session thereof, as same appears on the enrolled act of said concurrent resolution now on file and a matter of record in the office of the secretary of state.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of Mississippi hereunto affixed this 20th day of January, 1928.

[SEAL.] WALKER WOOD, Secretary of State.

Mr. HARRISON presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 1, urging Congress of the United States to enact adequate flood-control legislation for the lower Mississippi Valley

Whereas the lower Mississippi Valley States were visited in the spring of 1927 by the most disastrous flood in the history of these States, and

Whereas the loss of life was heavy, the loss of property almost incalculable, and the sufferings and privations of the people of the flooded areas well-nigh indescribable, and

Whereas these flood waters came as a result of drainage of 31 States of the Union into this area, and

Whereas the people of the lower Mississippi Valley are now subjected to almost unbearable burdens of taxation in an effort to protect themselves and their property from the destructive effects of overflows of the Mississippi River: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Mississippi (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That flood control in the lower Mississippi Valley is a national and not a local problem, that it is a protective and not a reclamation measure, and that the Federal Government should assume full control and bear all the cost of measures adequate for complete and permanent control of the waters of the lower Mississippi River, and the Congress of the United States is hereby petitioned to enact legislation to accomplish this purpose; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the senate and the clerk of the house of representatives be requested to transmit copies of this resolution to the Members of the Mississippi delegation in the Congress, and to the chairmen of the Flood Control Committees of the National Senate and House of Representatives.

Adopted by the senate January 4, 1928.

BEDWELL ADAM,
President of the Senate.

Adopted by the house of representatives January 10, 1928.

THOS. L. BAILEY,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

I, Walker Wood, secretary of state of the State of Mississippi, do hereby certify that the above and foregoing is a true and correct copy of Senate Concurrent Resolution 1 of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi at the 1928 session thereof, the enrolled act of which said resolution is on file in this office.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of Mississippi this the 28th day of January, 1928.

FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS WITH FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS

Mr. SHIPSTEAD submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 8), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to direct the Departments of State, Treasury, and Commerce, the Federal Reserve Board, and all other agencies of the Government which are or may be concerned thereunder, to refrain henceforth, without specific prior authorization of the Congress from—

(1) Directly or indirectly engaging the responsibility of the Government of the United States, or otherwise on its behalf, to supervise the fulfillment or financial arrangements between citizens of the United States and sovereign foreign governments or political subdivisions thereof, whether or not recognized de jure or de facto by the United States Government; or

(2) In any manner whatsoever giving official recognition to any arrangement which may commit the Government of the United States to any form of military intervention in order to compel the observance of alleged obligations of sovereign or subordinate authority, or of any corporations or individuals, or to deal with any such arrangement except to secure the settlement of claims of the United States or of United States citizens through the ordinary channels of law provided therefor in the respective foreign jurisdictions, or through duly authorized and accepted arbitration agencies.

NAVAL MINE DEPOT, YORKTOWN, VA.

Mr. GLASS submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 9), which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

[S. Con. Res. 9, 70th Cong., 1st sess.]

Whereas in the first deficiency act, fiscal year 1928, approved December 22, 1927, the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, through a joint board composed of officers appointed by them, were directed to make a survey of the points of storage of supplies of ammunition and components thereof for use of the Army and Navy with special reference to the location of such ammunition and components as are in such proximity to populous community and industrial areas as to constitute a menace to life and property; and

Whereas such act further directs that the results of the survey shall be embodied in a joint report which the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall make to Congress not later than March 15, 1928; with their recommendation as to what changes, if any, should be made in such storage facilities and their points of location and the feasibility of the joint use thereof by the Army and Navy; and

Whereas provision was made in such act for the survey and report in lieu of proposed amendments carrying appropriations for removal of explosives from Curtis Bay, Md., and other points; and

Whereas by the first deficiency act, fiscal year 1927, approved February 28, 1927, the sum of $580,000 was appropriated for additional storage and incidental improvements at the naval mine depot, Yorktown, Va., to take care of large quantities of high explosives removed and to be removed to that point for storage; and

Whereas protests have been made by owners of lands contiguous to the naval mine depot, Yorktown, Va., as well as by residents of the city of Williamsburg, Va., against the storage of large quantities of high explosives at such depot, and petitions filed with the Congress praying for relief; and

Whereas it is now urged that the above-mentioned survey and report may result in a proposal for a plan of storage that will render unnecessary the storage of explosives at the naval mine depot, Yorktown, Va.: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That (1) it is the sense of the Congress that no further expenditures be made from the appropriation of $580,000 for additional storage and incidental expenses at the naval mine depot, Yorktown, Va., until the submission to and consideration by the Congress of the results of the survey provided for by the first deficiency act, fiscal year 1928; and (2) the Secretary of the Navy is requested to cause the suspension of work under any contracts that may have been made pursuant to such appropriation, if permissible under the terms of any such contract, until the submission of such report and the consideration thereof by the Congress.

PRESIDENTIAL TERMS

Mr. LA FOLLETTE I submit a Senate resolution, which I ask may lie over under the rule.

The resolution (S. Res. 128) was read, and ordered to lie over under the rule, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the precedent established by Washington and other Presidents of the United States in retiring from the presidential office after their second term, has become, by universal concurrence, a part of our republican system of government, and that any departure from this time-honored custom would be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions; and be it further

Resolved, That the Senate commends observance of this precedent by the President.

EXPENDITURES IN SENATORIAL ELECTIONS

Mr. NEELY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 129), which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections:

[S. Res. 129, 70th Cong., 1st sess.]

Whereas enormous sums of money have been expended in behalf of certain candidates for election to the Senate in primary elections recently held in various States: Therefore be it

Resolved, (1) That the expenditure of excessive sums of money in any primary election or nominating convention in behalf of a candidate for election to the Senate, either with or without his knowledge or consent, being harmful to the independence, the honor, and the dignity of the Senate, is hereby severely disapproved and condemned.

(2) That any United States Senator elect shall be deemed not to be entitled to hold a seat in the Senate if there shall hereafter have been expended by such Senator elect, or by any person or persons for him with his knowledge or consent, in aid or support of his candidacy in either the primary election or nominating convention by which such Senator elect was nominated as a candidate for the Senate, an amount in excess of (a) the amount permitted to be expended by the law of the State in which such Senator elect was nominated for the Senate, if such State law provides for a maximum expenditure which is less than that hereinafter provided; (b) the sum of $10,000; or (c) an amount equal to that obtained by multiplying 3 cents by the total number of votes cast in the State of the residence of such Senator elect at the last general election for all the candidates for the office of United States Senator, but in no event exceeding the sum of $25,000; except that money expended by a candidate to satisfy any assessment, fee, or charge made or levied upon candidates by the laws of the State in which such Senator elect resides, or expended for his necessary personal, traveling, or subsistence expenses, or for stationery, postage, writing, or printing (other than for use on billboards or in newspapers), for distributing letters, circulars, or posters, or for telegraph or telephone service, shall not be included in determining whether his expenditures have exceeded the sum fixed by this resolution as the limit of campaign expenses of a candidate.

THE MAN FROM MONTANA

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I present an article from the North American Review for February, 1928, entitled "The man from Montana," by Charles Michelson, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senator THOMAS JAMES WALSH has been called the "alibi candidate" for the Democratic presidential nomination. Because of him the South and West are able to deny that it is religious intolerance that makes them fight against Governor Smith and to place their hostility on the ground of Smith's wetness and Tammanyism. He is as good a Catholic as the man who made the brown derby famous, but there never was a time when Dixieland and the Corn Belt have not indicated more or less willingness to accept him as a welcome alternative. Even the Klan shakes no nightshirts at WALSH, perhaps because he has not yet approached near enough a nomination to be deemed dangerous. It may be that this immunity will not continue if, out of another Democratic deadlock, there issues the really impressive figure of the Montana Senator, somewhere near the head of the list, but until that time comes there is no voice raised against WALSH in all the army that regards the defeat of Smith as the first duty of every hundred percenter.

All the important individuals among the preconvention aspirants this year grade up pretty well in ability, experience, culture, and reputation, which are the usual concomitants of eligibility. Availability is another thing, and from western viewpoints, at least, WALSH has all the high marks. He is always spoken of, politically, in comparison with Smith. His supporters are prone to use the latter as a measuring stick in surveying their candidate. For example:

"Smith is a great governor—well, WALSH is a great Senator, and that for as many terms, and those terms three times as long as the New York executive's.

"Smith was a poor boy who raised himself by sheer ability to eminence. WALSH was just as poor, and taught himself and then taught school while he was learning law, and so progressed until he became the leading constitutional lawyer in Congress. He has traveled widely; his membership in all the big Senate committees has given him the broadest insight into the affairs of government, domestic and foreign.

"Smith can carry New York. WALSH can carry the West, which is bigger than New York.

"Smith has established a standard of honesty in State government; WALSH has chased two Cabinet officers out of the National Government and has made graft as unfashionable as a kleagle in a synagogue.

"Smith represents the national revolt against the Volstead act; WALSH represents the spirit of law observance. If prohibition is not a party issue, why should New York not vote for him as a candidate? If it is such an issue, it should not be lost sight of that there are 10 dry States for every wet 1."

It is not difficult to make out a plausible case for the Walsh candidacy. Except geographically, he measures up to all the standards of the Presidency. One of the appealing things about him is that he drinks as he votes; that is, he is personally as well as politically dry. It is doubtful if that can be said of half a dozen in the whole Senate. It can not be easy for him, for he is a sociable soul; something of an afternoon tea hound. To his further credit be it recorded that he confines his championing of the prohibition cause to business hours. Take him where the cocktails are waving and the balls are high, as his gregarious instinct frequently does, and he enjoys them—vicariously, of course—and does not talk about it afterwards. Recently his State went wet on a referendum, but he did not change with it. He prefers to regard the incident as a Commonwealth aberration from which Montana will recover, and meanwhile he continues to take the dry side of Senate debates and confines himself to ginger ale on the nineteenth hole when he plays golf—which he does painstakingly, if indifferently.

It is the plaint of the Smith people that the Democratic South refuses to consent to the nomination of their man, while it will vote for him if the nomination is forced on them. The Walsh people have as good an argument. If New York and New England would help nominate the Montanian, and would vote for him in the election, WALSH would be elected. Their calculations run this way: WALSH would sweep the West, and would carry the South, and with him as the candidate—with the possible exception of Maryland, wedded to its wet idols—there would be no defection in the border States. Hence they are able to claim that it is the selfishness of New York and its environing communities that keeps WALSH out of the White House.

There are three important counts in the political indictment of Smith: He is wet, he is a Roman Catholic, and he represents Tammany Hall. Only one of these handicaps, again speaking from a western and southern viewpoint, runs against WALSH. Moreover, the argument is that if Catholic New York and Massachusetts Democracy got behind Walsh, it would eliminate the religious issue forever.

There are a lot of people who insist on solemnity in the President. Well, there never was a more solemn man than WALSH. You could no more develop a scandal about him than about the Lincoln Memorial, social, or political, or fiscal. There would be no "revelry" in the White House with him on the job. His respectability is monumental. If he shaved off his mustache he would need only a stock to look like one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, with his dominating nose, his cold gray eyes, and his beetling black brows. Time was and not so long ago that he adhered to the Western official fashion of wearing his mustache a la walrus. He cropped it about the time he became a national figure, thereby lopping off 15 years from his age appearance, as well as two inches of drooping hair. He is 68, according to the records, which means little; he was as old at 30 and will be just as young at 90.

Charles Evans Hughes became governor and had a shot at the Presidency—which would have been a bull's-eye if he had adjusted his political wind gauge and foresight—by reason of his turning the light on a lot of insurance rascality. If WALSH had come from some more important State than Montana, he would have profited as much. His Teapot Dome and Elk Hills performance is really a classic in muckraking. He went into the oil investigation on a shoestring. All he had to start with was a couple of leases to Sinclair and Doheny, and some sudden prosperity of Albert B. Fall. The elder La Follette had buzzed around these circumstances and reached nowhere. The committee that inherited the investigation generally felt that, after all, the validity of the leases hinged on whether it was a good or a bad deal for the Government, and there was as much authority for the position that it was necessary to operate the reserved fields to prevent their being drained by nearby wells, as for the other theory. That committee had not been going two days before it changed its identity and ever after was the "WALSH committee." He was not its chairman; Lenroot, who had the title, was lost in the shuffle and WALSH simply took possession of the show. When Edward B. McLean came out with his declaration that he had loaned Fall $100,000, taking his notes and a mortgage on the Fall ranches as security, all of the members, except WALSH, thought the bottom had fallen out of the scandal. It was so perfectly credible; just such a thing as McLean might have done, in view of his membership in the Harding circle of which Fall was so conspicuous an ornament. They advised WALSH to close the investigation and leave the matter of the validity of the leases to the courts. Not he; his nose was on the trail and he intended to follow it, so he hiked off to Florida, put McLean under oath, and the excuse for Fall's sudden prosperity was blown sky high with McLean's admission that the checks he handed Fall were returned uncashed, and that his previous story was merely his "going down the line for a friend."

There followed as a natural sequence the coming to the witness stand of Doheny, with his little black satchel, and the tale of an old prospector's affection for his one-time trail mate. It was an appealing picture with its mellowed reflection of the dim frontier; the soft side of a hard-boiled oil multimillionaire of youthful companionship in poverty and hardship merging into the friendship of men in the decline of life. It sounded as plausible as the McLean story—to everybody but WALSH. To him it was only scenery along the route he had marked out, and he herded the two of them into the criminal courts.

The implacability of WALSH stands him in relief among his fellows. Senators, as a rule, are amiable chaps, full bodied, easy going, sparing of effort, tender of amenities, tolerant of their adversaries. Through this comfortable aggregation WALSH stalks, grandly serious; always in earnest. There is something suggestive of those old familiars of the Inquisition about him; a consciousness of rectitude, unblemished by any concern with the feelings of those on the rack. He and Fall had been colleagues for many years and there was between them the community of thought so marked among the Westerners. They were not intimates—WALSH has no intimates. It is doubtful if he ever called a brother Senator by his first name, but he was on as good terms with Fall as with anybody; yet when he became satisfied of Fall's turpitude he went after him with cold ferocity. Newberry was a pleasant Senator; even his political foes felt sorry for him, and were disposed to find excuses for his splurging in his campaign, but WALSH saw only the wickedness and not only never let up himself but saw to it that the others stood to the task of getting Newberry out of the Senate. Denby was another of the victims to WALSH's icy logic and thin-lipped fanaticism for righteousness.

Denby would be Secretary of the Navy yet if it had not been for WALSH's speech demanding his resignation, with its overwhelming concentration of fact. Yet during that lethal address WALSH never once raised his voice. It is rare that he does. He stood at his own desk, dryly, concisely, and pitilessly dissecting the Secretary of the Navy, much as he had taken Newberry to pieces and exhibited the fragments, and when he had finished one more distinguished scalp swung at his belt.

When he once starts on his machine gunning it is a pretty good idea for other people to keep out of the brush, for WALSH is likely to shoot at any suspicious movement. The incident concerning Senator SMOOT, of Utah, was typical. Doheny was on the witness stand before the committee, WALSH was harrying him, and SMOOT sat immediately at WALSH's right.

"What," demanded the inquisitor suddenly, "was in the note Senator SMOOT handed you when you entered the Chamber to-day?"

His fellow committeeman, his associate for a generation, his frequent co-worker by virtue of being from an adjacent State, with identical local interests, was appalled at this straining of senatorial courtesy, and had to explain that he had merely asked the great oil magnate the result of an expert examination on some oil land which Doheny had undertaken for a friend of SMOOT's.

There are two reasons why WALSH does not rant. In the first place, his voice is such that when he lifts it there sometimes comes forth a falsetto squeak instead of a robust roar; in the second place, his sense of order is too intense to permit any display of passion. Hence he speaks as he dresses—so immaculately that it would be an equal relief to hear him split an infinitive or see him with his necktie awry. He is just as exasperatingly sure of his facts as he is of his words, wherefore the Senators have largely given over debating with him. What is the use in arguing with a man who reads incessantly law, history, economics, and remembers every printed page as well as everything he ever heard? It is doubtful if any other legislator could have had that law passed that assesses a fine of $100,000 on a witness who refuses to come to court from over the sea, but WALSH wanted the witnesses against Sinclair, and he poured forth a river of precedents, authorities, and processes, and the Senate as usual took his word for it that the enactment was constitutional.

Being a great constitutionalist is not all near-beer and skittles. A Democrat who could have gone along with the farmers on the McNary-Haugen bill would have had a tremendous pull in the Middle West, particularly as things seemed to point to the nomination by the Republicans of a candidate who will not subscribe to that chapter in the grangers' bible. Moreover, WALSH's own State is farm-minded. It would be as radical as Wisconsin if WALSH permitted. But the equalization-fee feature of the bill involved a delegation of the taxing power of Congress—treason, barratry, piracy, sacrilege! Some scores of his colleagues voted for it blithely on the theory that the Supreme Court would kill it if the President did not, and that meanwhile election would have come and gone. Those farmer votes, perhaps, meant more to WALSH than to any man in the Senate; there was also the Democratic urge to make things unhappy for Coolidge. It made no difference. There was that nice point of constitutionality; he could see nothing else; and he voted "No."

The hero of this recital stands accused of self-esteem and selfishness. Knowing as much as he knows, and how little the other fellow knows, could hardly be productive of any other appraisement of his own capabilities. The incident oftenest cited to sustain the charge is his refusal to take the vice presidential nomination on the ticket with John W. Davis in 1924. Another man might have been carried away by the excitement of the wind-up of the Madison Square Garden convention, but not its chairman. He had no delusions about Davis's chances; he had no desire to sacrifice himself on the altar of party distress. He had been mentioned all through the convention as a possible compromise between McAdoo and Smith, but nothing came of that, and he concluded that he would rather be an elected Senator than a defeated tail to a national ticket. His friend and colleague, BURTON K. WHEELER, had cast his hope of larger things into the discard and gone charging off with La Follette—because he liked La Follette and the things for which La Follette stood—though he had no more delusions as to the outcome of the election than had WALSH, who probably attributed WHEELER's adventure to the instability of youth.

Nevertheless WALSH is a pretty good Democrat and a real liberal. He showed the latter when he banged away at Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer, thereby shocking his fellow Democrats for the treason to the Wilson administration. Palmer was engineering the red raids during the excitement of the end of the war and this offended WALSH's sense of constitutional liberty. He joined with BORAH in deprecating the hysteria over anarchistic manifestations. "It is only at such times," WALSH wrote, "that the guaranties of the Constitution as to personal rights are of any practical value. In seasons of calm no one thinks of denying them. They are accorded as a matter of course."

He was a good League of Nations man as long as the fight was in the Senate, but when the Versailles treaty had been rejected he calmly announced in a speech that the Democrats would have to make vast concessions if they were ever going to get a treaty ratified. At that moment there was a Democratic superstition that the country would sustain Wilson in the 1920 election. WALSH is not superstitious. With his customary habit of cold analysis he knew that his party was in for a licking, and saw no value in averting his eyes from so evident a destiny.

Such is WALSH's past; what of his future? He starts this session with a crusade on the big light and power combinations. If there is another Teapot Dome hidden in the ramifications of these, he will dig it out. WALSH's gun is always loaded and he does not go in for paper chases. He needs an issue with which to focus upon himself national attention adequate to counterbalance the disadvantages of his geographical situation and the comparative political unimportance of his State. Like all the others in the second division of Democratic candidates, his only hope lies in the ability of the dry States to prevent Smith from running away with the nomination. If this is done, the convention becomes a free-for-all, and if WALSH can show with sufficient melodrama that the big power trusts threaten the safety of the country he may be able to coordinate the progressive sentiment of the West and the corresponding sentiment of the South, which HEFLIN, of Alabama, so ineptly typifies by linking it with Ku-Kluxism, and thereby get the nomination. Given that opportunity, perhaps he might be able to break the crust of his frigid dignity and rage and storm on the stump. That is really all he needs to be a popular orator. His speeches read classically; there is a hypnotizing accuracy in his massing of facts and a capacity for making word pictures of his arraignments that is altogether satisfactory. If he could only yell them, he would make an amazing campaign.

If he ever reached the White House, he would be as aggressive as Roosevelt, as judicial as Taft, as self-sufficient as Wilson, and as isolated as Coolidge—and as stubborn as all of them put together.

MIDDLE RIO GRANDE CONSERVANCY DISTRICT, NEW MEXICO

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 700) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to execute an agreement with the Middle Rio Grande conservancy district providing for conservation, irrigation, drainage, and flood control for the Pueblo Indian lands in the Rio Grande Valley, N. Mex., and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, with amendments, on page 2, line 6, to strike out "$1,752,642" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,593,311"; in line 12, to strike out "$1,752,642" and insert "$1,593,311"; in the same line, after "amount," to strike out "$350,000" and insert "$100,000"; in line 14, after "Provided," to strike out "further"; and on page 2, in line 22, after the words "taken into consideration any," to strike out the remainder of the bill and insert matter, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to enter into an agreement with the Middle Rio Grande conservancy district, a political subdivision of the State of New Mexico, providing for conservation, irrigation, drainage, and flood control for the Pueblo Indian lands situated within the exterior boundaries of the said Middle Rio Grande conservancy district, as provided for by plans prepared for this purpose in pursuance to an act of February 14, 1927 (44 Stat. L. p. 1098). The construction cost of such conservation, irrigation, drainage, and flood-control work apportioned to the Indian lands shall not exceed $1,593,211, and that said sum, or so much thereof as may be required to pay the Indians' share of the cost of the work herein provided for, shall be payable in not less than five installments without interest, which installments shall be paid annually as work progresses, and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated not to exceed $1,593,311, of which amount $100,000 is hereby made immediately available for the payment of the first installment: Provided, That should at any time it appear to the said Secretary that construction work is not being carried out in accordance with plans approved by him, he shall withhold payment of any sums that may under the agreement be due the conservancy district until such work shall have been done in accordance with the said plans: Provided further, That in determining the share of the cost of the works to be apportioned to the Indian lands there shall be taken into consideration any allowances determined by the Secretary of the Interior as properly deductible, and the total Indian acreage benefited shall be definitely determined by said Secretary and such acreage include only lands feasibly susceptible of economic irrigation and cultivation, and in no event shall the average per acre cost for the area of Indian lands benefited exceed $67.50: Provided further, That all present water rights now appurtenant to approximately 8,346 acres of irrigated Pueblo lands owned individually or as pueblos under the proposed plans of the district, and all water for the domestic purposes of the Indians and for their stock shall be prior and paramount to any rights of the district or any property holder therein, which priority so defined shall be recognized and protected in the agreement between the Secretary of the Interior and the said Middle Rio Grande conservancy district, and the water rights for newly reclaimed lands shall be recognized as equal to those of like district lands and be protected from discrimination in the division and use of water, and such water rights, old as well as new, shall not be subject to loss by nonuse or abandonment thereof so long as title to said lands shall remain in the Indians individually or as pueblos or the United States, and such irrigated area shall not be subjected directly or indirectly to the reimbursable features of this act, nor shall it be subject by the district or otherwise to any pro rata share of future operation and maintenance or betterment work. Subject to the foregoing exception the remainder of the share of the cost paid the district on behalf of the Indian lands under the agreement herein authorized, including any sum paid to the district from the funds authorized to be appropriated by the act of February 14, 1927 (44 Stat. L. 1098), shall be reimbursed to the United States in accordance with the benefits derived, but in no event to exceed the limitation of cost herein fixed, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That such reimbursement shall be made from leases or proceeds from the newly reclaimed Pueblo lands in not less than 40 annual payments, and there is hereby created against such newly reclaimed lands a first lien, which lien shall not be enforced during the period that the title to such lands remains in the pueblos or individual Indian ownership: Provided further, That said Secretary of the Interior, through the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or his duly authorized agent, shall be recognized by said district in all matters pertaining to its operation in the same ratio that the Indian lands bear to the total area of lands within the district, and that the district books and records shall be available at all times for inspection by said representative.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TIME OF HOLDING FEDERAL COURT IN ARKANSAS

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, from the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 9142) to amend section 71 of the Judicial Code, as amended, by changing time of holding court at El Dorado and Harrison, Ark.

I call the attention of my colleague the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. It merely changes the time of holding court at Harrison, Ark., and at El Dorado, Ark., in order that there may be no conflict in the meeting of the courts in that district.

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 71 of the Judicial Code, as amended, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 71. (a) The State of Arkansas is divided into two districts, to be known as the western and eastern districts of Arkansas.

"(b) The western district shall include four divisions, constituted as follows: The Texarkana division, which shall include the territory embraced on July 1, 1920, in the counties of Sevier, Howard, Little River, Pike, Hempstead, Miller, Lafayette, and Nevada; the El Dorado division, which shall include the territory embraced on such date in the counties of Columbia, Ouachita, Union, Ashley, Bradley, and Calhoun; the Fort Smith division, which shall include the territory embraced on such date in the counties of Polk, Scott, Logan, Sebastian, Franklin, Crawford, Washington, Benton, and Johnson; and the Harrison division, which shall include the territory embraced on such date in the counties of Baxter, Boone, Carroll, Madison, Marion, Newton, and Searcy.

"(c) Terms of the district court for the Texarkana division shall be held at Texarkana on the second Mondays in May and November; for the Eldorado division, at El Dorado on the third Mondays in April and October; for the Fort Smith division, at Fort Smith on the second Mondays in January and June; and for the Harrison division, at Harrison on the first Mondays in April and October.

"(d) The clerk of the court for the western district shall maintain an office in charge of himself or a deputy at Texarkana, Fort Smith, El Dorado, and Harrison. Such offices shall be kept open at all times for the transaction of the business of the court."

SEC. 2. This act does not repeal or amend the remainder of section 71 of the Judicial Code as it applies to the eastern district of Arkansas.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COLLECTION OF PORTO RICAN TAXES

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Calendar No. 139, the bill (S. 754) for the relief of certain Porto Rican taxpayers.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, pending the request of the Senator from Connecticut, I understand that the passage of this or some similar measure is made necessary by the application which has been given to the act of March 4, 1927, denying the district court of the United States for Porto Rico the right or power to issue injunctions in cases involving the collection of Porto Rican taxes.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator is entirely correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I would like to be informed why such a policy was deemed wise or essential, namely, the policy which was incorporated in the act of March 4, 1927? Why was it deemed necessary to deny the right of injunction in tax cases relating to Porto Rican taxes?

Mr. BINGHAM. The reason was that a great many taxpayers of Porto Rico were taking advantage of that method for either not paying their taxes or postponing the payment of their taxes, more than 250 suits or pleas for injunction having been brought to the court at one time, as I was informed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. A similar condition might arise in any jurisdiction in the United States where the validity of a tax was questioned.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is true.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. As I understand it, there were a number of cases in which the injunctions have been permanently granted forbidding the collection of taxes in the district court, and the effect of the statute of March 4, 1927, was to deny them the relief after the court had already decided the case.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is true, Mr. President. The cases have been appealed, and before the appeals could be decided and the cases permanently disposed of by the Supreme Court Congress enacted this law, and the Supreme Court then directed that all of the cases be thrown out of court.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Is it the purpose of the bill to give relief in all the cases that were pending at the time of the passage of the act of March 4, 1927, so that it will not have a retroactive effect?

Mr. BINGHAM. Not all the cases. Certain cases have been compromised.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I mean of all cases that are still pending.

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes; that is true. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But if we pass this bill it will hereafter be impossible to secure injunctions against the collection of Porto Rican taxes.

Mr. BINGHAM. Future taxpayers of Porto Rico must not look to the Federal courts for injunctions to prevent the payment of local taxes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection. I think the passage of the bill is necessary.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill which had been reported from the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

Be it enacted, etc., That if in any suit pending March 4, 1927, but since abated or dismissed solely by reason of the provisions of the act entitled "An act to amend and reenact sections 3, 20, 31, 33, 38, and 48 of the act of March 2, 1917, entitled 'An act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes,' as amended by an act approved June 7, 1924, and for the insertion of a new section in said act between sections 5 and 6 of said act, to be designated as '5a' of said act," approved March 4, 1927, the taxpayer had prior to such date obtained an injunction restraining the assessment or collection of any tax imposed by the laws of Porto Rico after trial on merits in the District Court of the United States for Porto Rico, or if in any such suit on appeal to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the First Circuit the right of any taxpayer to an injunction restraining the assessment or collection of any tax imposed by the laws of Porto Rico had been decreed, the treasurer of Porto Rico shall enforce the collection of the tax so enjoined or decreed by a suit at law instead of by attachment, embargo, distraint, or any other form of summary administrative proceeding. Notwithstanding the provisions of any existing statute of limitations, any such suit may be instituted at any time not later than one year after the approval of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROTECTION OF WATERSHEDS OF NAVIGABLE STREAMS

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1181) authorizing an appropriation to be expended under the provisions of section 7 of the act of March 1, 1911, entitled "An act to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States, or with the United States, for the protection of the watersheds of navigable streams, and to appoint a commission for the acquisition of lands for the purpose of conserving the navigability of navigable rivers," as amended.

If the bill is made the unfinished business, I do not propose to proceed with its consideration at this time, but to lay it aside to take up other business of the Senate such as pertains to the morning hour.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I understand the Senator does not ask for the passage of the bill this afternoon.

Mr. McNARY. No. I am quite willing to have it laid aside if it is made the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with an amendment.

Mr. McNARY. I yield for the transaction of further routine business, if there be any.

THE SHINGLE INDUSTRY

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to file with the Finance Committee an exhibit in the form of some cedar shingles which have been sent me from my State by Mr. J. Goldman, of Everett, Wash. These shingles are identical with about 2,000,000,000 or 3,000,000,000 other shingles which are being manufactured in the State of Washington. As the result of the tariff law which put a tariff on logs and destroyed half the shingle industry, the industry is only producing about 60 per cent of the production in 1922.

When the tariff act of 1922 was passed we were making about 5,500,000,000 shingles a year. Free shingles and a tariff on logs have practically destroyed this business. It is so difficult to sell shingles in this country now, as a result of the importation of more than 2,000,000,000 shingles a year from Canada, that the shingle mills and their owners in the State of Washington have decided to propagandize a little with these shingles. I understand that more than 5,000 of them have been set aside to be sent to Congressmen and Senators to impress them with the necessity of a tariff on shingles. They are fine cedar shingles, but our shingle-mill owners can not pay American wages and produce them in competition with Canadian shingle-mill operators, who use 60 per cent Oriental labor. So I ask permission to file these shingles with the Finance Committee, and to say in advance that there will be probably 5,000 more of them come to Senators and Members of the House of Representatives, which number will be more than sufficient to roof the halls of the Senate and the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington ask leave to file 1 shingle or 5,000 shingles? [Laughter.]

Mr. DILL. I ask to file this exhibit, and I give notice that there probably will be 5,000 more.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The exhibit will be filed with the Committee on Finance.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened; and (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 1, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, January 31, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Beneath the shadow of our Heavenly Father our lives are moving on. For the weakest and the humblest of Thy children there is a goal of love; there is deliverance from evil; there is a transformation into all goodness. We need to start this day right. Make our hearts exceedingly sensitive to the least variation from the truth. Give us, O Lord, clearness of moral perception. Put purpose, power, and contentment into our lives. May sweet charity be their urgent note and pity the one whose heart has grown bitter. Come to the great, wide, needy world of humanity; open its heart to Thee that it may walk in Thy light and possess Thy peace. In the blessed name of our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DESIGNATION BY CLERK OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

JANUARY 30, 1928.

HON. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: Desiring to be temporarily absent from my office, I hereby designate Mr. Leroy D. Brandon, journal clerk of the House of Representatives, to sign any and all papers for me which he would be authorized to sign by virtue of this designation and of clause 4, Rule III, of the House.

Very respectfully,

WM. TYLER PAGE,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 5725. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ouachita River at or near Monroe, La.;

H. R. 5726. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing a bridge across the Black River at or near Jonesville, La.; and

H. R. 5728. An act granting the consent of Congress to the police jury of Morehouse Parish, La., or the State Highway Commission of Louisiana, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Bayou Bartholomew at or near Point Pleasant, La.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. BARBOUR, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill H. R. 10286, making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, and together with the accompanying papers referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia reserves all points of order.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the War Department appropriation bill. Pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be not fixed at present, but that we go on and fix the time later, and that the time for general debate be controlled, one-half by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] and one-half by myself.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood that we had an agreement for five hours on a side.

Mr. BARBOUR. Very well. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the time for general debate be fixed at 10 hours, one-half of which to be controlled by myself and one-half by the gentleman from Virginia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the present consideration of the War Department appropriation bill, and pending that asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be limited to 10 hours, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON]. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object, but I ask whether or not it is not something of a departure from our ordinary practice to introduce the War Department appropriation bill, carrying $389,199,869 from the floor, and immediately move to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for its consideration, when no more than a very few copies of a committee print are available, and when no copy of the bill as introduced is available to any of the membership, because none have yet been printed. When has this ever occurred before?

Mr. BARBOUR. It has occurred frequently in connection with other appropriation bills.

Mr. BLANTON. I have not been able to find where it ever occurred in any long session. In a short session sometimes when the House is behind in its work this has been done.

Mr. TILSON. It has been done this session.

Mr. BLANTON. Not any bill of this importance.

Mr. BARBOUR. My recollection is that it has been done this session with an appropriation bill.

Mr. BLANTON. What is all the hurry about?

Mr. BARBOUR. I understand that the bills will be available this afternoon, and we propose to proceed this afternoon with general debate.

Mr. BLANTON. How are you going to debate a bill intelligently if you do not know what is in the bill?

Mr. BARBOUR. The bills will be here later this afternoon. This is merely a time saver.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall not interfere, but we are getting in a terrible hurry, and into a very bad practice.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, we are strictly within our rights when we introduce a bill and proceed with its consideration immediately. This is not a violation of the rules; it is in strict accord with the rules.

Mr. BLANTON. It is a bad practice.

Mr. MADDEN. We are not going to consider the bill upon its merits to-day. We are going to have general debate. To-morrow is Calendar Wednesday, and on Thursday there will be general debate again, so that everybody will have plenty of time to inform himself in respect to everything that is in the bill between now and the time it comes up for consideration on its merits. I do not consider that we are asking any favors by the method that we are pursuing, though I sometimes think it would be better if it could wait a day. However, this is one of the cases where the organization of the House wants us to go ahead.

Mr. BLANTON. As the Members can not tell what is in the bill except as the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] relates it to us in his speech, in order that the membership may hear him, I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that we have no quorum. Then the Members may possibly get a smattering of what is in the bill.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman withhold for a moment?

Mr. MAPES. Let us fix the time first.

Mr. BLANTON. I insist on the point of order. There should be a quorum here to hear the debate on this $389,199,869 Army bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the War Department appropriation bill. The Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the motion will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 328, not voting 105, as follows:

The SPEAKER. On this vote 328 Members are recorded—a quorum. But before announcing the result of the vote the Chair will again put the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] that the general debate on this bill be limited to 10 hours, one-half the time to be controlled by himself and one-half controlled by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Upon this question the yeas are 328 and the nays none.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10286, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 10286, the War Department appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I shall not, the bill really ought not to be read, because if it is it will be printed in the RECORD, and then the people would find out that it embraces $389,199,869, which is more than the bill for the present fiscal year, and shows that the Army expenditures are increasing all the time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL].

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Chairman, 30 years ago, "Remember the Maine" was on the lips of every American and to-day, remember the flood of 1927 is the slogan on the lips of every American.

The sympathy of the Nation should go out to the poor people of the Mississippi Valley, where an avalanche of water, 300 miles in length and 100 miles in width, covered every city, village, and farm.

One million three hundred thousand second-feet of water flowed between the levees of the Mississippi River and 1,200,000 second-feet flowed over the land outside of the levees. A total of 2,500,000 second-feet passed through the Mississippi Valley during this awful flood.

PERSONAL INSPECTION

No matter how poor the farmer was, he lost his all except his little family. In despair, he hesitated to move because there was no place to go and no place to stay. Pity and sympathy should go out to the flood sufferers of the valley.

Levees should be built and reconstructed spillways and flood ways should be developed so that never again could such a disastrous flood occur.

With Congressman FRANK R. REID, I covered the entire flooded district by airplane and boat when the water had reached its crest.

Flying over vast territory in the vicinity of Vicksburg, nothing could be seen but water with the exception of an occasional church steeple and the roofs of high buildings.

By boat we reached Simmesport, a small town at the junction of the Old River (an arm of the Mississippi), the Red, and the Atchafalaya Rivers. Here the river had reached within 12 inches of the top of the levees that were 60 feet high. The men and women of the village were at work, day and night, with planks and sand bags raising the levee so as to hold back the water that was gradually rising at the rate of 1 foot every 24 hours. Later a crevasse was made at Melville, 20 miles below, entering into the Atchafalaya River, allowing this water to flow over the Sugar Bowl of Louisiana, the richest land in the State. This gave temporary relief to those residing in the neighborhood of the Red River and the Old River but the whole country below was inundated by the floods, which destroyed farms, crops, stock, and fortunes.

The Government must give relief to the entire Mississippi Valley, which includes all of the States with tributaries flowing into the Mississippi River. [Applause.]

My views on flood relief will be given to you as I see them from personal observation, experience in regulation of floods, and good common business sense.

A NATIONAL PROBLEM

It is a national problem and the expense must be borne by the United States Government, because the States are not able to raise the necessary funds, and complications would hazard the completion of a constructive flood-control program.

The Congress of the United States should pass legislation at this session of Congress for the purpose of completing emergency work in the South and putting the machinery to work to make a study and survey of the entire flooded district, including not only the Mississippi River but all its large tributaries and their tributaries, beginning with the Illinois, Ohio, Tennessee, Yazoo, St. Francis, Missouri, Arkansas, Ouachita Boeuf, White, Red, and the Old Rivers, using the Atchafalaya River as an outlet.

It would be useless to pass legislation to take care of the flood waters of the Mississippi River without passing equal legislation to take care of the tributaries, because it was the tributaries that created the greater part of the late flood.

Let me digress to analyze each of these tributaries in a meager way in order to make myself clear to the Congress that it was the tributaries that really caused the great disaster.

ILLINOIS RIVER

The Illinois River is 230 miles in length, beginning at Utica and flowing into the Mississippi River at Grafton, Ill. Its depth is 7 feet at low-water mark, and it was the first river to overflow in the late flood which started on September 1, 1926, washed out the levees, overflowed the districts, and continued all winter at an abnormal stage. Beginning with the spring rains, in February, 1927, it reached a crest on April 24, 1927, of 24.65 feet. The levees having been washed out, the flood continued until June, 1927.

The levees were repaired in some places by an appropriation from the State of Illinois. However, in the fall, the floods began again and on September 29, 1927, a crest was reached of 22 feet and continued until these floods washed out the levees in the Banner district, the most important one which had been repaired by State funds. And as late as December 27, 1927, we had another flood crest of 21 feet. The continuation of the floods in the Illinois River has been from September 1, 1926, to the present time, January, 1928.

This overflow has covered the levees for at least 150 miles in length and inundated 220,000 acres of the best land in the State of Illinois. Every farmer is practically ruined as the result of these floods. Most all of the farms have been inundated for the past two years, and there have been no crops. Consequently, the Illinois River, which furnished 7 per cent of the flood waters of the Mississippi River, being a slow sluggish stream, these flood waters were again backed up into the Illinois Valley which was really the cause of the continual flood of the entire valley.

The stage of the river in December, 1927, as I said before, is 21 feet against a low-water mark of 7 feet. The late floods of the Mississippi River caused the Illinois River to rise 10.6 feet above the top of the La Grange Dam, which is located 78 miles north of the mouth of the river.

During the flood of the Mississippi River in June, 1844, by reliable authority it is conceded that if there had been no water in the Illinois River at all, this flood would have backed the water up to Utica, Ill., which is 230 miles above the mouth of the river and is the beginning of the Illinois River.

So it is plain that the flood-control program should not only start with the Illinois River but it should be included in the flood control bill.

ALL TRIBUTARIES SHOULD BE INCLUDED

Other tributaries that should have the attention of the commission are the Missouri River, which is a river that naturally discharges at least twice as much water as the Illinois River but, on the other hand, it contributed very little toward the late flood while the Illinois River contributed a very large amount. It would take only a small amount of money to control the floods in the Missouri, which probably would be accomplished by building reservoirs; the St. Francis and the White Rivers are not so large but are contributors toward the flood; the Arkansas, Ouachita, Boeuf, and Black Rivers finally flow into the Red River.

It is anticipated that a flood way from the Arkansas River to the Red River will take care of these tributaries.

The Ohio River, through the work that has been done upon it by the building of locks and making it a navigable stream, will obviate any great necessity of flood control.

It will probably be necessary to do some work on the Yazoo River.

By giving flood relief to all of these tributaries you will relieve to a large extent the flood in the Mississippi River.

INTERIM LEGISLATION

In my opinion, the legislation to be passed by this Congress in a measure should be interim legislation with appropriations not to exceed $50,000,000 per year for three years. The reason that I have come to this conclusion is that you can not spend any more than that amount judiciously per year during the next three years. All necessary work on the lower Mississippi should be done at once in accordance with the plans laid out by the engineers and the Mississippi River Commission to protect the lower part of the Mississippi Valley from immediate floods.

The legislation should be confined to the trunk lines of the rivers running from the Lakes to the Gulf and their tributaries. It is a large proposition within itself and should be confined to the Illinois and Mississippi Valleys.

In order to make a comprehensive plan for flood control of the Mississippi River and all its tributaries, it will require at least one year of engineering, study, and survey. It is my thought that this Congress should determine a policy that would recognize the obligation of the Federal Government to assume and perform the task of flood control of the Mississippi River and all its tributaries. [Applause.]

A combination of flood control by the Government and the States, in my judgment, would be a detriment to the progress of flood control. The States, where the heavy floods occur, are not financially or physically able to combat with such floods as the flood of 1927, and consequently the Government of the United States should have full charge of the building of levees, spillways, flood ways, and reservoirs.

If the States were to have a part, either financially or in designating the plans for flood control, there would be conflicts and the results would be very detrimental, in my judgment, to the success to be attained. An exception might be made where levees are built to benefit the adjacent land. In that case, the present law requires the Government to pay two-thirds of the expense and the landowner or levee district one-third. This rule should apply on the Mississippi River and all tributaries. If the landowners are unable to meet their portion of the assessment, then the Government should accept from them bonds running 25 years at a low rate of interest for the payments, such bonds to be subject to existing liens. The Government in all cases should bear the expense of the general river improvement.

A portion of the Jadwin plan reads as follows:

> The Federal Treasury should bear the portion of the cost of engineer structures for flood control that is justified by the national aspects of the problem and the national benefits. It may even bear 80 per cent of such costs but substantial local cooperation is essential to avoid waste.

As I understand it, this would mean that the State or property owners would pay the other 20 per cent. I am not so sure that that would be profitable to the Government. The collection of the 20 per cent and mixing the individual or the State in the flood-control program, in my judgment, would be a detriment to the National Government, and therefore it would seem to me under the circumstances that the State should do its part as a whole and come to an agreement with the Government, so as not to establish a precedent of putting the entire burden upon the Government.

The securing of right of way for spillways and flood ways should devolve upon the State through which the spillway and flood way pass. The State should assume that part of the program to secure either easements or purchase of lands for this purpose so as to relieve the Government of any obligation or damage or future responsibility.

If it becomes necessary to purchase the land, the Government should furnish the funds to make the payments and should accept any reimbursements that might come from the resale or the rentals of the land. The States should assume all legal responsibilities. The laws of the States should be so constituted that the minimum purchase price for the land would be accomplished on a basis of the tax valuation of the land. The maintenance and control of the flood ways should be in the hands of the United States Government, but under some conditions it might be equitable to divide the expense between the State and Government.

SURVEY OF UPPER RIVERS NECESSARY

On all of the upper rivers running into the Mississippi River, a complete survey should be made and the commission should take charge of these rivers up to a point reached by the flood of 1927. They should have the same jurisdiction over these rivers as they have over the Mississippi River and should be compelled to control the floods on these rivers. It should be done at the same time and under the same management as that of the Mississippi River.

Flood ways, spillways, levees, and reservoirs seem to be the principal methods for flood control. There is no doubt but what flood ways and spillways will nearest meet the requirements. The engineers so far have selected three or four places for flood ways and spillways. But this is a proposition that should be given plenty of time and consideration, because it involves a heavy expense, a long period of construction, destruction of much property, and it should not be attempted until it has been thoroughly investigated by the proper engineering force.

Reservoirs may be of much service for flood control, but the question arises, Where would be the proper places to locate them? Some argue that they should be at the head of the rivers, while others say they should be near the mouth of the rivers. This is a project that should be given great deliberation, and the engineers should take their time in making a decision, as it will involve large expenditures with possible meager results.

REFORESTATION

Reforestation of the lands will be very helpful to flood control. It is a long-drawn-out process, more or less expensive, but there should be encouragement by the Government to reforestate much of the waste land. It will facilitate the raising of timber for the future and will in a measure be serviceable for flood control. When our great forests existed they were a wonderful help in that direction. Every leaf was a reservoir in itself. A heavy blanket of leaves over the land absorbed tremendous amounts of water; timberlands held the water many weeks while cleared lands allow the water to rush immediately into the rivers. And so reforestation would be of great service to flood control and should have a reasonable amount of consideration.

It is only about once in 5 or 10 years that we have these tremendous floods. We might have one in another year, and still we might run for 10 years without such a flood as we had in 1927.

LANDS IN FLOOD WAYS SHOULD BE CULTIVATED

The lowlands that are to be used for flood ways and spillways should be cultivated and operated just as they are at the present time. In fact, I can see no more danger of operating them after they are put into flood ways than the danger that exists now, because if you would have a flood the same as the 1927 flood, it would overflow this land anyway. After you have made this land into flood ways, then, of course, the water in flood time would go down through the flood ways and overflow it but would soon run off, so there could be very little difference except in the matter of control.

My suggestion is that on all of these properties mounds should be built either by pumping the sand out of the rivers or using the soil to build the mounds. On these mounds the houses and barns should be built, and corrals for the stock should be put upon them. And in cases of emergency, where the flood ways are used, then the people having protected themselves on top of the mounds would be safe from destruction. After the water had passed down they could return to the lowlands again for their farming. Their losses would only be the amount of crops that might be destroyed and the expense of putting the farms back into cultivation.

REVETMENT

Further revetment of the Mississippi and Missouri River banks and all tributaries should be adopted as a fixed policy where it is required.

This is a bold statement, but I am convinced that if flood control is to be a success you must control the banks of at least these two rivers. Cement makes the best revetment. Stone can be used, but they are simplifying the cement revetment now so that it is about as cheap as any of the other kind.

I am reliably informed that wherever these banks have been revetted they have stood up and the results have been satisfactory. The river will do its own dredging. The banks will hold, and they will be serviceable not only for flood control but for navigation. This in itself is going to be an expensive job, because there is 2,120 miles of river bank on both sides of the Mississippi River from Cairo to the Passes, and it should be revetted nearly all the way down. Twenty years may be required for this job. Therefore the acute places should be revetted first.

If an operation is necessary on the human body to save the life, then you should have the operation, and in my judgment revetment is just as applicable to the rivers.

FLOOD-CONTROL LEGISLATION SHOULD AID NAVIGATION

The Rivers and Harbors Committee and the Flood Control Committee of the House should have joint relation in this legislation.

It is important in legislating for flood control not to destroy navigation. If flood control were the only problem in the minds of the committee, a condition might develop where navigation would be destroyed. For instance, flood ways might be built that would take the water out of the tributaries or the Mississippi River so that in low-water time there would not be enough water in the main channel for navigation purposes. It would seem to me that the two committees should have some joint relation, so that in passing bills for the purpose of flood control or rivers and harbors the same money could be utilized for both purposes and flood control and navigation both would be accomplished.

If the river is properly revetted for flood control it will act harmoniously for navigation purposes. The river and harbor bills could be drawn with an understanding that the revetments could be used for both flood control and navigation.

The Congress of the United States should give this joint committee arrangement careful and deliberate consideration.

On flood control a compelling bill should be passed, so that at the next session, after the engineers have had ample time to make a report, with a constructive plan for control of the Mississippi and all its tributaries, the proper legislation and appropriations should be passed to carry out the requirements.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION

The Mississippi River Commission, composed of three Government engineers, one official from the Bureau of Coast and Geodetic Survey, two civil engineers, and one eminent citizen, has been in existence for 49 years. It would be a mistake to discontinue or change this agency except it might be more serviceable if it were under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers. There has been criticism of the Mississippi River Commission, yet it must be remembered that they have had limited means during all of these years to accomplish any great amount of flood control, and especially a flood control to compete with the terrible flood of 1927.

However, the information that they have gathered during these years—the maps, records, observation, surveys, gauge readings, and general knowledge—at the present time is a very valuable asset. I believe that it would be better to continue this commission without change.

It would be my suggestion that the salaries of the commission be raised to a sum commensurate with a good living wage for employment of this character, the members of the commission, including the Government engineers, to be appointed for a term of eight years. The officers of the commission should be selected either by a vote of the commission or be appointed by the President of the United States, and it should be understood that these officers are to give their entire time to channel improvement and flood-control development and shall remain in their position for a period of eight years.

It should be understood among the Government engineers if there is a difference in the rank of the engineers, that regardless of that each should have a free opinion to express his views on the work to be done. I regard this highly important for such a tremendous task as will be before the commission.

The reason given for the eight-year period can best be explained by what has recently occurred on the commission. Capt. Willis Teale, who one year ago was appointed secretary of the Mississippi River Commission and proved to be a competent secretary, without notice was ordered to the Philippine Islands. But, I understand, the order is temporarily revoked. It is easy to see that if the War Department officials are given the privilege of transferring members of the commission at their will, then there never can be any good come by Government engineers being on this commission, because it stands to reason that continued study and experience will be of great service to the men serving in this capacity.

Making this commission permanent and with adequate salaries to its members so that they may give their entire time to the work and be kept steadily employed will in the long run be money well spent by the Government. This commission should have a definite policy laid out by Congress and they should at each session of Congress make a report as to their program. In doing this a comprehensive plan for flood control will be accomplished.

The Flood Control Committee has held exhaustive hearings on flood control and should be complimented upon the work they have done. Congressman FRANK R. REID, who is chairman of the committee, has given all of his time for the past year to this subject and should receive the commendation of the Congress. [Applause.]

My colleagues, the Government of the United States has made history in passing bills requiring large appropriations. I am confident that the greatest service that Congress can render the people of this Nation will be to pass a bill for flood control of the Mississippi River and its tributaries. It would be useless to pass a bill and an appropriation with less money than enough to make the flood control a success.

I do not believe any one at the present time could state the amount. It might be a billion dollars and it might be more or less, but whatever it is, let us do the emergency work in the South now and immediately secure the information necessary to enlighten this House so that when we do vote for a complete flood control bill for this great river and its tributaries, we will vote for one that will do the work.

The people that live along these rivers are continually in danger, and are entitled to the consideration of the whole of the United States. The Mississippi Valley is the bread basket of the Nation, and supplies the East, West, North, and South with food supplies.

THE FARMER MUST BE PROTECTED

The farmer who tills the soil in this fertile valley is entitled to protection. It can be given in no other way than through national flood legislation, and I trust that we will act consistently on this legislation, and at the same time consider it sanely, because it would be a sin to make a makeshift to save a few paltry dollars on flood control. The poor people of the South are deserving of recognition by the Nation because their entire life has been spent in that section and they have had to undergo many hardships, but, on the other hand, the people of the North, along these other tributaries, have suffered far worse financially per acre than they have in the South, and they are entitled to the same consideration. I hope that at the conclusion of this speech the Members who have heard me realize that I am trying to impart to them in my own way the true condition along these rivers and the remedy as suggested that may bring forth the future prosperity of the valley, of the people, and of the Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. RAGON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Yes.

Mr. RAGON. I am interested in asking this question because the gentleman has made a very exhaustive statement in a very brief time. I understand the gentleman's position to be, that he feels there should be on the part of the State or the landowners along the Mississippi and its tributaries a contribution of 20 per cent toward construction.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. No; that is not my plan. My plan is to let the law stand as it is, one-third and two-thirds. If the land that is going to be benefited by these levees that are to be built by the Government has any indebtedness against it, has liens on it, or is not able to pay, then let the Government take a 25-year bond, subject to the liens, but at a very low rate of interest. If the land becomes valuable later on, in 25 years it can well afford to pay the one-third. If it did not, then the Government would have to absorb it because it held the bonds.

Mr. RAGON. With reference to the rights of way for these spillways and levees, is it the gentleman's thought that the local unit or the landowners should pay for them?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. No, sir; I did not say that. It is just the opposite. You take Louisiana, which gets most of the flood ways. I know that the people in that State have not the money with which to pay, so I think the State should make arrangements whereby the Government can purchase the flood ways on the basis of tax valuation. In other words, they have got to make their laws so you can go through with the flood ways, and then the Government furnishes the money to pay for them. Then, after a while, it may be possible to resell those lands.

To illustrate, if they are bought at $17 an acre, these flood ways, if they are properly arranged, will make the land more valuable; that is, the land will be better after the flood ways are put in than they are without them. Consequently those lands can be sold, maybe, for half price; and if so, the money received for them would go back into the Treasury of the United States, because it had furnished the original money. If easements were taken the Government would have to assume the easements, and if rentals were charged for any of the lands then, of course, the Government would be entitled to the rentals. But in all cases the State should be responsible for the legality of the proposition and should not hold the Government for any damages in the future.

Mr. RAGON. In other words, the gentleman thinks the primary financial responsibility for the purchase of these rights of way should fall on the States?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. No: I said the money should be furnished by the Government to purchase these rights of way, but I said the arrangements for buying the land should be made by the State.

Mr. RAGON. Does the gentleman mean that the money would be given by the Government or advanced as a loan?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. It would be given outright by the Government. The lands would be purchased by the Government, and if the lands were resold the money would go back into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. RAGON. Now, as to the incidental damages that might grow out of the construction——

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. The State ought to stand that. I do not think the Government ought to be held for such damages.

Mr. RAGON. Then, as to this 33 per cent contribution which we have now, the gentleman would suggest, as I get it from his remarks, that the Government should advance the money for that purpose, if necessary, as a loan.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana and Mr. CHALMERS rose.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I yield first to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Do I understand it is your idea that the Government would sell the lands within the flood ways after a certain number of years?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I can see no objection to selling it back to the same farmers you buy it from and let them farm it.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. It would then cease to be a flood way.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. No; you would have to sell it with a provision that it would still be used as a flood way.

Mr. CHALMERS. I understand the gentleman has given most of his attention to the financial plans and not so much attention to cause and effect, and I would like to ask the gentleman, if it would not embarrass him in any way, if he has thought out a way whereby we can save part of the flood tide in the Mississippi River and its tributaries during a season by cutting off the water from the Great Lakes.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. That would not amount to anything, because the water of the Great Lakes only raised the Illinois River 3 inches. So it would not be worth while to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CHALMERS. I would like to follow that question up.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Illinois five additional minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I will yield first to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and then to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CHALMERS].

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman, seemingly, has been designated by the majority side to open this 10 hours' debate on this $389,199,869 Army bill, and I am wondering if the gentleman is speaking for the administration on this very important subject of "flood control."

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I am speaking from my own observations and expressing my own judgment, and nothing else.

Mr. BLANTON. At the request of the administration?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. No; not at the request of the administration.

Mr. CHALMERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. All right; I yield for one more question.

Mr. CHALMERS. I read in the answer to the case of Wisconsin and Michigan that the water drained from Lake Michigan at Chicago raises the level of the Mississippi River at St. Louis between 2 and 3 feet.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. That is not true.

Mr. CHALMERS. That statement was filed in that case.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I do not care about that, it is not true. When you have a flood of the proportions we have now at Havana, which is part way down the Illinois River, it raises the river 3 inches. At low-water mark you might raise it 2 or 3 feet, but that would not affect the floods.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I would like to ask the gentleman one question for information. Under the present arrangement whereby the Government pays two-thirds and the levee district one-third, if the levee district, under such arrangement, can not raise its one-third does that mean there is no work done there?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. No; it means that they must give a bond running for 25 years.

Mr. RAMSEYER. No; I mean under the present arrangement?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Let me finish my statement. It means the Government would take a bond of 25 years for that proportion at a very low rate of interest and the work would then go on.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Then what is the difference between the present arrangement and the gentleman's plan?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Under the present arrangement they have to raise the money immediately.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The present arrangement is that the levee district must raise the money and if they do not raise the money there is no work done?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. That is true, but my plan is to have the work done and let the Government take a bond for their portion.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I am just asking what the existing law is.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. The existing law is as the gentleman has stated.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Is the gentleman under the impression that a flood way is for the protection of the people living within the flood way or those living outside of the flood way?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. The flood ways are for the protection of the whole country by letting the water out.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. And does not concern the people living there?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. But if you do not use the flood ways for 10 years, why not farm them during that time?

Mr. RAGON. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Yes.

Mr. RAGON. The gentleman made a statement a moment ago with reference to the importance of tributaries and the gentleman made the statement that the Arkansas River runs into the Red River. It does not, but runs directly into the Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Yes; I did not mean to make that statement.

Mr. RAGON. I will give the gentleman one example of how important the tributaries are. Down the Arkansas River on April 20 there passed 815,000 cubic feet per second of water. In the White River, at the same time, there poured 450,000 cubic second-feet of water. In other words, from these two rivers that flow into the Mississippi at the same point, there were over 1,200,000 cubic feet per second of water that contributed to the flood down there, and I will say to the gentleman that Arkansas, perhaps, suffered more than any other State in the Union from the flood.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Not any more than Louisiana.

Mr. RAGON. Yes; I think we did.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I was down there, and I could not see anything but water there.

Mr. RAGON. You could not in Arkansas either; but I will say this much, in support of the gentleman's argument, that two-thirds of the damage done in Arkansas was done by the tributaries.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Yes; by the tributaries.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Yes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I want to get a little more clearly in the RECORD the effect of the diversion from Lake Michigan. The statement of the engineers before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors three years ago at the hearings showed that the effect of the 10,000 cubic second-feet of water raised the Mississippi at St. Louis at low stage only 1 foot.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Yes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. And at the mouth of the Illinois River 1.1 feet.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. That is at low stage, and at high stage it would hardly raise it at all at St. Louis. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FROTHINGHAM].

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I have introduced a joint resolution which provides that in the opinion of the Congress of the United States all nations of the world should unite in prohibiting the use of submarines and discontinuing the construction thereof in every country. That the Government of the United States continue to use efforts to bring about these results.

Ever since the World War I have been hoping that submarines might be banned by treaty between the United States and other nations.

While sitting on the Rules Committee during the consideration of a joint resolution authorizing the President to appoint a commission to investigate the accident to the S-4, it occurred to me that the Congress, in addition to the adoption of that resolution, should take a stand in favor of outlawing submarines. So I introduced a resolution to that effect, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House, and I hope it will be acted on either in the form in which it was presented or in some other effective form. In other words, let us take a stand declaring our desire to do away with submarines as soon as other countries will agree to do so.

I am strongly in favor of keeping up our national defense, and always have been, but I do not believe in murder, either in time of war or in time of peace. [Applause.]

Efforts to outlaw the submarine were made at the Conference on the Limitation of Armament in 1921 and by the delegates of this country at a meeting in Europe several years ago. Whatever the opposition of some given nation may be at some given time, there may be good arguments and valid reasons for their changing. The interests and policies of nations are seldom constant fixtures.

The World War showed that submarines operating as commerce destroyers were committing cold-blooded murder.

The sinking of the Lusitania and the horrible sufferings connected therewith are still fresh in our minds. That was only one of a number of dreadful occurrences. Yet it probably was not intended to hit the Lusitania in such a vulnerable spot that she would sink almost immediately and without due time to put passengers in boats. But in a rough sea or for a long journey what protection do small lifeboats afford?

It is often impossible for a submarine to distinguish definitely whether a vessel is an enemy ship or not. Especially is this true if it is night and no lights are shown. The delicate submarine does not dare to expose itself or get dangerously near the object of attack. Moreover, even in daylight and in smooth seas it is impossible for the submarine to sink vessels without committing cold-blooded murder of the passengers and crews.

There is no need to enter here into the law of the sea relating to neutrals, belligerents, merchant ships, whether combatant or noncombatant, or the right of search and seizure, as I claim that a submarine will not and as a physical impossibility can not be used effectively against merchant ships except in an unlawful and brutal manner.

The laws of nations governing procedure in time of war which have been evolved so slowly from the days of barbarism have accomplished much but have failed to curb the brutality of this undersea craft that avoids a foe except when the opponents back is turned:

In the cankerous mind of the devil
There festered a fiendish scheme;
He called his cohorts around him
And designed the submarine.

* * * *

The engine room when under way
Is a place of torture, for the brain,
With the two big Diesel engines
Roaring and shaking as though in pain.

The after battery is where we eat;
That is, when we roll the least;
While hanging on to keep our place
Like some prehensile beast.
* * * *
We're bottled up, just like a trap,
With nothing in between
The sea and death but a metal cap
Like the lid on a soup tureen.
* * * *

The claim that they would develop into commerce carriers in time of peace has proved elusive.

The cruel actions of submarines in time of war are written in history. The list of accidents in time of peace is a long one.

It is necessary to go back only a few years to realize their frequency and seriousness, and I do not include all accidents to our submarines, but only those which resulted in loss of life.

On July 30, 1919, the United States submarine G–2, while engaged in depth-charge experiments, sank, drowning three men.

On September 26, 1921, the submarine R–6 sank in San Pedro Harbor and two men were drowned.

On October 29, 1923, the O–5 and a steamer collided and three men on the submarine were lost.

On September 26, 1925, the S–51 collided with the City of Rome off Block Island and 34 of the former's crew were lost.

On April 20, 1926, the submarine S–49 suffered from an explosion in which 10 men were injured, three of whom subsequently died.

On December 17, 1927, the submarine S–4 sank, due to a collision, and the 40 men on her were lost.

Tap, tap, tap—long will those sounds linger and haunt us.

Some of these accidents occurred because of collisions and some through mishaps to the delicate mechanism on submarines.

If we add the list of casualities in other countries the loss is many times more appalling. Foreign nations have had worse and quite as frequent accidents.

These are not necessarily due by any means to the fault of the Navy, for our Navy is composed of the finest, most intelligent, and patriotic of our citizens.

The disasters are due to the inherent delicacy of construction and the difficulties of maneuvering the vessels themselves.

I have cited enough casualties to show that submarines are death traps in time of peace. When submarines came into existence and for years afterwards the murderous lengths to which they could go was unforeseen. During the Spanish-American War I do not remember having seen any on either side in the waters around Cuba.

It does not seem that they were used to any great extent during the Japanese-Russian War.

In fact I do not think they came into general practical use until just after that war, and they do not seem to have been used in their full death-dealing capacity until many months after the outbreak of the World War.

Submarines, like poisoned gas, are a menace to noncombatants and to civilization. The use of both should be prohibited. When it comes to the practical side of approaching such prohibitions, however, the chances would be different, for while, manifestly, it would be difficult to detect the manufacture of poisoned gas the construction of a submarine and instruction of men in its use would be very difficult to conceal.

It has never been lawful to war on noncombatants, and I hope it never will be. It has never been lawful to fire on women and children and we must see that it never will be.

Making treaties to prohibit the use of submarines for such purposes would strengthen the international law, but we have seen how in the desperation of war treaties were broken during the last conflict. The only sure method of prevention is to prohibit construction and ban the use of the murderous submarine. [Applause.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee such time as he may desire.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I had not expected to address the House or the Committee of the Whole on the subject of flood control until a later period in the session, but taking advantage of the interest elicited by the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL] I will avail myself of the opportunity of presenting some aspects of this matter at this time which, so far as I know, have not been brought to the attention of the House, although they have been brought to the attention of the Committee on Flood Control.

I do not agree entirely with the gentleman from Illinois, but at the present time I do not propose to argue the questions upon which I disagree beyond merely stating them.

The gentleman from Illinois, as I understand it, takes the Jadwin plan as the basis of his remarks. Do not misunderstand me. I do not understand him as indorsing the Jadwin plan entirely, but it is the basis upon which he builds the structure he would have us indorse.

Let me say that from the very beginning I have always said the physical features of flood control had to be determined by engineers. I do not know how to control flood water. I do know that you can not squeeze it, that it can not be compressed so as to occupy a smaller space than it is now occupying. And so it has been my disposition from the very beginning to follow what seems to be the best considered plans by the best engineering talent of the country, whether that talent was found in the ranks of the Army engineers or in civil life.

But the legal questions ought to be determined by Congress. The respective participation of the Federal Government and of the States or subdivisions of States is distinctly and emphatically a matter which ought to be determined by the Congress itself.

Therefore to my mind the Chief of Engineers and the Mississippi River Commission as well, in its plan, might very well have confined themselves to bringing before the Congress and its proper committees the physical features required in their recommendations for control and have omitted to dwell upon these questions of national and local participation, because that is a thing which we must determine. Yet both the engineers and the commission have laid much stress upon their belief that there should be a large amount of local participation.

Mr. Chairman, there are two important factors in this local participation. One of them seems to have escaped any very great consideration here, and that is the matter of rights of way, both for levees and for the flood ways. That question is not free from difficulty in its legal aspects in respect to just how far the Federal Government can go, and how far it ought to go in condemning rights of way upon which to construct the protective levees, if condemnation be essential. The other factor, of course, is that of the amount of money participation which should be required of the localities, if any.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, I am very much concerned about the final adjudication of this matter, as all citizens of the United States properly should be. The question that has been troubling my mind is whether a blanket bill, for example, taking in everything from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from Winnipeg to the Everglades, assuming every responsibility for every act of every community, every State, every county, should be given serious consideration in the question of flood control, or should we differentiate between the cases that have merits of their own? Should everything, irrespective of whether it has merit or not, be put into a blanket bill? That is the thing that bothers me. I wonder how the gentleman from Tennessee feels about that?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I have no hesitation whatever in saying to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] how I do feel upon that matter. Of course, it has been anticipated by some from the very beginning that one of the difficulties attendant upon securing the passage of any legislation would be the desire to bring into it all sorts of schemes, plans, and theories that have been advanced from time to time over the years that might in some sort of way affect flood control. So far as I am concerned, I reiterate what I said in the beginning, that I recognize the physical features to require an intelligent engineering plan, and my disposition, I would say to the gentleman from Illinois, is very determined upon the proposition of following, so far as the physical features are concerned, the recommendations of what seems to be the best thought of the best engineers whose advice is available to us and eliminate what we might call the theories and, as I think, the very visionary proposals coming from other sources.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL] advanced the thought that it would be the duty of the States to acquire in some way the flood-way territory, the lands over which the flood way is proposed by the engineers to be constructed. I do not believe that is tenable. I am sure that it is not tenable so far as the State of Tennessee is concerned, for reasons which I shall explain to you in a very few minutes. My opinion is that if we adopt the theory which I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL] first to assert—that this should be regarded as a national project, a national duty—that that duty will apply to rights of way as much as it will to construction. I have here a very poor map for my purposes, but perhaps it will aid us a little. It would be better if we had a map really for this purpose. The Jadwin plan, as it has come to be known, really begins practically with Cairo, Ill. There exists now a levee from Bird Point, opposite Cairo, to New Madrid, Mo., a distance of about 70 miles. The Jadwin plan proposes to lower that levee a few feet, and then 5 miles west construct another and parallel levee, a very high and, of course, a very substantial levee, and the 5 miles of territory between the existing levee which is to be lowered and the new levee is to constitute a flood way when the water has reached a certain stage at Cairo. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] just what that stage is?

Mr. DENISON. As I remember General Jadwin's testimony, I think it is to go over at 55 feet.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It seems to me that is 53 feet, but I will not be sure. At any rate, when the water shall have reached a certain stage at Cairo, then the height of the present levee is to be regulated in such a way as that the water will begin to pour through this flood way, thus relieving the situation at the city of Cairo and presumably relieving the strip on the east bank of the river in the State of Kentucky, and just a little bit of it, perhaps, in the State of Tennessee, although very, very little, if any. The water passing through that flood way will be returned into the river at New Madrid, Mo., or near there. Then it is proposed from New Madrid south to Helena, or the mouth of the Arkansas, to increase the height of the levee on the west bank which is now in existence and rely upon that single levee for protection. The result of that will be to make a flood way of a part of my congressional district—that portion of it which borders on the Mississippi River. The whole effect of the floods of the Mississippi River in Tennessee are in the district that I represent. There are five counties from the Kentucky to the Mississippi line, north and south, across western Tennessee, the most southerly county being Shelby, in which the city of Memphis is located, and that county is in its entirety sufficiently high so that the floods do not materially affect it. The only danger to the city of Memphis lies in caving banks. It is not proposed in this plan to do anything in the State of Tennessee. There is just one levee there, known as the Reel Foot Levee, the major portion of which is in the State of Kentucky, and 4.6 miles of which, as I now remember the figures, are in the extreme northern part of Tennessee.

That protects a small area in a portion of one of the counties of my congressional district, and that is the only protection that we have; and it is not proposed to give us anything additional, but by the raising of the levee on the the west bank to make us the flood way to carry the water, nearly all of which in a state of nature would flow on the west side and leave us untouched.

The CHAIRMAN. Fifteen minutes of the gentleman's 20 minutes has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will take that five minutes left.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. I read the testimony and the statement that the gentleman referred to—General Jadwin—but I do not believe that he intended to make that part of Tennessee a flood way.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. He did not say that. Oh, no; he did not say that, but it is going to do it. He does not say anything about Tennessee at all.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman then infers that from the fact that he failed to mention it?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No; I infer it because I know the water will go over there.

Mr. DENISON. I think General Jadwin intended that the levee should be improved on both sides of the river, and that is not going to make a flood way in the gentleman's district.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is not naturally a flood way now. We would not care for the levees on that side except for the levees on the other side. Our side is naturally the high side of the river. Naturally there would be, at times, high water on that side, but the serious damage in Tennessee has been caused by the levees on the west side diverting the waters from their natural course on the side of the stream opposite to Tennessee.

Now, since this will in fact make a flood way of that part of Tennessee subject to damage, the State of Tennessee will have no interest in owning that territory; it is worth nothing to the State of Tennessee. It is the National Government that aided heretofore in doing the things that have damaged us. It is the National Government which is to put up at least a large proportion of the money to do the construction which is to damage us in the future, and I feel that any plan which is brought in must make provision whereby the National Government in some way will recompense these owners who will be damaged by the direct acts of the Government itself. But the State will not have any interest in buying it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. All of this discussion shows, of course, that this question ought not to be settled without due deliberation. I fear there is a disposition on the part of many to jump to conclusions without knowing much about the plan. I think perhaps that will turn out to be the case in the final solution of the problem.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I agree with the gentleman that this is a case that requires great deliberation, and I presume the gentleman does not mean to intimate that that deliberation can not be had at this session. I think we should have action at this session.

Mr. MADDEN. I simply think conclusions ought not to be jumped at.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. There are localities in Mississippi where the same conditions obtain as in Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes. In 1912 there was secured through the efforts of some of us a survey of these basins, so-called, with a view to obtaining a statement from the Mississippi River Commission as to whether it would be feasible and justifiable, both from the physical and the economic standpoint, to build levees for the protection of these narrow basins in Tennessee and Mississippi. That report will be found embodied in the hearings before the Committee on Flood Control at the present session of Congress. The report is practically exhausted now as a public document, and was inserted in the recent hearings. It was found that it would be feasible to levee parts of these basins, but all of that has now been abandoned, so far as the Jadwin plan and so far as the Mississippi River Commission plan is concerned.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Has the commission outlined a plan that would be feasible and practicable to do that?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. They found that it would be feasible to protect a part of the area, part of three counties. Part of it is so narrow that they reported that the cost of the construction of the levee in its relation to the value of the land on account of the restricted area would be such as would not justify it. But if it is not feasible and practicable to protect by levee, then, since the Government is doing us the damage on account of its construction on the other side, we must have some sort of compensation, and in any conclusion that is brought in here, whether based on the Jadwin plan or the commission plan or the plan of Mr. HULL, whatever plan may be adopted, some provision must be made to pay us damages, and that payment must come from the Federal Government, because the State has no interest whatever in it. It is not proposed to protect an additional inch of Tennessee.

Mr. DENISON. So far as I am concerned, I think the land in Tennessee should be given exactly the same protection as the land across the river, and if it can be done by levees, that should be done; if it can not be done and the flood-protection policy approved by Congress should cause additional damages to Tennessee, it ought to be paid for by the Government.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I thank the gentleman. I can not but feel that the entire House will recognize the justice of that proposition.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Can the gentleman give us the area in Tennessee that was to be protected from flood by this proposed plan in 1912?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I can give it exactly from the report of 1912. The commission in making that survey divided that area extending from the Kentucky line down to the Mississippi line into three basins. The upper basin, extending from Tiptonville, in Lake County, to the mouth of the Obion River, comprises 220,030 acres, including sand bars and the like. It was said that the backwater, like that in the year 1912, would cover 102,900 acres. The flood of last year did in fact cover all of that and much more.

The area lying between the levee and the hills that would be wholly or partially protected—this is in the first basin—amounts to 193,001 acres. The second basin, extending from the mouth of the Obion River to the mouth of Cold Creek, contains 102,436 acres. That part of it they report it would be impracticable to protect by a levee because of the expense. The third area is from Chickasaw Bluff No. 2 to Memphis, Tenn., a distance of 53 miles, which has an average width of about 1½ miles and contains a total of 51,232 acres.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to detain the House longer at this time about this matter, but I did think, particularly in view of the very strong grounds taken by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL] upon the duty of the State to furnish rights of way even for the flood ways, that I wanted to bring your attention to this problem. Gentlemen must see at a glance that it means nothing to the State of Tennessee to furnish those rights of way, because it gets no benefits whatever. So that is just one of the difficulties that is going to be in the way of having the States furnish these rights of way. Gentlemen should bear this in mind: The States, as States, have never participated in the construction of these levees. Whatever money has been furnished under these local participation plans has been furnished solely by the taxing districts or the levee districts that have been created under the laws of the States, but the States as a whole have never taxed themselves to contribute any of the funds.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FURLOW). The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. RAGON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. RAGON. I did not understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL] to say that he expects the States to pay for these rights of way. I understood him to say he expected the States, as an agency, to make arrangements for the purchase of these rights of way, but that the National Government would pay for them.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I may have misunderstood the gentleman upon that score, and I trust I did.

Mr. RAGON. I think that is the view he intended to convey. I was wondering whether there could be any objection to a plan whereby the only part the State would play would be as an instrumentality of purchase, and I think the gentleman's purpose was to eliminate gouging on the part of local landowners and things like that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. So far as I am concerned there could be no objection to that sort of a proposition, but that is elsewhere than in Tennessee. Tennessee can not be expected to pay for land which is being rendered worthless in order to protect people in other States.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. May I state that the proposal of my colleague from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL] was that the respective States, on account of legal or constitutional objections, could act as agent for the Federal Government in acquiring the necessary rights of way and then be reimbursed by the National Government.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And the National Government to pay for them?

Mr. DENISON. Yes; the States to be reimbursed by the National Government.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Perhaps that plan is not subject to the objections I might otherwise urge, but so far as my own State is concerned, where there is not to be a dime's worth of benefit, but only damage, I doubt whether we can hardly be expected to act as agent for the purchase of property. That is a question which will have to be worked out by the committee, but the point is we must have some relief.

Mr. DENISON. I think the theory of my colleague was that where this land is to be acquired for flood ways the States themselves, for various reasons, could deal better and more justly with their own citizens and obtain the lands on more equitable terms, perhaps, than the Federal Government could.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And then let the Federal Government reimburse the States?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. As I say, that might be a good plan as to some of the States. I have sought in my talk merely to emphasize the importance of protecting the equities of Tennessee property owners in the flood region, and I will not detain the House longer but yield back the remainder of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, an article appeared in the Sunday, January 22, edition of the Washington Star that I desire to read at this time:

Mississippi: Smith is gaining ground and the prospects now are that while the delegation is likely to vote for some one else on the early ballots, it will be willing to accept Smith in the end.

There is not enough truth in that statement to make a decent lie. The people of Mississippi are not for Governor Smith for the nomination for President. Why do some of these newspapers persist in trying to leave a false impression about the matter? The delegation that goes to the convention at Houston to represent the democracy of my State will, in my judgment, stand against the nomination of Governor Smith even as Petain stood against the German hordes at Verdun. They will have written in their democratic hearts and across Mississippi's democratic banner the immortal words: "He shall not pass." [Applause.]

I do not question the right of any Democrat to lend his support to the candidacy of Governor Smith, but I reserve to myself the same right that I give to all others; that is, to support the candidacy of a man whose nomination will inure to the benefit of my country—and you will notice that I put my country first—and my party; and the man who denies to me this right is neither a good Democrat nor a good citizen.

I, together with almost countless thousands of my fellow citizens in Mississippi, am against Governor Smith's nomination for the Presidency, and I do not intend to sit in Washington idly and supinely by and permit these newspaper reports to give a false impression to the people of my country.

Any newspaper that says that the Mississippi delegation to the Democratic Convention will vote for the nomination of Governor Smith of New York is either ignorant of the truth or deliberately misrepresents the situation. [Applause.]

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. WILLIAMSON].

THE PRESIDENT'S SOJOURN IN SOUTH DAKOTA

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, due to the President's making his home in my State last summer, South Dakota, and particularly that part of my district known as the Black Hills, became a household word in every home in the United States. His coming resulted in the beauty of that splendid scenic region being written up in scores of magazines of national circulation and in innumerable feature articles in periodicals and newspapers.

While in South Dakota the President was the guest of the State. He had his home in the picturesque and commodious State Game Lodge, situated in Custer State Park. This park is the largest State park in the United States and, from the standpoint of beauty and scenic grandeur, ranks with the best of our national playgrounds. Not only has nature lavished upon it all that is beautiful and sublime in mountain, forest, and glen, but it is filled with an abundant wild life in its natural habitat, which roams unafraid in its mountain fastnesses and upon the wide stretches of meadow and prairie. Its numerous sparkling streams abound with trout that are the joy of the angler.

In honor and appreciation of the sojourn of the President and Mrs. Coolidge in the Black Hills, the State legislature rechristened Lookout Mountain, one of our loftiest scenic points, "Mount Coolidge." The first lady was not forgotten, and the delightful mountain stream that perpetually murmurs by the lodge was renamed "Grace Coolidge Creek."

In the early hours of morning, rain or shine, the President could be seen striking down this stream with reel and rod. It was seldom that it failed to yield him some of its finny denizens. Occasionally he would seek the wildest haunts on horseback or attend some public function. Some of these functions were as wild and striking as only a genuine western rodeo can be. To the President these must have been new; but his stoicism and dignity did not often permit him to become demonstrative. That he enjoyed them is best attested by his invariably remaining to the end of the program. The first lady, however, never failed in her smiling, waving, and occasionally shouting appreciation. The great crowds respected and admired the President, but their love and praise of Mrs. Coolidge were unbounded.

It was on one of these occasions that the President, with solemn and colorful ceremony, became a member of the Ogallala Tribe of the Sioux and was christened "Chief Leading Eagle." I predict that the headdress of eagle feathers with which he was then decorated will be one of his most cherished trophies of the West.

While with us the President attended a farm picnic at which there were gathered 10,000 people and ate ear corn with the rest and in the fashion of his boyhood days in Vermont. He was obliged to help himself in true western fashion. It was observed that he was equal to the occasion. He also attended the county fair of Butte County, and visited our big irrigation project, where he was inducted into the "Order of Irrigators" and presented with the emblem of the order, in his case a ditch shovel, in miniature, of solid native Black Hills gold. He had not been advised in advance of this ceremony, and it surprised him into making a very apropos extemporaneous speech—a jewel so rare with the President that it is worth noting. Everybody knew that his prepared speeches were classics, but we had almost come to think that he could not talk "offhand" in public. Before the day was over he again demonstrated his ability to talk when he chose, in an exceedingly felicitous speech at the fair grounds. This, too, was entirely unpremeditated and in reply to a welcome and presentation speech from a farmer.

By all odds, the most colorful and picturesque gathering that he attended while in the State was a great conclave of 10,000 Indians at the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation on August 17, 1927. Without doubt it was the greatest gathering of Indians that has taken place in the United States in recent years. This celebrated event was organized and managed by Hon. Charles H. Burke, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in person. As my colleagues know, Mr. Burke represented South Dakota in this body for 14 years, during 6 years of which he was chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs. It is said by those who are in the best position to know that he knows more about Indians and their affairs than any other man in the United States. Be that as it may, the show at Pine Ridge was extremely well staged. The Indians were out in all their finery and paint. The pageants, marches, and dances were carried out with military precision and dignity. These over, the entire body of Indians suddenly surged forward as if to make an attack, but as suddenly stopped in front of the grand stand. It was an impressive spectacle that met the President's eyes when he rose to speak. Ten thousand bronzed faces were lifted in greeting and expectancy, and the attention of the crowd did not flag until the President's address was completed.

The speech itself shows knowledge and a fine appreciation of the Indian problem and that it may be available to the country, Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the unanimous consent of the House to extend my remarks and as a part of such extension to include therein the address made by the President of the United States. It covers only about two typewritten pages and will not encumber the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The address of Calvin Coolidge is as follows:

This is the first opportunity that has come to a President to speak especially to the Indians of American since the enactment of that epoch-making law which brought them all into a new relationship to the State and Federal Governments. It was with satisfaction that I approved that law generally known as the Indian citizenship act of June 2, 1924. This made all native-born American Indians citizens of the United States. It symbolized the consummation of what for many years has been the purpose of the Federal Government—to merge the Indians into the general citizenry and body politic of the Nation. It is true that prior to the enactment of this legislation nearly two-thirds of the Indians had become citizens through the several ways provided by law, but that does not detract from the real significance of the Indian citizenship act.

In 1871 Congress adopted a new policy in dealing with Indians and took what might be called the first step toward individualizing them, with a view of ultimately making them citizens. On March 3 of that year an act was approved which provided in part "that hereafter no Indian nation or tribe within the territory of the United States shall be acknowledged or recognized as an independent nation, tribe, or bureau, with whom the United States may contract by treaty."

The next forward step in this progress contemplating complete citizenship was the general allotment act, known as the Dawes Act, of February 8, 1887, which individualized Indian land ownership by authorizing allotments in severalty of the tribal lands to the members of the tribes. As a result of this and subsequent acts something more than 206,000 Indians have received allotments.

The result of this legislation has brought about a decided change in the administration of Indian affairs. The Government suddenly began to deal with Indians as individual men and women; the personal equation at once assumed its proper importance in the so-called Indian problem.

Candor compels the admission that prior to 1887 the Federal Government had not given much attention to what might be called the social-service activities in the administration of Indian affairs. The first boarding school provided for the education of Indian pupils was established at Carlisle, Pa., about 1879, but following the general allotment act almost immediately the Government began building many schools, ranging from the little rural day schools to the large reservation and nonreservation boarding schools, and education became a most important part of the Government's activities in the Indian neighborhoods. I am told that only a comparatively few years ago it was difficult to induce Indian parents to send their children to school, but that to-day the reverse is the rule and fathers and mothers of our Indian youth have come to realize the value of an education and the need of schooling for their children.

The Indian problem which has been a fruitful subject of controversy for many years began with the first meetings of the Caucasian and Red races. The obvious result of this conflict was armed hostilities between the races which began in the early days of the settlement of this country and ended within a short distance of this spot, for the battle of Wounded Knee, which occurred on this reservation in 1890, was the last event of enough importance to be listed by the War Department as an Indian campaign. Peace and understanding cooperation now reign everywhere. The Indian problem on its face appears to be one simply of effective social service, practical philanthropy, and education. As a matter of fact, it is a many-sided question, complicated by puzzling complexities. There are over 200 tribes and bands in the United States, each with its own name, tongue, history, traditions, code of ethics and customs, which have the effect of law with Indian tribes. It is a curious fact that most people in this country seem to believe that the Indians are a homogeneous people and can be dealt with as a unified race or nation. The exact contrary is the outstanding fact which has made the Indian problem a most difficult one.

To-day we find that the Indian people, recently primitive, not so very far from the hunter stage, are surrounded by twentieth century conditions which are alien to their racial characteristics, their tribal ways, and states of mind. While thousands of them have succeeded in adjusting themselves to the new order of things, a great portion of them, mostly the older ones, still cling to the old ways, stoically refusing to go further along the modern road. They wish to live and die according to the old traditional ways of the Indians, and they should be permitted to do so.

Many Indians are still in a primitive state, although strongly influenced by white contacts, and thousands are as civilized as their neighbors. On one hand, we find a considerable proportion are so little advanced that they can speak but few English words, while on the other hand we find tens of thousands who speak, read, and write the English language, and a large percentage of this class have had a grammar school education and many are graduates of high schools, colleges, and universities. A substantial number of Indians have attained high places in business, the learned professions, in the arts and sciences, and in politics.

Within recent years agriculture and stock raising have been gaining ground in the economic progress of the Indian people; but many of them are still unable at this time to take their places in the world as self-supporting farmers, mechanics, manufacturers, and skilled laborers.

There are some 370 treaties which have been made with the Indian tribes, many of which are still in effect. There are over 2,000 specific acts of Congress concerning Indians, besides a large number of State laws, court decisions, and departmental rules and regulations. All of this mass of legislation, decisions, rules, and regulations is complicated by the intrusion of the Indian's own tribal laws and customs and ways of doing things. The result ofttimes has been confusion, much trouble, and in too many cases injustice to the Indians.

These few citations should be sufficient to indicate the manifold complexities of the Nation's Indian problem and to convey the suggestion that its practical solution can not be effected by appeals to sentimentality, by loose talk, by ill-considered legislation, by hysterical campaigns, or by the insistence of those in charge of the administration of Indian affairs that their policies and methods are always the only right ones.

For the purpose of working out the Indian problem, Congress, on March 11, 1824, established the Indian Bureau, and under an act in 1832 created the office of Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Since 1849 it has been under the Department of the Interior. The Secretary of the Interior supervises it, and much that the commissioner does is subject to his approval.

Since the enactment of the general allotment law and the establishment of schools for Indian education there has been remarkable progress made in their advancement and development, and they are being trained and encouraged to become self-supporting, much is being done to provide proper care for the afflicted, hospitals have been established, more physicians and nurses employed, and much effort made to encourage them to live in better homes and observe the regulations that are necessary in the home to prevent disease.

Due to the discovery of minerals, and especially oil, many individual Indians have suddenly become wealthy, which adds to the responsibility of the department in having to safeguard their property and to protect them against an unscrupulous class who seek to impose upon them and to defraud them.

Changed conditions, the breaking up of reservations by allotting lands to individuals, and the sale of the surplus lands to settlers has produced a situation in many of the States having an Indian population that makes it one in which such States have a deep interest. There should, therefore, be close cooperation between the States and the Federal Government in the general care, education, health, and welfare of the Indians.

I realize that much of the progress that has been made by the Indians is due to the sacrifices of the early missionaries, and that the missionaries of to-day are important factors contributing much to their education and moral advancement, making it more possible for the Government to carry out the policy of making them all respected and self-supporting citizens.

More than 10,000 Indian young men served in the Army and 2,000 in the Navy during the World War, most of them by voluntary enlistment, and they proved to be courageous and rendered distinguished service. Among the many tribes who contributed to those who served in the World War, the Dakotas furnished their full share, and several made the supreme sacrifice. Others were recognized by being awarded the Croix de Guerre, or in some other direct way. In recognition of the service rendered by the Indians during the World War, I caused to be issued and signed certificates of honor, which were presented to the Indians of the several tribes.

Those of us who were present on the occasion of the burial of the Unknown Soldier in the National Cemetery across the river from Washington will not soon forget the closing act of the ceremony. A group of old Indian warriors, some of whom were Sioux, arranged themselves around the tomb, while one, acting for the whole Indian people, laid upon the bier his war bonnet. This was not an idle gesture; it symbolized the outstanding fact that the red men and their neighbors had been brought together as one people and that never again would there be hostility between the two races. As one of those old warriors said, "Who knows but that this Unknown Soldier was an Indian boy."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN]. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Mr. Chairman and fellow members of the committee, January, 1928, which after to-day will be in past history, has seen a great many unusual things transpire for the good of our Nation and for the good of mankind in general. I do not believe any month during the past 50 years has seen as many things for the understanding of our people as have obtained during the past 30 days. These things will mean so much for the better understanding of mankind and for the fellowship and the cementing of the ties of humanity.

Early in this month America's great ambassador of peace and good will headed his plane toward the south and winged on for a few hours, and brought the great southern countries of Mexico and Central America closer and nearer in understanding to their guardian, the United States. A few days after this we find the President of the United States going southward through the land of Florida. And, by the way, an editorial comment in the Gainesville Daily Sun said that he smiled, which was unusual for him. It is as follows:

Saw a picture of President Coolidge as he was touring the city of Miami. He was smiling! Florida sunshine certainly will work wonders.

He smiled when he was in Florida, and many of the newspapers carried his picture with this radiant smile that Florida brought from him.

In Jacksonville, Fla., and in Miami, Fla., and in Key West the President of the United States was entertained by a great southern State. Proud was Florida to have this visit and proud was the Southland to have its President in its midst.

A few days after this—I believe on the 17th of January—the Chief of Staff of the United States Army, Gen. Charles P. Summerall, went to his old home down in Florida, and there was declaimed by the citizens of Florida as their great native son. He was given a saber in recognition of Florida's good will toward Florida's government, the United States Government, and the Chief of Staff of the Army.

I believe the next day, on the 18th of January, the Chief of Staff of the United States Army, unmindful and forgetting all about differences and strife existing some 60 years ago, was in Lake City, Fla., and participated in the unveiling of a monument to 103 valiant and gallant Confederate soldiers, who fought for the cause they loved.

During this same month we find the said Chief of Staff attending the celebration of the birthday of the South's hero and the world's greatest exponent of military achievements, Robert E. Lee.

My friends, the South is proud that Florida's native son, Gen. Charles P. Summerall, is Chief of Staff.

Another great achievement has transpired which causes us to realize that America is strong for the entire 48 of her States. The great Democratic convention on the 12th of January, for the first time in years and years, since the great conflict, was sent south of the Mason and Dixon line. Houston, Tex., claims the next Democratic convention and a long precedent was thereby smashed. This was a great achievement for the fellowship of man in wiping out lines of dissension and bringing together the North and the South, the East and the West, when our own party, which is strong in the North and powerful in the South, sends its convention to Houston, a great Democratic city of the South.

Then, my friends, coincident with this achievement and great transpiration, we find the South offering at least two of her native sons to grace the White House for the next four years—HULL, of Tennessee, and GEORGE, of Georgia, and others who have received favorable comment throughout the United States as aspirants for the Presidency during the next term. And may I predict here, my friends, that in the course of the next few months you are going to hear the clarion call of Dixie sounding throughout 48 States, and you are liable to see ushered into the White House a Democratic native son of the Southland to redeem our nation from the scourge of a certain type of political individual who is prevalent in all parties in our land. [Applause.]

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWNE].

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak on the bill I have introduced (H. R. 10142), and I ask that the Clerk read the bill in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the bill in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10142) to create a special highway fund from the proceeds of the sale of surplus war material, highway equipment, and supplies to the Government of France

Be it enacted, etc., That the proceeds from the sale of surplus war material, highway equipment, and supplies to the Government of France amounting to $407,341,145.01, for which amount the Government of France has issued bonds to the United States, bearing 5 per cent interest, of the denominations as follows, to wit: $400,000,000 due August 1, 1929, $6,566,762.42 due May 9, 1930, $774,382.59 due July 5, 1930, is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the United States Department of Agriculture for the construction and improvement of rural post roads and bridges, as provided for in the Federal aid road act approved July 11, 1916, and acts amendatory thereto, and as hereinafter provided in this bill.

SEC. 2. That 90 per cent of said fund shall be apportioned by the Secretary of Agriculture to the highway departments of the several States as provided in the Federal aid road act of July 11, 1916, and acts amendatory thereto.

SEC. 3. The remaining 10 per cent of said fund shall be used by the Secretary of Agriculture as follows: One-half for roads within the national forests; one-half for boulevards within the regional area of the National Capital, as defined by the National Capital Park Planning Commission.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to enter into cooperative agreement with the highway departments of the several States for the construction of highways with the funds appropriated in this act and is hereby exempt from the limitations imposed by the said Federal aid road act and amendments thereto, as to the cost per mile for constructing said highways, or as to the per cent of all Federal aid allotted to any State to be expended upon primary or interstate or State trunk highways and also as to the per cent of cost of such projects to be borne by the Federal Government. In no case shall any State be required to contribute more than 20 per cent of the cost of any highway constructed with moneys appropriated in this act, and no highway shall be so constructed except those included in the primary or interstate system, or State trunk highways, and all such highways shall be of durable, hard-surfaced type.

SEC. 5. This act is not intended to repeal any provision of the Federal aid road act unless such provision is in direct conflict therewith.

SEC. 6. If any provision of this act shall be held to be invalid such invalid provision shall not affect the validity of any other provision of this act which can be given effect.

SEC. 7. That this act shall take effect upon its passage.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Chairman, I arise to support the bill (H. R. 10142) to create a special highway fund from the proceeds of the sale of surplus war material, highway equipment, and supplies to the Government of France.

Ten years of Federal aid for roads has convinced the most skeptical of the public that the money appropriated by Congress for the improvement of our highways was thoroughly justified. I do not believe that any other appropriation for internal improvements has ever benefited so many of our people or has caused so much happiness as the appropriation for the improvement of our highways.

The question asked is not should the Federal Government continue to assist in building interstate roads, but why does it not give more assistance, and why did it not continue the good work of Federal aid for roads begun by Washington and Jefferson over 100 years ago.

The 23,000,000 owners of automobiles, which means practically every family in the United States, are urging that road building be hastened in order to keep pace with the increased traffic demands.

Automobile vehicles have increased from 1916, when Congress passed the Federal aid road act, from three and one-half million to over 23,000,000 and are valued to-day at the stupendous sum of $14,000,000,000. These auto vehicles are almost 100 per cent perfect and are being operated upon highways which are not 25 per cent efficient.

It is estimated that the increased wear and tear on the 23,000,000 auto vehicles by reason of the imperfect roads over which they are being operated amounts annually to from six to seven hundred million dollars.

The question of whether the Federal Government is contributing its share to the building of interstate roads is also frequently asked. I desire to discuss this question and other questions related to it, and also the source from which we propose to get the money authorized to be appropriated in this bill.

MONEY RECEIVED FROM SALE OF SURPLUS WAR MATERIAL RIGHTFULLY BELONGS TO ROAD FUND

February 28, 1919, Congress passed a law directing the Secretary of War to transfer to the Secretary of Agriculture all war material, equipment, and supplies declared surplus, to be distributed among the States as a highway fund under the Federal aid act. At the close of the war the United States had surplus war supplies and road equipment in France estimated at fully $2,000,000,000. Before the order for the return of the surplus war material, equipment, and supplies then in France had reached France negotiations had been made by our representatives in France for the sale of the property to France at approximately 20 cents on the dollar. As this surplus war material was sold the Government of France issued its bonds to the United States for the same as follows:

August 1, 1919, $400,000,000, due August 1, 1929. On May 9, 1920, $6,566,762.42. July 5, 1920, $774,382.59, due July 5, 1930. These bonds aggregate $407,341,145.01 and bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum and are in the Treasury of the United States and payable semiannually. France is paying interest upon these bonds currently.

Congress by its action, February 28, 1919, had given the surplus war material to the Agricultural Department to be distributed among the States for the building of roads. These bonds therefore rightfully belong to the several States to aid them in the construction of their roads.

It is the intention of the Debt Settlement Commission to place these bonds with the indebtedness of France to the United States contracted prior to our going into the war, which aggregates considerably over $3,000,000,000, and accept obligations extending over a period of 62 years, with no interest until 1930 and then 1 per cent interest until 1940 and 2 per cent from 1940 to 1950 and graduated until the same bears 3½ per cent interest.

I maintain that the indebtedness for war material sold to France for which she gave the United States bonds for $407,000,000 has an entirely different status from the $3,000,000,000 indebtedness which was loaned France during the period she was in war. I also maintain that the bonds issued for surplus war supplies rightfully belongs to the highway fund.

DOES THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT PAY ITS SHARE TOWARD THE CONSTRUCTION OF ROADS?

It should be remembered that Federal aid is only given for a system of roads embracing 7 per cent of the total road mileage of any State, the remainder, or 93 per cent, of the roads have to be constructed and maintained by the States and the subdivisions of the State.

In order to obtain Federal aid for roads the States are required to raise a large amount of money, and the States in return have called upon the counties and smaller subdivisions of the State to contribute. In this way the States have raised a much larger amount of money than they have received from the Federal Government, besides being obliged to maintain roads which serve the entire Nation. This heavy tax burden upon the farmer has helped to make farming unprofitable. The farmer is the victim of excessive taxes. The farmer's taxes the last 10 years have increased over 30 per cent more than the taxes of the man living in the city or village. We believe as a matter of justice that the appropriation asked for in this bill should be distributed by the Secretary of Agriculture under the present Federal aid act and the States should not be required to pay to exceed 20 per cent of the cost of the roads built with the moneys received from this fund. This bill provides that the money received shall be expended upon primary or interstate or State trunk highways and shall be durable roads.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE. I will.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think that this sum is any more of an obligation to pay than was the $3,000,000,000 borrowed by France during the war?

Mr. BROWNE. I think they are both moral obligations. But France bought the surplus war material at a very low rate, sold a great deal of it, sent some to New Orleans and other cities, and sold it at a good profit, and therefore she has practically received the value of it in money which is in her hands to-day.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Has the gentleman any idea that the French Government will pay the $400,000,000 of these bonds?

Mr. BROWNE. I have no doubt about it. They carry 5 per cent interest and we can negotiate the bonds any time. They are perfectly good.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE. I will.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. If I understand the gentleman, his bill proposes to use the $407,000,000 that we were to receive for the sale of surplus war materials sold France in 1919 to be paid in 10 years. What assurance has the gentleman that any part of that money will be paid or will be available for any purpose in this country?

Mr. BROWNE. The French Government has given its bonds, and the bonds are in the Treasury Department to-day bearing 5 per cent interest. They are negotiable. The French Government has paid the interest semi-annually when the interest has become due. They have never questioned them, and in fact have stated publicly that they expect to pay them. They differentiate between these bonds and the money we loaned them prior to going into the war.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. What does the gentleman think of the ability of the French Government to pay this large sum of money in a little over a year?

Mr. BROWNE. I think perhaps it would be a hardship to pay that amount in so short a time, but I think they can be refunded and given a reasonable time and that the bonds would be negotiable, the Government simply underwriting them, there would be a ready sale for them, and we could raise money for the building of roads as we need it.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ARENTZ. Does the gentleman increase the 7 per cent primary roads in his bill or how does he cover that?

Mr. BROWNE. I leave the road system as it is. We have not completed the 7 per cent, only about one-fifth of the system has been completed in 10 years, and it will take nearly 30 years at the rate the Federal Government is now appropriating the money for the roads. It will take between 25 and 30 years.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I wish to take issue with the gentleman on that; we have graded, drained, and surfaced 130,000 miles, and there are only about 200,000 miles in that proposed system. We are building at the rate of about 10,000 miles a year.

Mr. BROWNE. I have the figures from the highway department which I think will satisfy the gentleman, and I will put them in the RECORD.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I have just been in a hearing where they have submitted these figures.

Mr. ARENTZ. It will depend on what States you are talking about.

Mr. BROWNE. I suppose that in the smaller States they may be building faster than in the larger States. Take the State of New York, and very few other States have not yet nearly come within the 7 per cent. It is within the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture to increase the road system in any State to more than 7 per cent of the total miles of highway.

Mr. ARENTZ. The Secretary of Agriculture can increase the 7 per cent?

Mr. BROWNE. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. Only on primary roads. If you want to connect the East and West with the North and South, you can not do it under the present legislation.

Mr. BROWNE. A gravel road may be treated as a primary road. They do not designate primary roads as running north and south or east and west.

Mr. ARENTZ. They take the total mileage. If you want to connect up the primary and secondary roads so as to permit them to come in, you can not do it under the present legislation.

By increasing it to 8 per cent in many of the Western States you could complete these roads that connect the primary and the secondary roads.

Mr. BROWNE. If you have not gotten your full per cent of the roads, you can improve your country trunks until you make them practically secondary roads, and get Government aid, if they are main-traveled roads. The highway department is constantly taking roads that have not been regarded as primary roads but as secondary roads and making them primary roads. A part of a road may be primary and a part in the secondary class.

Mr. ARENTZ. Something has been said several times here in respect to the income derived from the automobile sales tax, that it is just about sufficient to cover the appropriations necessary to cover the expense of building the State-Federal highways.

Mr. BROWNE. I can tell the gentleman exactly about that. We appropriated for roads since 1916 something a little over $600,000,000. We have not expended quite all of it. We have received from the sales tax on automobiles a little over a billion dollars, and if we put that on the roads, if you call that a road fund, then the amount of money received from the automobile tax will be something like $417,000,000 more than we have ever appropriated for roads. If that fund was applied to roads, we would have more than enough to meet the appropriation asked for in this bill.

Mr. ARENTZ. And if it had not been for the far-sighted policy of Congress in establishing this Federal aid to highways, does the gentleman imagine that the great increase in the production of automobiles since 1916 would have taken place?

Mr. BROWNE. Certainly not.

Mr. ARENTZ. So that we have an ever-increasing mileage of roads and an ever-increasing production of automobiles.

Mr. BROWNE. Certainly.

Mr. ARENTZ. And an ever-increasing wideness of travel on the part of those automobiles over foreign roads, so far as the automobiles themselves are concerned.

Mr. BROWNE. Yes. The automobile industry ranks, I think, first or among the very first in the employment of men and the amount it pays out for wages. It certainly is not a tax dodger. It pays not only the personal-property tax in each State, but it also pays a tonnage tax in the form of a license fee in the States, and a gasoline tax, and then it has been paying a sales tax, so that it has been taxed more than any industry, and yet there has been more competition in the automobile business than almost any business, and the public has had the advantage of it and has been able to get automobiles at a very low price.

Mr. ARENTZ. I read a statement that, counting each automobile as 20 feet, there were 6,000 miles of automobiles constructed in the United States last year.

Mr. BROWNE. I think that is probably correct.

Mr. ARENTZ. That gives one some idea of the tremendous importance of the road-building program of the Federal Government.

Mr. BROWNE. I agree with you; but the trouble is to-day that the Federal Government has not appropriated nearly as much as the States and the local units. Federal aid has been a great encouragement to road building. All the localities had complied with the law to get this Federal aid. It has been a splendid incentive, but to meet the Federal requirements the States and the smaller units of the States have taxed themselves so much that it is one of the causes, I think, of the depression of the farmer to-day. Of course, conditions have greatly changed since 1916. Then there were only about three and one-half million automobiles and now there are 23,000,000 automobiles, and the situation has changed so that it is more of a national problem than when we passed the Federal aid law, and the maintenance of the roads, which falls entirely upon the States, is a tremendous burden and is going to become a greater burden every year. I think the State should maintain the roads, but I think that the Federal Government should contribute more than it has contributed toward building these great interstate highways and trunk lines.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Over what period of years would the gentleman spend this $400,000,000 that he would have appropriated?

Mr. BROWNE. I would expend it just as fast as the States could absorb it in using it efficiently. Practically all of the States have efficient highway departments, and if I had my way I would not have the States pay more than a very small amount toward getting their share of the amount asked for in this bill. In this bill I propose not to exceed 20 per cent as the share the States shall be required to raise. That would be the largest amount that the Agricultural Department could cause the States to pay.

Mr. HASTINGS. In other words, from this fund that the gentleman would create the Federal Government would pay 80 per cent and the States 20 per cent?

Mr. BROWNE. Yes. That would be the most that the States would pay.

Mr. HASTINGS. This is something more than $400,000,000 which the French Government owes our Government for supplies of various kinds purchased just after the war?

Mr. BROWNE. They bought those supplies right after the armistice. They were invoiced at about $2,000,000,000, and we got from them these bonds amounting to $407,000,000.

Mr. HASTINGS. What interest do those bonds bear?

Mr. BROWNE. Five per cent.

Mr. HASTINGS. Has the French Government been paying that interest?

Mr. BROWNE. It has paid the interest promptly semi-annually.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then it is the gentleman's idea that we use the interest on those bonds until the principal becomes due?

Mr. BROWNE. The bonds are all due in 1930, and it would be a matter of financing. The Government could easily take these bonds which the French Government has not shown any disposition to repudiate and could rewrite them and put in a longer time for payment and negotiate them—underwrite them—so that they would be available for money just as fast as the highway department wanted to use them. My point is that we are going too slow. Under this system of improving only 7 per cent of our highways, the appropriations that we are receiving from the Federal Government with the States doing all they can, and also the local units—we are not going to complete 7 per cent of the highways for 25 or 30 years, and during that time we are going to wear out our rolling stock, those 23,000,000 automobiles, on poor roads; the increased wear and tear on automobiles, because of the poor roads, amounts to something like $600,000,000 a year more than if the roads were more perfect.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman does not anticipate any difficulty in collecting this sum of more than $400,000,000 from France in 1930? That is a little more than two years from now.

Mr. BROWNE. I say that the Government of the United States can refund these bonds and take bonds of longer terms and reduce the rate of interest and then underwrite them so that we can negotiate them when we need the money for constructing our roads.

Mr. HASTINGS. Of course, the gentleman has a basis for his expectation for the recovery of the money from France on the indebtedness that she owes.

Mr. BROWNE. This is one of the kinds of indebtedness the French have already recognized, and we have the bonds in the Treasury Department. The other indebtedness amounting to over $3,000,000,000 they do not concede, and it is a matter that they have always had some controversy over, but never in any of their statements have they tried to question the bonds issued for war supplies for which they got more than the bonds they gave us. I am informed that a great many of these war supplies and much of this equipment were sold in the United States.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does the gentleman think there is any difference in the deadness of those claims?

Mr. BROWNE. Well, if you had two claims against a man and he did not deny one of them, and he had given you his note for it, and the other was simply a book account and you were going to buy one of those accounts, you would buy the one for which he had given his promissory note.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman understands the difference between the two characters of obligation, does he not?

Mr. BROWNE. There may not be any moral difference, but if you negotiated both kinds of indebtedness the bonds themselves would sell at par and the others would be taken at a considerable discount.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BROWNE. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. In one case we loaned money to France as a loan and in the other we turned over to France certain supplies, and France turned around and sold them to her citizens and to our citizens and issued bonds and got the money for them. That is a big difference.

Mr. BROWNE. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. It seems to me that the other obligation is the greater one. If France was in great distress and we came to her relief with money that she needed, when she had her back against the wall, I think the first obligation was greater than those contracts for the purchase of supplies since the war. I do not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. BROWNE. I am not taking any particular side on the debt settlement. That is a controversy we may or may not agree upon, but I am discussing these bonds that we have got in the Treasury Department which France does not dispute at all, $407,000,000.

Mr. HASTINGS. France does not dispute the other amount?

Mr. BROWNE. When we gave her a splendid agreement here, so magnanimous indeed that many Members did not vote for it—and I did not vote for it—she did not accept.

Mr. HASTINGS. Neither did I——

Mr. BROWNE. It passed, however, and they did not accept it, but it does not have any particular bearing on these bonds which we now hold against France and which she does not dispute. France has purchased our war supplies and road materials, the largest amount of road equipment and materials that was ever assembled. She sold this road equipment that invoiced over $2,000,000,000 after we had passed a law, as I stated, turning over all of that equipment to the Agriculture Department for roads. We claim, therefore, that the money received for this road equipment should be used to build roads and should go to the States. I do not think the States should be held up or compelled to pay to exceed 20 per cent in order to get this money. I think it ought to be used on interstate primary roads and State trunks.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am an enthusiastic supporter of the good-roads movement, as much so as any other Member of the House. My inquiry was asked in good faith as to whether or not the gentleman thought this money would be available for that purpose.

Mr. BROWNE. I think it will. I have looked the matter up very thoroughly. I do not think there is any question but that if that road equipment had been turned over to the Department of Agriculture at the time we passed the law, instead of being sold to France, our system of improved roads would be much better than it is to-day.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. What would be the basis of apportionment of that $407,000,000?

Mr. BROWNE. One-third apportioned according to the area of the State and one-third according to the population, and one-third according to the rural routes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. One-third to the post routes.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield, there?

Mr. BROWNE. Yes.

Mr. ALMON. I am very much interested in the gentleman's discussion. He has been a member of the Committee on Roads for a number of years until recently and he helped to write the legislation that came from that committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. BROWNE. May I have 10 minutes more?

Mr. BARBOUR. The gentleman has run eight minutes over the time allotted to him.

Mr. BROWNE. A good many questions have been asked and I would like to get the matter cleared up.

Mr. BARBOUR. I can yield to the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. BROWNE. The 7 per cent of roads upon which the Federal Government gives aid aggregated 200,353 miles. In the 10 years of Federal aid, with the contributions of States and local units only 56,017 miles have been completed, and 144,336 miles remain unimproved. I get that from the Bureau of Roads. At this rate it will take us from 25 to 30 years to complete the system, and in the meantime the increased wear and tear on automobiles because of our incomplete and poorly constructed system of highways will cost us in the extra wear and tear on automobiles, it is estimated, at the rate of $600,000,000 a year.

INTERSTATE ROADS A NATIONAL MATTER

Before the invention of the automobile when traffic moved slowly over our highways in horse-drawn vehicles the improvement of highways might have been considered of only local concern. The invention of the automobile revolutionized transportation over our highways. The situation has changed very greatly since the Federal aid road law was passed in 1916. Besides the 3,000,000 trucks and the 20,000,000 automobiles which are traveling over the highways there are 80,000 busses, 7,284 of which are interstate busses. There are 32,788 busses which are carrying school children. Sixty steam railroads are using busses as feeders for their railroads. Fifteen million four hundred and eighty-nine thousand motorists from all the States of the Union visited the national forests in 1926, a million and one-half more than the preceding year.

The State highway engineer of Wisconsin informed me the other day that an accurate record of the number of cars with out-of-State licenses coming into the State of Wisconsin had been kept, and the number of people these cars brought into the State in a hundred days during the summer season, and that over 4,000,000 people from out of the State had come into Wisconsin by automobiles during that time.

MAINTENANCE OF HIGHWAYS BY THE STATE

In determining what portion of the cost of interstate highways should be paid by the States and the Federal Government, we should consider first, that under the Federal aid road act the burden of maintaining these roads is borne wholly by the States. No road made is so perfect that it does not require constant attention and maintenance. Roads have to be constantly patrolled and in the wintertime in the Northern States, snow removal is a heavy burden, in some States amounting to over a million dollars per year. These burdens fall entirely upon the States and local units. The heavy traffic of trucks on interstate business and the millions of automobiles that come into each State from other States all increase the burden of the State in maintaining the highways.

The Federal aid goes to the improvement of only 7 per cent of the roads. The remaining 93 per cent which means over 2,000,000 miles of roads is constructed and maintained without a penny of Federal aid. These roads are used very much more than they were before the automobile came into such general use and the localities are obliged to keep them in much better repair than formerly to avoid accidents by travelers from their own State and other States, which places an additional burden upon the counties and the smaller units under the counties. Take, for example, the county trunk roads many of which are used almost as much as the Federal trunk lines in their locality receive no Federal aid. In Wisconsin in 1927 approximately $40,000,000 was expended for highway purposes. Of this amount the State paid $14,711,000, the counties and local units approximately $24,000,000, while Federal aid only amounted to $1,870,000. Similar figures could undoubtedly be procured from other States.

STATES AND LOCALITIES CONSTRUCT THE ROADS

When the Federal Government in 1916 appropriated money for Federal aid to roads it found over 95 per cent of the roads upon which Federal money applied laid out and many of them graded. The localities have already performed the major part in building these interstate trunk lines, and it is only fair that this fund which is now available from the bonds given by the French Government for the sale of surplus road material and war supplies, and which Congress by legislation appropriated to the Department of Agriculture for roads, be now given to the States for improvement of their roads, and that the States be not required to contribute to exceed 20 per cent of the amount they receive.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS HAVE IN THE PAST BEEN LOCAL

The Federal Government has appropriated hundreds of millions of dollars for harbors which have helped the localities where the improvements were made. It has also appropriated hundreds of millions of dollars for the improvement of rivers which has helped certain localities. These internal improvements have, of course, indirectly helped all the localities and all the people. Federal aid for roads is the first internal improvement which has directly helped every locality in the United States. Thousands of localities which have never received a penny from the Federal Government, not even a small post-office building, have contributed their share toward the improvement of rivers and harbors. Is it not fair at this time for the Federal Government to appropriate money for a great internal improvement like the building of highways which all of the people of the United States use and help to wear out, and over which 23,000,000 automobile vehicles are constantly driven and the Government mail carriers travel and the interstate trucks constantly use?

FEDERAL AID TO RAILROADS

The Government at an early date recognized the benefits of efficient transportation. July 1, 1862, an act was passed by Congress granting the Central Pacific and the Union Pacific corporations vast tracts of public land, more than enough for their building the roads.

Later the Northern Pacific by a single act of Congress was granted 47,000,000 acres of land for the building of its road, and the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad was granted 42,000,000 acres.

I am not criticizing these grants of land—both political parties favored it—but I do maintain that there is more justification in the Federal Government appropriating money to build highways over which all the people have an equal right to travel without paying toll or tribute to private corporations.

Our extensive railroad systems helped to build up the localities and greatly hastened the development of the country. With the invention of the locomotive and steamboat the Federal Government directed its attention to assisting the railroads and dredging rivers and harbors to assist navigation. Federal road building ceased. There were no Federal roads constructed or Federal aid to roads given between 1812 and 1916, with the exception of less than $100,000 in appropriation between 1812 and 1838, a period of over 100 years. During this 100 years the rural localities have had to shoulder the full burden of building and maintaining millions of miles of road.

ROAD IMPROVEMENT SHOULD BE HASTENED

The 7 per cent of the roads upon which the Federal Government gives aid aggregates 200,353 miles. In the 10 years of Federal Aid with the contributions of States and local units of the State only 69,536 miles have been completed and 141,027 miles of the system remains unimproved. At this rate it will take us over 20 years to complete this system, and in the meantime the increased wear and tear on auto vehicles because of our incompleted system of highways will go on at the rate of over $600,000,000 a year.

ROLLING STOCK

The phenominal increase of automobiles in the last 10 years is amazing. In 1917 there were 4,500,000 automobiles. In 1927 over 20,000,000 automobiles. In 1917 we had 326,000 trucks, and in 1927 we had 2,943,898 trucks.

Roads have not kept pace with rolling stock. Our highways are inadequate to meet the demands of traffic. The scientific building of roads should have been continued by the Federal Government from the time when it began building its roads in Washington and Jefferson's administration. It is a belated movement 100 years overdue. Roads must be built faster. The rolling stock, consisting of over 20,000,000 automobiles and 3,000,000 trucks, are almost 100 per cent perfect, while the roads they move over are not 25 per cent perfect.

At $600 per motor vehicle there are approximately $14,000,000 invested in these 23,000,000 automobiles and trucks. The increased wear and tear and depreciation of automobiles per year at $30 per motor vehicle would amount to $690,000,000 a year more than if operated over better roads.

Every railroad system considers it good business to keep its road bed as perfect as its rolling stock, and spends hundreds of millions of dollars improving its road beds, and considers this a very good investment. Why is it not a good investment for the Government? The poor road tax is the heaviest tax the people are paying to-day.

THE ROLLING STOCK HAS BEEN UNJUSTLY TAXED

The Government, as a war measure, in 1918 placed an excise or sales tax on automobiles of 5 per cent, also a tax on accessories. This, in 1926, was reduced to 3 per cent. From 1918 to 1927, the automobiles and accessories have paid a Federal excise or sales tax of $1,081,845,555. The automobile has paid its local personal-property tax. It has paid its State tax for registration. It has paid a tax on the gas it consumed, besides paying the heavy Federal or excise or sales tax. The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, in his remarks before the Ways and Means Committee, recommended the retention of the excise tax on automobiles to pay the Federal Government's share in the improvement of roads, thus recognizing that the amount of the Federal tax on the sale of automobiles should go toward the improvement of the roads. If this is the policy of the Government, then the Government owes the good-road fund the difference between the amount it has appropriated for good roads from 1916 to the present time, amounting to $662,220,000, and the amount of excise tax the automobile has paid, $1,081,846,555, or a difference of $419,646,555, which is now due the road fund from the tax on the automobile.

This is more than is asked for in this bill. Every user of an automobile in America, which means every home in America, has contributed to the sales tax on automobiles, which, as I have stated, amounts to over $419,000,000 more than the Federal Government has appropriated for roads. Is there any reason why this amount should not be remitted to those who contributed by using this money for road improvement which every contributor will have the benefit of?

AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY PAYS A HEAVY TAX

The motor vehicle taxes in 1926 were as follows:

Personal property tax	$125,000,000
Special motor tax	587,000,000

The automobile industry employs directly in its business 3,365,281 men.

It has not had a monopoly, but, on the contrary, there has been greater competition in this industry than any industry of any near-like magnitude. The people have been able to purchase automobiles at the very lowest possible cost.

I will offer as a part of my remarks some tables prepared for me by the Bureau of Roads and other documents proving the statements I have made. [Applause.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE UNDERSECRETARY,
Washington, January 9, 1928.

Hon. EDWARD E. BROWNE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: For the Secretary I acknowledge receipt of your letter of January 6, 1928, requesting information concerning the obligations given by France in connection with the purchase of surplus war material after the close of the war.

There are set out below the date, maturity, and amount of obligations taken by the Secretary of War in connection with the sale on credit to France of surplus war material:

Date	Maturity	Principal amount
Aug. 1, 1919	Aug. 1, 1929	$400,000,000.00
May 9, 1920	May 9, 1930	6,566,762.42
July 5, 1920	July 5, 1930	774,382.59
Total		407,341,145.01

The obligations bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, payable semiannually, and France has been paying the interest thereon currently. The amounts of the obligations are included in the funding agreement concluded April 30, 1926. This agreement has not as yet been ratified by the legislative powers of France and the United States, and for that reason no payments are being made under that agreement. France is, however, continuing to carry out the terms of the obligations above set forth by paying the interest as it falls due in accordance with the terms of such obligations.

Very truly yours,

OGDEN L. MILLS,
Undersecretary of the Treasury.

LAW REGARDING SALE OF SURPLUS WAR MATERIAL

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to transfer to the Secretary of Agriculture, upon his request, all war material, equipment, and supplies now or hereafter declared surplus from stock now on hand and not needed for the purposes of the War Department but suitable for use in the improvement of highways, and that the same shall be distributed among the highway departments of the several States, to be used in the construction, reconstruction, and maintenance of highways, such distribution to be upon the same basis as that hereinafter provided for in this act in the distribution of Federal-aid fund: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture, in his discretion, may reserve from such distribution not to exceed 10 per cent of such material, equipment, and supplies for use in the construction, reconstruction, and maintenance of national-forest roads or other roads constructed, reconstructed, or maintained under his direct supervision.

SEC. 6. That in approving projects to receive Federal aid under the provisions of this act the Secretary of Agriculture shall give preference to such projects as will expedite the completion of an adequate and connected system of highways, interstate in character.

Before any projects are approved in any State, such State, through its State highway department, shall select or designate a system of highways not to exceed 7 per cent of the total highway mileage of such State as shown by the records of the State highway department at the time of the passage of this act.

Upon this system all Federal-aid apportionments shall be expended.

Highways which may receive Federal aid shall be divided into two classes, one of which shall be known as primary or interstate highways, and shall not exceed three-sevenths of the total mileage which may receive Federal aid, and the other, which shall connect or correlate therewith and be known as secondary or intercounty highways, and shall consist of the remainder of the mileage which may receive Federal aid.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SELVIG].

Mr. SELVIG. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a few remarks with reference to H. R. 7940.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a few remarks with reference to H. R. 7940. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. SELVIG. On the farm-relief question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SELVIG. Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, it is encouraging to note that the press of the country is keenly interested in the hearings that are now being held by the great Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives. One of the most important problems before the country to-day is being considered by that committee. In the right solution of that problem lies not only the destiny of the nearly thirty millions of people who live in our rural communities but to a large extent our future policy as a nation.

The hearings center on whether or not the equalization fee principle is to remain in the bill that will finally be reported out. It is not a question of passing a farm relief bill any longer. It is no longer necessary for those who are familiar with the problems of the farmer to argue and to urge that something must be done.

That day has passed. For eight long years the farmer has labored at a serious disadvantage. Minor improvements here and there, due to seasonal differences in this country or in the agricultural production in foreign lands, have furnished temporary respite, but no outstanding improvement has come.

This fact is universally recognized. Members on both sides of the aisle urge the enactment of a real, an effective farm bill. Friends of the farmer—and I do not use that term in a narrow sense; I wish to include all serious students of our economic structure—proclaim that agriculture must be placed on a parity with industry, labor, and transportation in so far as our national policy is concerned.

That is the problem the House Committee on Agriculture is grappling with.

The equalization fee is a necessary part of the legislation needed to enable the farmers to form a 100 per cent pool in marketing their products. All the producers of a commodity will participate in the plan which the bill directs the Federal farm board to set up, not 80 per cent or 60 per cent of the commodity, permitting producers of the remaining 20 per cent or 40 per cent to reap all the benefits and pay none of the costs, as is the common experience in many cooperative marketing enterprises in this country to-day, but 100 per cent, thereby giving the Federal farm board the full opportunity of handling the surplus not required for domestic consumption.

There is nothing radical nor revolutionary involved. No existing institution is to be destroyed. Price stabilization only is to be effected. The farmer will receive in the ordinary, everyday markets of the land a domestic price on the part of his products consumed in this country, less the loss per unit resulting from the sale of the surplus elsewhere.

By means of the equalization fee all producers recognized as being members of a 100 per cent commodity pool by the Federal farm marketing board will pay their pro rata share. No Government subsidy is required. Governmental authority is needed and the use of a revolving fund. Outside of that, the Government assumes no risk and takes no financial responsibility.

The farmers in my section of the country are familiar with this proposal. It has been discussed from every angle. Throughout the Northwest there is this one dominant idea: Retain the equalization fee; try out this plan; we believe that it will work; no Government subsidy is wanted; pass the McNary-Haugen bill with the equalization fee included.

This is the message that comes thundering down from the prairies of the greatest food-producing area in the world.

Let no one mistake the meaning of this message.

A real, an effective farm relief bill is demanded.

The following editorial, which appeared recently in the St. Paul Pioneer Press-Dispatch, cites the interest of the bankers in the great State of Illinois in this bill and in the absolutely essential equalization fee:

POLITICS OR FARM RELIEF?

News about farm relief from Washington contrasts with that from Illinois. In Washington politicians are trying to maneuver the McNary-Haugen bill into a pocket. In Illinois the State Bankers' Association, with 1,700 members, has unanimously approved the McNary-Haugen bill.

The Illinois Bankers' Association has taken this step not only because it is willing for this form of legislation to be tried on its merits but also, no doubt, because a purely negative policy is not longer consistent with a desire to reach a solution of the agricultural problem. In spite of discussion and agitation for nearly eight years, no general farm legislation has been enacted by Congress. Indeed, among all plans which promise important results the McNary-Haugen is the only one which has found strong support. The McNary-Haugen bill, for all practical purposes, is the only measure of farm relief before the country. Because opponents of the bill have failed to develop anything that meets the two fundamental conditions of economic and political feasibility, farm relief at this moment is practically a matter of the McNary-Haugen bill or nothing.

Many persons have expressed sincere doubts over the McNary-Haugen bill. Individual members of the Illinois Bankers' Association presumably shared them, or their indorsement would not have been this long delayed. The exponents of the McNary-Haugen bill, many of them in high standing in business and economics, can reasonably expect that these doubts be resolved in their favor. The plan as it stands is the result of years of refinement and perfection under critical analysis. It is admittedly not perfect, but what great economic innovation ever was? "If the present bill does not grant relief," says an officer of the Illinois Bankers' Association, "it can be amended later to include provisions which will."

The obstruction of a few influential leaders may relegate farm relief to the discard once more at Washington, but the country as a whole will be found in agreement with the Illinois bankers.

February bids fair to be an eventful month for the farmers of this Nation. Their eyes are turned on their elected representatives. Before the ides of March the farm relief bill's fate will have been determined. It rests with the Members of this House to solve this problem, which, with flood relief for those in distress in the great Mississippi Basin and with the urgent necessity of increasing the tariff on competitive agricultural products, involves the welfare of millions of our people.

I confidently believe these problems will be solved in a manner worthy of the best traditions of statesmanship in the glorious history of our beloved country.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN]. [Applause.]

Mr. MCKEOWN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, there was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations on yesterday a resolution which, in my judgment, is the most forward-looking resolution ever proposed in the Congress. It is a resolution looking forward to an embargo upon the sale of war materials and war machines as well as arms and munitions during wars between other countries.

Gentlemen, when I first ran for Congress, I ran on a written platform. In that written platform I said I would support legislation which would prevent the makers of munitions and arms from receiving any profits upon the sale of munitions and arms to belligerent nations in time of war as one of the remedies for reducing the probability of war.

We are hearing a lot of war talk from a lot of junkers throughout the United States; men who believe they can scare up a war whenever trade gets low in munitions and arms. While they are doing this the peoples of all countries—at least, right-thinking people—are hoping for world peace.

There must of necessity be some armed forces in every country. But I, for one, am opposed to this policy of competition in arms and the competitive building of big navies. I think that no better thing could be done by the Congress of the United States than to train our young men in the Navy in such a way that they could successfully operate the merchant marine instead of increasing our number of small-pay officers. I would have them trained to carry on our commerce in times of peace. [Applause.] The world is tired of war. Because the quota of Army and naval officers is so crowded we have no place to put our graduates of the military and naval school. We ought to make some arrangement by which we will train private citizens who want military training and put the graduates of the Naval Academy at Annapolis into the merchant marine.

This bill now under consideration carries $400,000,000, in round figures, for the maintenance of the Army. The newspapers of the world, if they wanted to do so, could bring about peace throughout the world, because they are the most potent factors in molding public sentiment and the public mind throughout the world.

Away back in 1874, when the English people had neglected their great citizen, Mr. Livingstone, who had penetrated into the wilds of Africa, the New York Herald, one of the foremost papers of the country at that time, took up the matter and financed the expedition of Henry Stanley into darkest Africa, which brought about the civilization that now exists there. It was through the influence of the New York Herald that slavery was finally driven out of Africa. Why? Because it had a great influence, and the papers of England joined with that paper. If the great metropolitan press would honestly take a stand to have peace in the world and quit printing this junker stuff, peace could be brought about. Many of these junkers have no other purpose in talking this stuff than to get publicity and in order to get a big write up in some military paper or magazine. Some of our officers are putting forth stories about war in order to excite the fears of the people, and a lot of this is done for propaganda purposes in order to scare Congress and hurry Congress in the making of unlimited appropriations for the Army and the Navy.

Look where you are drifting to in this country. Some two or three or four years ago I said on the floor of this House, when there was a bill here to build airplane carriers, that they wanted these airplane carriers for the purpose of increasing the number of airplanes. I said they wanted them for the purpose of coming into Congress later and saying, "We now have the airplane carriers and we must have 1,000 airplanes apiece to put upon them, because it will not do to have airplane carriers without the airplanes." Of course, everybody knew what was coming, and it has come about.

Look how the appropriations for the Army and Navy have piled up. After the Army gets through then the Navy comes in and asks for a large amount of money, and the amounts now asked are indeed very high. I am not criticizing the men in Congress who have to present this legislation. They do the very best they can; and I will say it is to the credit of this subcommittee that it has brought in a bill that is $500,000 less than the estimates of the Budget. They have been able to allocate the money in such a way as to bring in the bill in that reduced amount. But the thing I am complaining about is this constant talk about war. Some of our boys are on foreign soil now engaged in conflict. I believe in the Monroe doctrine; but I have never been able to understand how the Monroe doctrine could be twisted around to the point where we have to take our American boys and send them to a country for anything more than the protection of the interests of foreigners and Americans. I have never understood how the Monroe doctrine could be twisted into meaning that we had to send our boys over the hills and mountains of a foreign country for the purpose of maintaining order in that country. I have never understood that, and nobody has ever been able to explain it to me satisfactorily.

Maybe they will catch this fellow, Sandino, or whatever his name is, down in Nicaragua. They will run him down and catch him, perhaps, I do not know; but I do know it is a curious kind of construction to put on the phrase "Protection of American lives and property" to have our soldiers chasing through the jungles and running through the woods, running down a bunch of fellows who are trying to get away from them. [Laughter and applause.] I can not understand that.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SCHAFER. Perhaps they are following the policy of protection laid down by the late President Wilson when he sent our soldiers into Russia and into Mexico.

Mr. McKEOWN. Well, I want to say this: About the only time the Russians ever had any sort of order over there that was worth while was when the Americans were there. They may not have appreciated it, but it was about the best order they had ever had, and they have not had any since. [Laughter and applause.] So far as Mexico is concerned, I have always said, and I have always believed, if a fellow wants to invest his money in Mexico rather than under the flag of the United States, let him take the consequences of the laws of Mexico and live up to them. [Applause.] He has no right to come back to this country and ask our citizens to send their boys down there when he himself will not stay at home, and the only thing he keeps up here is his citizenship, although he is always ready to ask that his investments be protected.

Mr. SCHAFER. Why did Woodrow Wilson, a Democratic President, send them down to Mexico?

Mr. McKEOWN. They had trouble down there, and he sent them down there to bring our fellows out from that country. [Laughter.] He sent them down there to stop them from coming over here and help the Americans who had not gotten out who had not sense enough to come out of that country; but he said he would not send our boys down there any more. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. We might as well recall now the reason President Wilson sent General Pershing and his punitive expedition into Mexico, which was because Villa crossed into the United States and at Columbus, N. Mex., killed a lot of American citizens, and this expedition was in pursuit of Villa and his followers. It was made with that purpose alone, and while the expedition did not get Villa they drove him far into the interior and he did not repeat the Columbus, N. Mex., outrage.

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SCHAFER. How about the Vera Cruz expedition?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Oh, that is not involved at all in this discussion.

Mr. DENISON. I am interested in my friend's discussion of the Monroe doctrine. If we have the right under the Monroe doctrine to send our troops to Nicaragua to protect American lives and property, should they take a position down there and simply stay there and allow themselves to be ambushed, as was done by Sandino with his troops, when a lot of our men were killed? Does my friend think we ought to do that?

Mr. McKEOWN. I want to say to my friend that I am just as firm for the Monroe doctrine as anybody in the House, and if it was more safe to charge that bunch, they ought to run them farther; but after they ran off, then they ought to stand still and protect their lives and the property; and I can not understand why a man wants to run up through the hills and over the mountains to take some fellow who is clear out of the zone of trouble and away from the danger line. He is not trying to do anything but get away. [Laughter.]

Mr. DENISON. I think the gentleman is literally correct, but that is only one phase of it. As I understand the situation, our troops were sent down there and were stationed at a position, but they were ambushed and a number of them killed. It was then decided, as a matter of military necessity and self-protection, that they should run down the bandits and capture them or kill them in order to prevent another ambush. I am sure my friend will agree that that was proper.

Mr. McKEOWN. But I want to know whether they were in the right position in the first place. I want to know whether they were in the right place when they were ambushed. I do not know whether they were or not. [Applause.] They might not have been protecting American property. They ought to have been around where the American property was and maybe they got away from where such property was.

Of course, I am not criticizing them for fighting, because American boys will fight whenever there is any chance to fight, and they are always ready to fight. We all know they are good fighters, but what I am complaining about is going down there to protect American property and American rights and to protect the rights and the property of the citizens of the foreign countries who have business in there, because we do not let them go in and protect it, and naturally we have to "stepfather" their interests; but when we have done the protecting we ought to quit and get through with it and we ought not to continue to carry on a warfare down there.

Mr. DENISON. I am sure that would be correct if the hostile enemy would let us do that, but they will not do that. They attack us from ambush, and then my friend, I am sure, understands it becomes necessary to pursue them until they are captured or driven into submission.

Mr. McKEOWN. Do they come up into the cities and into the places where American property is located?

Mr. DENISON. They certainly did in Nicaragua.

Mr. McKEOWN. Well, they can run them out of the cities and stop following them, can they not? [Laughter.]

You know, gentlemen, this is a serious matter. There are boys from all over the United States in the Marine Corps. They can not help themselves. They have got to go wherever they are told to go, and they have to die if necessary; but these boys, their kin, want to know for what purpose they are dying down there in Nicaragua.

I am not complaining about the Monroe doctrine. I am not complaining about defending our citizens and our property. I think every man in this country, if he goes on lawful business, ought to be entitled to go into any country and be protected by the flag of this Nation. [Applause.]

I have no apologies for, or no regret about, that doctrine, but I do not think that a man has a right to go off to a foreign country, leave the United States, and take all of his money with him, and the only thing he leaves up here is his citizenship; and, then, when he gets into a row with them down there over some trick he played on them and they played on him, then to come up here and want to take our boys down there to protect him and his property. I am not in favor of that kind of doctrine. It may be all right, but I am not in favor of it. [Applause.]

Now, what is the situation? This resolution reported out by Congressman BURTON is most far-reaching and is one of the steps forward in the matter of controlling wars. Because, if the resolution is adopted and we go on record in saying that we do not believe in selling arms and munitions and are not going to stand up and let the arms and munitions go to prosecute wars abroad, in other countries, you are going to have less of it, and you will see if you don't have less war propaganda in the world.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I would like to say that I have heard that a number of marines have been wounded in Nicaragua. Has the gentleman any information on that subject?

Mr. McKEOWN. No; I have not been advised as to the number.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I have heard that more than 400 have been injured.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has again expired.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COMBS].

Mr. COMBS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am not insensible to the fact that there may be some presumption in my discussing a matter to which the experience and wisdom of much older men have been addressed. My only excuse for so presuming is the fact that, as the gentleman from Oklahoma has just told you, the question that confronts us in our international policy is a matter of the gravest public concern.

It is difficult to speak temperately of any injustice that compromises our national honor. It is even more difficult to speak without passion and without bitterness of the injustice of a cause that has brought upon our heads the censure of the entire civilized world.

So in approaching any discussion of this matter it is only fit and proper that it should be done in a spirit of the utmost gravity.

I want to read, not because I subscribe to all the sentiment it embodies, but because it is one of the most eloquent human documents that was ever written, a letter from the father of a marine who was killed in a Nicaraguan battle. I would like to include it in the RECORD, feeling that while it may be in some respects intemperate, it fairly expresses the opinion and attitude of a great many of our American people. This, mind you, is a citizen of my own State of Missouri who has written out of the fullness of a heart bereaved through the loss of his own son and addressed to the President of the United States:

Mr. CALVIN COOLIDGE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: According to the dispatches of to-day (January 3) from Managua, my son, Serg. John F. Hemphill, was killed in action against General Sandino's troops.

For the death of my son I hold no malice against General Sandino or any of his men, for I think, and I believe that 90 per cent of our people agree with me, that they are to-day fighting for their liberty, as our forefathers fought for our liberty in 1776, and that we, as a Nation, have no legal or moral right to be murdering those liberty-loving people in a war of aggression.

What we are doing is nothing less than murder, for the sole purpose of keeping in power a puppet President, and acting as a collector for Wall Street, which is certainly against the spirit and letter of our Constitution.

My son was 29 years old, served 3 years of his third enlistment, survived honorable service through the World War against Germany, only to be officially murdered in a disgraceful war against this little nation.

My father served through the Civil War, both my grandfathers died in action in the same war, and I am proud of their records, so this is not from the pen of a red radical, but from one who loves justice and fair play.

I have four sons, and if necessity arose I would be willing to sacrifice not only all four sons, but my own life as well, in a war of defense, but I am not willing to shed one drop of blood in a war of aggression such as this one is.

You have lost a son and know the sorrow, and we as a Nation mourned with you in your hour of grief. Suppose that son had fallen, as my son has, a victim of the greed of Wall Street, would you feel that the financial gain was worth the cost?

JOHN S. HEMPHILL.

FERGUSON, MO.

Gentlemen, we have heard a number of different lines of argument to justify the intervention of this country in the affairs of Mexico, and most frequently, as the gentleman from Oklahoma has just said, the Monroe doctrine has been invoked in a variety of interpretations to defend what would otherwise be an absolutely indefensible war of aggression. What was the Monroe doctrine; what was the purpose of it? Was it intended to cover any such situation as confronts us in the Latin American countries? It was formed to combat the influence of the Holy Alliance, intent on restoring to Spain her colonies throughout the Latin American countries. We were unwilling to see a political system antagonistic to our own established on this continent through European coercion, knowing that our trade with Latin American countries, then being carried on peacefully, would be interrupted by the Spanish policy of limiting the trade of her colonies almost entirely to commerce with the mother country. Still more important was that the virus of autocracy, distilled at our very door, might poison the democratic institutions of this Nation while they were still in their infancy. When, under the guiding hand of Metternich, the Holy Alliance attempted to reestablish the Spanish Empire on this continent, both the United States and England protested and England withdrew from the alliance. It would seem the Monroe doctrine had been too well and too thoroughly discussed to need any word of interpretation here so far as its logical scope is concerned, but such liberties have been taken with its implications that we should try to define its original objectives.

Now we are told it was meant to embrace such conditions as have developed in Latin America. Let me read the words of President Monroe at the time the Monroe doctrine was formed, showing what his sole purpose was and his view of the scope of the pronunciamento—that it was not meant to extend to our intervention in Latin American affairs, but, as a matter of fact, expressly committed us not to intermeddle in the private affairs of any other country. Not the least of the objects of the doctrine was to guarantee to each nation the right to determine its own form of government, free from either European or American coercion, and these are the words of James Monroe, uttered only two years after the enunciation of that doctrine:

The new States are settling down under their governments, elective and representative, in every branch similar to our own. In this their career, however, we have not interfered, believing that every people have the right to institute for themselves the government which in their judgment may suit them best.

He was followed immediately by John Quincy Adams, who really breathed the spirit of life into the Monroe doctrine, and whose reference to its scope was this:

We are disclaiming alike all right and all intention of interfering in those concerns which it is the prerogative of their independence to regulate as to them shall seem fit.

The Congress of the United States at the same time referring to the limitations of this doctrine, under whose protection we now seek to carry on a war of aggression in Nicaragua, said that we did not have the right of intervention with their private and purely national affairs.

In the opinion of this committee there is no proposition concerning which the people of the United States are now and ever have been more unanimous than that which denies not merely the expediency, but the right of intermeddling with the internal affairs of other States, and especially of seeking to alter any provision they may have thought proper to adopt as a fundamental law.

At the time the Monroe doctrine was enunciated the President of the United States, the Secretary of War, the Congress of the United States were unanimous in that interpretation of the Monroe doctrine which would have made it an act of intermeddling on our part to seek to dictate to any Latin-American country how it should order its private affairs. The Monroe doctrine has not changed. It is still what it was at the time of its enunciation, and while I will not pretend that it in any way exhausts our foreign policy so far as Latin America is concerned, but it is the only definite and unambiguous foreign policy that the United States has ever had toward those countries, and the enlargement of it to condone our paternalism in Latin America is without historical or moral justification.

We are committed to protect those countries against European aggression, very largely as a matter of our own protection, being unwilling to see any other political system inimical to our own grow up on American soil. But by no possible refinement of reasoning can that be distorted to cover or justify our activity in going into the internal affairs of any Latin-American state. What have we done? The reason we went into Nicaragua was ostensibly to protect the sanctity of American investment. As a matter of fact, it has been said on this floor—and, I believe, never denied—that there is no definite proof, there is not even a word, that can convince a fair-minded man that American life was ever endangered in Nicaragua or that American property ever had been seriously threatened. When the American marines were ambushed it was after we had committed ourselves to pursuing Sandino and had virtually declared a state of war against him.

The barometer of political affairs in Latin America rises and falls so quickly that if we attempted to intervene in every purely national dispute that arises on that particular part of the continent we should be busy in no other thing. But conceding that we had the right to do this—and I do not, for one, deny that the sanctity of our American life and investment demands for the protection of the sovereignty of the United States the application of whatever force is necessary to protect our own interests—still we have gone further than guarding the rights of our nationals and have deliberately sought, not simply to establish zones of neutrality that would have been sufficient to guarantee the lives and property of our own citizens but to police a foreign state, to maintain a foreign government with only the most dubious claims to office and to make war on a large element of the Nicaraguan people.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COMBS. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman make a distinction in the duty of the Government as between the protection of life and property? Would not the gentleman make a distinction in that respect?

Mr. COMBS. I do, of course, believe that the sanctity of American life is far more important than the sanctity of American investments that may have been made in a spirit of reckless disregard to their effect upon the policy of the United States.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is the answer that I had expected from the gentleman. I just want to reinforce what the gentleman said a moment ago, and that is that again and again here on this floor those who have undertaken to uphold the policy adopted by the administration have been challenged to point to a single instance in which a single American life was even threatened, or to an instance in which American property that it was our duty to protect was in any way jeopardized, to the end that we might know under what circumstances life was endangered and that we might know the character of property and what its relation was to the Government of Nicaragua.

Mr. COMBS. May I say, expressing my gratitude to the gentleman from Tennessee for his interruption, that a substantial American investment has been made in Nicaragua since the outbreak of hostilities, when that part of the Liberal forces led by Moncado were induced by the unofficial representative of the United States to submit to Diaz. The Stimson plan provided they were to be paid for every gun that they brought in.

General Moncado surrendered his forces, but it was found that there was not enough money available in the Nicaraguan treasury to pay him, and that the United States would not lend enough money to the provisional government to pay General Moncado; and so the Diaz government of Nicaragua negotiated a loan, not with the Government of the United States, but with the Guaranty Trust Co. of New York, for $1,000,000, which was to be expended under the supervision of a commission composed of three men, one of them a representative of the Nicaraguan Government, one of them a representative of the Guaranty Trust Co. of New York, and one of them a representative of the American State Department. Sandino rejected the offer, refused amnesty, and denied the right of the United States to supervise the affairs of Nicaragua. So American money began going into Nicaragua in an almost unbroken stream at a time when hostilities were again brewing and ready to burst into flame.

Now, the peril of it is this: What lien or mortgage must Nicaragua give for the one-year loan of $1,000,000 the bankers made them? A mortgage on the capital stock and dividends of the National Bank of Nicaragua of $600,000—the National Bank of Nicaragua is a corporation with a paid-in capital of $300,000, and worth twice that—and the entire capital stock of the Pacific Railways of Nicaragua, worth more than the total amount of the loan; and they pledge the export tax on coffee, the new customs duty on tobacco, wine, and liquors, and the increased tolls on other commodities, and agree to give the bankers of New York a five-year option on new Nicaraguan loans, and to transfer to New York, for the benefit of the credit givers, the bank's and railroad's deposits, worth in the neighborhood of $400,000.

We have invested in that country in a time of great and dire peril. Now a new loan is projected even more sweeping in its provisions than the first one, one that will have an even more burdensome effect upon the Nicaraguan people. We are getting a lien on the customs, on the utilities, on the railroads, on the banks, and almost every productive industry in that country. Your American marines will never get out of there until each one of these various obligations is redeemed, whether that takes months or years. I believe that no man has a morally defensible right to go into a country whose internal affairs are as unstable as those of Nicaragua and then expect the American people to redeem the money recklessly and improvidently invested, through the intervention of our Army. [Applause.]

In conclusion I want to say that there is a serious question that we have not duly considered, which has to do with the right of our President to make war on any foreign people without the sanction of the Congress of the United States. I do not care how many times it has been done before. It is wrong. It will always be wrong. And this Congress is morally obligated to defend its own prerogative in a declaration of war.

Thomas Jefferson, at a time when matters similar to these were under consideration, laid down this doctrine, which is good, sound American doctrine at this time, and which apparently had something prophetic in it, since he forecasts clearly our present situation. I read what he said:

> In the case of actual physical attacks upon American citizens or their property, or the immediate danger of such attacks, the forces of the United States may be used for strictly protective purposes without the consent of Congress, which it is manifestly impossible to obtain in such cases. When, however, any attempt is made to take over the control or territory, to use force for the collection of claims due to American citizens, to interfere with the military operation of foreign troops, or, above all, to interfere between two governments, each claiming to be the legal government of the country, war (perhaps only partial war, but still war) is waged, and this can only be constitutionally done under the authorization of Congress.

American lives are being sacrificed. By whose warrant? The Constitution of the United States provides expressly that the power to wage war shall be vested in the Congress. Has there been any warrant through which Congress to-day authorizes this aggressive war on Nicaragua? The Nation has been plunged into a war it does not approve, with casualties to its troops proportionately as great as those of the World War, by a usurpation on the part of the President and the State Department of a right which resides in Congress—an illegal as well as an immoral war.

We are getting deeper and deeper into the mud of Nicaraguan affairs. With every investment we are becoming more and more deeply involved. With every loss of American life the situation has become more and more critical; and I say that inasmuch as we are there without warrant of law and without the authorization of Congress, we would not be stultifying ourselves or our national honor, so far as the Stimson agreement is concerned, if we brought away our troops to-day without any apology to the world except for the harm we have already done. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD] 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on various bills introduced by myself, and by replying to an editorial recently carried by the Washington News under the caption of "Religious tolerance and District of Columbia Sunday closing laws," and also by inserting some brief quotations and an item from the Literary Digest on Sunday observance.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated by him. Is there objection?

Mr. MAPES. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman if that is the same request he made yesterday in the House?

Mr. LANKFORD. It is the same request.

Mr. MAPES. I understood that the policy was not to ask for extensions in committee of matters foreign to the subject matter of the debate.

Mr. LANKFORD. I want to talk on the subject indicated at this time, under the rules of general debate.

Mr. MAPES. Does the gentleman think that it is good practice to ask to extend in the committee what has been objected to in the House?

Mr. LANKFORD. I do not feel that the fact that I have already asked unanimous consent to extend on any subject and have been denied that privilege deprives me of the privilege of repeating that request, and it does not deprive me of the right to ask unanimous consent for the insertion as a part of my remarks of an editorial which is discussed, and quotations which I wish to insert as a part of my discussion.

Mr. MAPES. If the gentleman is going to discuss the general subject, I will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I was compelled to object to the gentleman's request yesterday, and if he is repeating the same request now I shall be obliged again to object. I object to the insertion of something other than the gentleman's own remarks. I object to the insertion of editorials, articles in the Literary Digest, and similar extracts to which the gentleman referred yesterday. They are public property and do not need to go into the RECORD. I therefore object to the insertion of such extracts as the gentleman refers to as having been printed in the Literary Digest and other publications.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard to that portion of the gentleman's request relating to extracts from the Literary Digest.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, do I understand that means I can use nothing except my own remarks and that I can not quote even a sentence from any other document?

Mr. TREADWAY. It does not mean that at all. Everybody in the course of remarks such as I understand the gentleman is about to make brings in an extract from somebody else's speech or something like that. What I am objecting to is the insertion of articles taken bodily or partially from magazine articles, which is so frequently done here. The gentleman knows perfectly well what the nature of the objection is that I am making. I am not objecting to the gentleman quoting something in his own remarks and in his own time on the floor.

Mr. LANKFORD. That is what I am seeking to do, Mr. Chairman, give certain quotations in my own remarks, and I do not understand there is any limit as to the length of those quotations.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think there is a limit as to the length of such quotations, and unless the gentleman is willing to say how extensive those quotations are I shall be obliged to object. If he wants to say, "I am quoting simply a few lines to illustrate what I am saying," of course I shall not object, but I think it is the gentleman's intention to quote an article from the Literary Digest, and I object to that. We can get copies of the Literary Digest for 10 or 15 cents.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will not the gentleman from Massachusetts withhold his objection for a moment. I would like to inquire just what the gentleman from Georgia desires to insert.

Mr. LANKFORD. I have asked unanimous consent to insert certain quotations from an editorial which was carried in the Washington News on the subject of religious tolerance and District of Columbia Sunday laws, and also to insert a short quotation from the Literary Digest, as well as some other quotations. I would insert, if permitted, the entire article from the Literary Digest, because it is not very long. I will say in this connection that on yesterday the gentleman from Massachusetts allowed an extension of remarks in the RECORD containing five newspaper articles, every one of which is much longer than my article, and then within five minutes he objected to my inserting in the RECORD one article not nearly as long.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman does me an injustice. I did not permit anybody to put anything in the RECORD, because I do not have that power. All I can do is to make objection when the request is made, if such request does not seem proper. I did not permit anybody to put in five extracts, and I did not know anything about it.

Mr. LANKFORD. The RECORD shows that just before I made my request on yesterday the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD] obtained unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. That was not objected to by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and those remarks contained five quotations from newspapers, every one of which is much longer than the quotation which I wish to put in the RECORD. The gentleman from Massachusetts could have ascertained from the gentleman from Ohio whether he intended to include such quotations in his own remarks. However, he did not do that, but objected to my inserting these quotations. He could have made that inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio. Furthermore, last year, when I inserted an article which the gentleman [Mr. TREADWAY] thought ought not to be inserted, he moved to strike it out, but he has made no such motion with reference to the extension of remarks by the gentleman from Ohio. The gentleman from Massachusetts could have followed the same procedure he followed with respect to myself last year.

Mr. TREADWAY. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that at the time I objected to the extension of his remarks another gentleman, Mr. UNDERHILL, objected to the extension of remarks by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RATHBONE]. His extension did not concern the same subject matter, but the gentleman's request included the same kind of an article, an editorial from a newspaper. That was objected to, and is going to be objected to again to-day.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, we might as well get this matter straight. The RECORD every day carries column after column of liquor advertisements or matter put in on behalf of wet propaganda and on behalf of the bootleggers of the country, and then when I attempt to put in a very short article in defense of a bill I have introduced, and which has been attacked by some newspaper in Washington, I am confronted with the proposition that I can not insert short newspaper articles in the RECORD.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me there ought to be some definite rule as to the length of quotations that may be included in extensions of remarks. I do not want to violate any rule of the House. I only want to be treated fairly. I do not want anything left out of the RECORD simply because I happen to be in favor of Sunday observance or because I happen to want to quote something in support of that contention. I do not want anything left out of the RECORD because it happens to be in support of farm legislation upon objection by the same gentleman from Massachusetts who put in the RECORD a little while ago a lot of quotations from newspapers attacking farm legislation. I want to know where the line of distinction is. Is it because my article is in favor of Sunday observance or in favor of farm legislation, or because the gentleman just simply does not like the man who is trying to put in the article?

Mr. TREADWAY. I would not for a moment, Mr. Chairman, take the slightest offense at the gentleman from Alabama——

Mr. LANKFORD. Alabama would be as well, but I am from Georgia.

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; the gentleman from Georgia. It is not a personal matter in any sense. At numerous times I have objected to extensions of remarks of the nature that the gentleman seems to want to insist upon inserting now. I offer this suggestion in all kindliness to the gentleman. I am not going to make the personal type of remark that the gentleman has just made because there is nothing personal in this at all——

Mr. LANKFORD. There is nothing personal with me except that I can not understand why the gentleman objects to certain lines of extension and allows the other kind to go in.

Mr. TREADWAY. Just a moment. The gentleman made his statement, let me make mine.

Mr. LANKFORD. But this is my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. TREADWAY. Let me suggest, Mr. Chairman, probably we have taken more time in discussing this matter than it would have taken the gentleman to read, in his own time, the extracts he wants to put in the RECORD, and I suggest the gentleman read the extract from the Literary Digest in his own time, and then there will not be any objection to it upon my part.

Mr. LANKFORD. At the beginning I asked unanimous consent that I might proceed for 20 minutes and read what I had written with these extracts in it, and if I failed to read it all within the 20 minutes that the balance then might be extended in the RECORD.

Mr. TREADWAY. I still object to the gentleman inserting extracts from the Literary Digest or any other publication without having read them.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. TREADWAY. I object.

Mr. LANKFORD. At a more opportune time, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia, and the Chair hears objection?

Mr. LANKFORD. As I understand it, the gentleman does not object to my reading what I have written.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The discussion, of course, is all in the gentleman's time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman may proceed with his remarks. He has been yielded time.

Mr. LANKFORD. And at some other time I shall ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD my own remarks on the inconsistencies of the very amiable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Why does not the gentleman ask that privilege now? I shall not object to it.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, after taking ample time to look up the matter, showing the inconsistency of the splendid gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. I trust that right will be granted the gentleman.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman does not expect to quote from the Literary Digest on that subject?

Mr. LANKFORD. I do expect to quote from some remarks the gentleman has put in in opposition to farm relief.

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, no. I have done nothing of the sort.

Mr. LANKFORD. And some remarks that have been allowed to go in unobjected to putting bootleg stuff in the RECORD.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman is mistaken in the identity of the Member. I have never put anything of that kind in the RECORD at any time.

Mr. TABER. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is for the gentleman to proceed.

Mr. LANKFORD. I am proceeding, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The time consumed by the gentleman, of course, is out of the time yielded him.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would not so hold, in view of the fact that during the discussion under a reservation of the right to object, any Member could have demanded the regular order. If anyone's fault, it was the fault of all the Members permitting the discussion to go on when any Member could have stopped it by a demand for the regular order.

Mr. LANKFORD. What I wish to say in that connection is simply this——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time is running now.

Mr. LANKFORD. All right. I shall quote in this extension of remarks from remarks made by the gentleman in opposition to farm relief, in which he extended certain articles, and also other articles put in by him, or which he permitted to be inserted, consisting of newspaper articles; and also certain bootleg stuff permitted to be inserted in the RECORD when the gentleman was present and made no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I object to that sort of remark, as if I were the censor of every Member on this floor. We have had a nice, cordial, pleasant little talk here——

Mr. LANKFORD. And we are still having it.

Mr. TREADWAY. Why not continue it without any personal remarks of that kind? I have never inserted any bootleg legislation in the RECORD, or anything favorable to it.

Mr. LANKFORD. I did not say that.

Mr. TREADWAY. And the only thing the gentleman objects to is the fact that I have not stopped somebody else from putting in some of their own remarks. It is not fair, I will say to the gentleman from Georgia, to make any such insinuation. Let us be pleasant about this little matter.

Mr. LANKFORD. It has been very pleasant with me.

Mr. TREADWAY. Even to the extent of offending the gentleman about his Literary Digest item.

Mr. LANKFORD. I simply wish to say that I do not mean the gentleman has put in any bootleg extensions, but since the gentleman has set himself up as a censor of certain matter sought to be put into the RECORD by me, I am going to show that my quotations are better and of a higher class than other stuff which the gentleman permits to go into the RECORD.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I shall now proceed with my remarks concerning the editorial carried by the Washington Times, and am quite sure I shall, yet in my own time, have an opportunity to read the article from the Literary Digest to which objection has been made.

First I wish to address myself to the editorial carried by the Times, leaving the contested Digest article to be read by me later, before I resume my seat.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the Washington Times, on January 20 past, under a double-column caption of "Religious tolerance and District of Columbia Sunday closing law," editorially purposely attempted, as usual, to deceive the public. The attack was aimed at a bill introduced by me to provide one day of rest out of every seven in the District of Columbia. Deception No. 1 is in the phrase "there is pending in Congress a bill, sponsored by Georgians and other citizens of particular creeds, providing for air-tight Sunday closing in the District of Columbia." If a bill, the entire effect of which would be to close only commercial sports, theaters, movies, dance halls, and night clubs on Sunday and secure one day of rest out of every seven for the workingman, is an air-tight Sunday closing then I wonder what the editor would consider a wide-open town. The editor knows I am not trying to legislate for an "air-tight Sunday closing in the District of Columbia." I do favor, though, an air-tight Sunday closing of theaters and movies which to-day are fiendishly kidnaping, debauching, and tearing to pieces all that is highest and best in the make-up of our children. While these kidnapers of the conscience and souls of our boys and girls are throwing their morally twisted and dismembered bodies at our feet, editors of many of the big dailies are pleading for these dens of vice, like the gates of torment, to stand open day and night and every day in the year.

This editor of the Times is very solicitous about the Sunday night clubs and Sunday dance halls, and is fighting shoulder to shoulder with the organization for the promotion of atheism in behalf of these dives of vice, lawlessness, and shame. The sanction, approval, and support of these things is demanded by the editor as being in furtherance of "orderly, sensible observance of the Sabbath Day." The editor says that "District pastors, citizens, and organizations" have denounced my bill as "being most dangerous to true religion."

To my mind, Sunday dance halls and Sunday night clubs constitute an odd and dangerous "true religion." Because a few have bitterly objected to my bill against these things does not lessen the merits of the bill. In my humble judgment there are a hundred times as many pastors, good citizens, and leading churchmen in Washington and elsewhere favoring my bill as there are against it.

Again, the editor says that Congress is composed of "enlightened men, the majority of whom represent constituents who do not favor such legislation." Why not make the statement stronger and say all Congressmen represent a few constituents who do not favor any Sunday legislation, object to all laws, and are professional criminals. Surely this is no argument against reasonable laws when favored by a great majority of our people. The desire for Sunday closing of theaters, movies, dance halls, and night clubs is not the "bigoted ideas of a comparative few outside men and women." If the overwhelming majority of the people in a great majority of the congressional districts do not favor my bill, then I do not want it passed. This can not be determined, though, by the number of petitions which may be obtained by false representations that my bill interferes with religious freedom or would bring a union of church and state, or will force Sunday religious observance.

Let us see what these Washington newspaper champions of Sunday night clubs say about these beloved objects of their deepest affections. After pleading for protection of the night clubs of debauchery in the name of the United States Constitution and all its wonderful provisions for religious freedom and human rights, their news columns carry story after story descriptive of these dens. Here is a little of the evidence quoted by these papers as given by a prominent citizen in a trial now in progress concerning what was seen at one of the most notorious clubs near Thomas Circle. The witness said:

> On January 15, 1927, I saw a young girl slide under the table from her chair. Two young men, about 22, and another girl were at the table. The men picked the girl up and asked a waiter to bring them something. The waiter returned with a colorless liquid which they gave the girl and she was revived. Later they took her from the dance floor. I believe the girl was drunk. I saw 40 or 50 persons drunk that night. They were trying to dance. I smelled the odor of alcohol. Those trying to dance bumped into each other. They were boisterous. Men, and occasionally a woman, cursed. Their faces were flushed, the girls' hair were disheveled.

The editor argues that to close dens like this just described will "disgust many who believe in orderly, sensible observance of the Sabbath day," will "fasten on the District the bigoted ideas of a comparatively few outside men and women," will "force Sunday religious observance on the people," and that "modern religion can make no progress" where such Sunday performances are interfered with. Perhaps he believes these things; but if so, he is diseased with a strange kind of religio-fanatico-constitutio-don't know. He even urges that there shall be no good legislation for people, since we can not "make them good" by legislation. I admit that legislation can not make all people good, but that is less than no argument against laws for the protection of both good and bad folks. All good laws improve not so much the individual as the whole citizenship. Laws are not made alone for the fellow who boasts that "laws can not make him good," but for the protection of those he would wrong or destroy. The insistence by any man that he will be maliciously bad in spite of law, and therefore others should join with him in violation of the law, is an effort to tear down all law, destroy orderly government under the Constitution, and to set up in lieu thereof anarchy by traitors.

I would not sponsor a bill based on the intolerance of any true religion, but I have no tolerance for any practice, be it called religious or not, which approves the eating of human beings by the cannibals of the Fiji Islands or the slaughter of innocent children by any people, civilized or uncivilized; neither do I profess any tolerance for the selfish desires of those who for "30 pieces of silver" are seeking to betray the moral manhood and womanhood of the next decade—our children of the present. I am very intolerant of the selfish practices and proclivities of those who are seeking to lead and herd our children like "dumb, driven cattle" in the slaughterhouses of atheists and those giving infidels aid and comfort in their fight to destroy all that is highest and best in the lives of ourselves and in the life of our Government.

By the way, just here let me give the editor a little tip. The Times and other Washington papers like to carry criticisms of my farm bills, Sunday bill, and so forth. Now, I have introduced a bill—

To prevent the handling in the United States mail or interstate commerce of any newspaper, magazine, or periodical which contains the name of a girl or woman as the individual upon which it is alleged or contended was committed a rape or an assault with attempt to rape.

I am trying to prevent the Times from lynching publicly, again and again, the outraged victim while the identical paper is shouting for the protection of the brute who committed the offense. I would like to shut up "airtight" this and some other papers—not only Sunday, but every day in the week—so as to prevent their subjecting by continuous publicity the innocent victim of an outrage to a torture worse than that of faggots and the torch.

The editor can write another editorial on this last-mentioned bill and can give forth ululations to his heart's content in behalf of his idea of "religious freedom," and especially can he feel he is very eloquent in behalf of "freedom of the press." Evidently the editor thinks that "freedom of the press" means a license to oppress the right and suppress the truth.

The editor can apply the epithet of "bigoted" to the great majority of people in the States who favor a decent Sunday law for their own Capital if he wishes. Not many of the 421 Members of the House who represent districts with stronger Sunday laws than that proposed by my bill will join with him in his unauthorized slander of over a hundred million of the best people of the Nation. In order to show what others think of the "bigoted" people who favor Sunday legislation I wish to read for the RECORD the following article from the Literary Digest of January 28, 1928.

This is the article to which objection has been made:

A LESSON ON SUNDAY OBSERVANCE

Big business and Sunday observance are not generally associated together in the public mind, but the Manufacturers Record (Baltimore) gives us striking instances in which two of the country's great business houses make it a strict rule to keep the Sabbath day holy. John Morrell & Co., packers, a century-old firm of Ottumwa, Iowa, which last year did a business of $75,000,000, observe the Sabbath day so strictly, we read, that they do not permit anyone in their employ to work for them on that day. This is brought out in a letter from T. Henry Foster, the president of the company, to Edward T. Fenwick, a Washington attorney, who had written that he preferred not to travel on Sunday to attend some of the meetings of the company. In the course of this letter, as we quote it from the Manufacturers Record, Mr. Foster says:

"There is one thing, however, I want to comment on, and that is the fact that you do not like to travel on Sunday in order to appear at meetings in our behalf.

"I am glad to know this, and I want you to feel that you need never travel on Sunday in connection with any of John Morrell & Co.'s business. If in order to reach a destination it is necessary to travel on Sunday, it can be understood between us that the work is to go over until the next day, and in this connection you will find us always ready to cooperate with you.

"In our own business we observe the Sabbath day everywhere, and have done so as long as the business has been in existence. We not only do not work ourselves, but we do not want or permit anyone to work for us, and as long as the present management is in charge of this business we expect to maintain this rule.

"We are really glad once in a while to come across people who have the same respect for the Sabbath day we have."

In a letter to the Manufacturers Record on the same subject, Mr. Foster says:

"A great deal of our success I attribute to the high standard of living maintained by the founders of our business, and the importance they attached to spiritual values and made use of in their relations with their employees, their competitors, and the public. This has had its influence on the business down through the years and long after all of them have passed away.

"You will realize that we operate a highly perishable business, dealing as we do in livestock and fresh meats. Nevertheless, we have found it not only possible, but also entirely practical, to fully observe the Sabbath as a day of rest."

Another great western firm, Marshall Field & Co., of Chicago, which has ramifications all over the world, has a similar rule in regard to Sunday observance. Seventy-five years ago, we read, Marshall Field & Co. inaugurated a practice of pulling down their store-window curtains on Saturday night and leaving them down until Monday morning. This practice has continued to the present time.

Mr. TREADWAY. I would like to have the gentleman know that I am very proud of the fact that the merchant prince, Marshall Field, to whom he has referred, was born and raised and learned the mercantile business in my district.

Mr. LANKFORD (reading):

In a full-page advertisement in the Chicago Tribune some weeks ago that firm inserted the following statement:

"THE THINGS UNSEEN

"At the end of their first week in business the owners of a little shop lowered the curtains of their windows and went home.

"On each succeeding Saturday night the curtains were pulled down and kept down until Monday morning.

"As the little shop grew the suggestion came from many sources that the curtains should stay up. 'The windows are beautiful,' people said, 'let us walk by and look.'

"The owners had an old-fashioned background. They had been taught in childhood that six days are enough for the things that are seen. The first day of the week, they said, is for the things unseen—rest and worship and family life and freedom from thought of business.

"Seventy-five years have passed. The store has grown until its windows are said to be more valuable than any windows in the world. But the example of the founders remains, and all day Sunday the shades are down.

"Is this old-fashioned custom good in days when so many old-fashioned customs are being crowded out? We like to think so. We like the idea that on the first day of the week the church and the home should come first.

"Strong churches and strong homes build strong cities. All the great words of business—service and courtesy and kindliness and truth—have their inspiration in religion. And prosperity is only permanent where there is reverence and mutual trust and faith."

Here—

Says the Manufacturers Record—is a lesson to all America to study. May it be heeded ere it is too late.

Here is a news item which shows how a man who is well known in the financial world feels about Sunday observance. I am sure it will not hurt the RECORD:

HANK WOULDN'T POSE

TOLEDO, OHIO.—Henry Ford doesn't work on Sunday; neither does he want anyone else to do so. When on a recent Sabbath he was broached by an ambitious reporter and photographer for a story and picture, Henry replied: "This is Sunday, my boy. No one should work on the Sabbath unless it's absolutely necessary. Getting a story or a picture of me isn't."

Now, let us see how some noted men of the past felt about Sunday observance:

SIR WALTER SCOTT

Give the world one-half of Sunday and you will soon find that religion has no stronghold on the other half.

DISRAELI

The Sabbath is the cornerstone of civilization.

VOLTAIRE

You can only destroy the Christian religion when you first destroy the Christian Sabbath.

DANIEL WEBSTER

The longer I live the more highly do I esteem the proper observance of the Christian Sabbath and the more grateful do I feel toward those who impress its importance on the community.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT

Experience shows that the day of rest is essential to mankind; that it is demanded by civilization as well as by Christianity.

WILLIAM E. GLADSTONE

From a moral, social, and physical point of view the observance of Sunday is a duty of absolute consequence.

WILLIAM M'KINLEY

I am in favor of Sunday legislation and strict observance of the Christian Sabbath.

SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK

The Christian Sabbath, as one of the institutions of religion, may be protected from desecration by such laws as the legislature, in their wisdom, may deem necessary to secure to the community the privilege of undisturbed worship, and to the day itself that outward respect and observance which may be deemed essential to the peace and good order of society, and to preserve religion and its ordinances from open reviling and contempt, and this not as a duty to God but as a duty to society and the State.

I am glad to vouch for the merit of the last five quotations. I am sure all will admit none better could be placed in the RECORD.

Mr. Chairman, under leave to extend my remarks I wish to insert one newspaper item which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] included in an extension of his remarks last February. I do not wish to insist that he did wrong or exceeded his rights as a Member of Congress by including the item which I shall quote presently.

I do urge though that he can not now be quite as consistent in his objections to my inserting newspaper articles as he would be had he not done the same thing heretofore.

He may urge that his article was not quite as long as mine. But it must be remembered that mine is much better than his. Then again my quotations from Daniel Webster, William E. Gladstone, Theodore Roosevelt, and William McKinley are all much shorter than his and surely have more merit in them. I realize that the gentleman did not specifically object to these last-mentioned quotations; however, his general objection would have prevented my placing these in the RECORD without further insistance on my part. In fact when I first asked for leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I stated that my remarks contained some brief quotations from several of the men just mentioned. I specifically named Presidents Roosevelt and McKinley.

After all, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], who is one of the most amiable and beloved men of the House, as well as one of the very foremost leaders in the Congress, is honest and sincere in his efforts to protect the RECOTD and keep out unnecessary and objectionable matter. I am quite sure we both agree on the rights of Members and as to the courtesies that should be extended to each Member by his fellows. Neither of us wish to abuse the privilege granted us by Members to extend our remarks in the RECORD.

Let me say just here that while I agree with my friend Mr. TREADWAY in many, many matters, I disagree with him very much on the subject of farm relief, as will be seen by the article which he inserted in the RECORD last February, which I referred to earlier in by remarks and which I am, in justice to all concerned, by unanimous consent, again inserting in the RECORD.

On February 15, 1927, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] obtained unanimous consent for all Members of the House to have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the McNary farm relief bill. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, February 15, 1927, p. 3890.)

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] on February 15, 1927, availed himself of this opportunity to extend his remarks in the RECORD, and during the course of his remarks stated that a recent edition of the Washington Post had carried a letter from former Senator Thomas, of Colorado, and quoted from that letter in the Washington Post as set out in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 15, 1927, page 3894, as follows:

What are rivers and harbors bills, public buildings bills, and all other of the pork variety but "votive" tributes to compact minorities organized to raid the Treasury? And last but not least, what is the pending Haugen-McNary bill, ostensibly for farm relief, but a surrender of the National Legislature to the compact forces of an agrarian minority strenuously demanding an initial appropriation of $250,000,000 as an alternative to its political displeasure? The demand failed last year. It now renews its assault with an apparent certainty of success, because its forces are augmented by a compact with the cotton planter and tobacco grower, with whom the coveted spoils are to be shared.

Here is a trinity of power before which many Senators heretofore in opposition are obsequiously kowtowing. Their previous objections to the bill were both sincere and genuine. They were based upon irrefutable principles. They are as irrefutable now as they were last spring, yet they are silenced in large degree by the coalition of wheat, cotton, and tobacco.

The scheme is as fantastic as Plato's ideal republic. It defies economic law and all human experience. Even if it were capable of practicable administration and within constitutional warrants of power, it would carry the Government far afield from its legitimate functions. But it is a vote getter and as such easily commands the majority of the legislative branch of the Government, which instinctively appeals for its conduct to many like precedents of its own establishment.

Between the candidate who uses his own fortune to secure political advancement and the legislative majorities devoting the public money to the same purpose there is no difference in principle or in morals unless it be that the latter is the more reprehensible.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, surely this is newspaper propaganda of the most vicious form. It is needless to say that neither I nor anyone else who are supporting the various farm-relief measures approve the language of this article.

I am again inserting the item in the RECORD for the purpose of showing just what kind of articles are being taken from the press and inserted in the RECORD, just how vicious the Washington Post and other big-interest papers are in their attacks upon all efforts to pass legislation in behalf of the farmers of the Nation, and how bitter some of the opponents of farm legislation feel toward those of us seeking to solve this great problem.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] had a perfect right to insert the article in the RECORD as expressing his sentiments and convictions. In fact, I have inserted in the RECORD, both by speeches on the floor of Congress and by permission to extend my remarks, many times more newspaper articles, letters from farmers in my district and elsewhere, and remarks of people who are in favor of farm relief than was ever inserted in the RECORD against the McNary farm relief bill by the gentleman from Massachusetts. I inserted in the RECORD, at one time last year, an article in behalf of the farmers which covered several columns of the RECORD. I refer to the splendid article on farm relief by Mr. J. T. Holleman, of Atlanta, Ga. This is one of the very best discussions of the farmers' problems ever put in the RECORD by anyone. The space used by this article could not have been better used by any other speech or set of remarks in behalf of the farmer. I appreciated very much the opportunity of preserving this wonderful argument for all the peoples of the present and the future who shall read the RECORD.

Just in this connection let me say that many people in our districts do not understand why much is printed in the RECORD which is not actually read or delivered on the floor of Congress. We understand, of course, that this is true because the RECORD has come to be not only a record of the proceedings but also a daily periodical or newspaper in which is expressed the ideas of Members of Congress and the country on various matters pending in Congress or of national interest. There are not enough hours in the day and not enough days in the year for all Members of Congress to express fully their ideas on all matters on the floor of the House. Again, it would be much more expensive than to simply have them inserted in the RECORD. Then, again, many more Members of Congress read the RECORD than listen to the speeches on the floor. So it is that the busiest Members here do everything possible to put over their ideas, either in support of a measure or against it. They put data and remarks in the RECORD and make speeches whenever opportunity offers, and they believe they can help their cause—all in support of their legislative purpose.

Many of the best and most effective arguments in the higher courts of our land are those which are carefully written and filed but never orally delivered, and likewise many of the very best and most effective arguments here in Congress are those carefully prepared and placed in the RECORD but never actually delivered on the floor.

In conclusion, let me say that it is far from my purpose to say anything that would offend my good friend from Massachusetts or any other Member of Congress. We ofttimes "play rough" in our arguments and colloquys not because we have ill will for our fellow Members but for the purpose of giving emphasis to our ideas.

I feel by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] very much like the good old farmer felt by his son. Some one asked him about his boy and he said, "Well, he is a good boy in a great many ways and much better in a whole lot more."

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] is a loyal Republican, a good Member of Congress, an able Representative of his people and their interests, an amiable and excellent gentleman, and an embodiment of the highest and most splendid patriotism.

He is a good man in a great many ways and much better in a whole lot more.

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have been asked by the chairman of the Committee on the Election of President and Vice President to present to the House a legislative matter which will probably soon be brought up in the form of a rule from the Rules Committee, under which we will take up the resolution which, I hope, may be passed to become the twentieth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. My brief remarks are merely to bring to the attention of the House the object of this resolution, and I shall read it so that it may become familiar to the Members and be incorporated in the RECORD.

The amendment proposed by this resolution is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 24th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 4th day of January, of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

"SEC. 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year. In each odd-numbered year such meeting shall be on the 4th day of January unless they shall by law appoint a different day. In each even-numbered year such meeting shall be on the 4th day of January, and the session shall not continue after noon on the 4th day of May.

"SEC. 3. If the House of Representatives has not chosen a President, whenever the right of choice devolves upon them, before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, then the Vice President chosen for the same term shall act as President until the House of Representatives chooses a President; and the Congress may by law provide for the case where the Vice President has not been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, declaring what officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly until the House of Representatives chooses a President, or until the Senate chooses a Vice President.

"SEC. 4. If the President elect dies before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, then the Vice President elect shall become President; and the Congress may by law provide for the case of the death of both the President elect and the Vice President elect before the time fixed for the beginning of the term, for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice devolves upon them, and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate may choose a Vice President whenever the right of choice devolves upon them.

"SEC. 5. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect on the 30th day of November of the year following the year in which this article is ratified."

Mr. Chairman, I wished to present the resolution in full, because many have heard a great deal about the so-called Norris amendment having passed the other branch of the Congress in four consecutive years. That proposed amendment was referred to our committee, but it has been much enlarged upon and is now very different from the resolution which was passed by the Senate.

This measure having been reconsidered each year for five years the hearings have been widely scattered and it would be impossible for the Members of the House to get all of them in one volume, but it seems desirable to arouse interest in them at this time, as it is to be expected that we shall have to consider the problem very soon.

It seems to me that the new Members of the House, who have had to wait 13 months before they could join us here in Washington, will favor this amendment. Many of them have told me that their constituents could not understand why they were not "on the job." Such a change as is here proposed would have enabled them to take their places two months after their election.

You may call this proposition by whatever name you please. You may say that it is primarily a resolution providing for the abolition of the short session of Congress. It is true that it will extend that to four months—from January 4 to May 4. Meeting as we do now in December, we practically sit for only a fortnight in that month and then have only January and February in which to complete our work, making a session of but about two and a half months. The committee has thought it wise to provide a time limitation in the second year of each Congress, and we have proposed to place that limitation as of May 4.

That, we think, will provide ample time. It will also do away with the present short session, while at the same time we are making it a limited session. There are obviously many arguments to be presented in favor of such a limitation. I was at the outset somewhat opposed to this proposed amendment to the Constitution because I was loathe to consider additional amendments thereto. They are too frequently presented. Yet I am now most fully in accord with the purposes of this one.

While considering the resolution which came from the Senate we of the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress believed that we should at the same time incorporate in it several important changes which under the Constitution are apparently wholly lacking in the matter of election machinery. Suppose that the President elect, or the Vice President elect, either or both, should die prior to the beginning of their term of office. The question would then arise, Who would be President? We might possibly have to appeal to the Supreme Court for a decision and what would that decision be? In the event that the President elect should die and the Vice President elect be alive, the court would presumably decide that he would be the one who ought to take the office of President. But it is possible that some catastrophe might occur and both of the men supposed to have been chosen die. If the official meeting of the electors in January should come after such an event they could elect whomsoever they pleased, and this amendment would not be necessary. That I suppose is correct in theory, yet one might well wonder whom they would possibly choose in such an event. It is fair to assume that they would in all probability fail to make a choice, the selection would then be thrown in the House of Representatives and it would be the old Congress, under the present method which would elect the new President.

Now, suppose that one of the three highest in the order of succession during the time in question, a political party might be powerless. There are many such situations in the election of the President and Vice President of the United States that should be carefully considered. Indeed, we have inserted in this resolution certain sections which should have the careful study of each of you. I sincerely trust that such consideration will be given it before it is brought on the floor of the House.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Did I understand that the resolution had already been reported from the gentleman's committee?

Mr. GIFFORD. It has.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. When does the gentleman hope to get it up in the House?

Mr. GIFFORD. We hope within the next week or two.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Has the gentleman's committee given any consideration to changing the length of the term of the Members of the House of Representatives from two to four years?

Mr. GIFFORD. The committee has given attention to that proposition. We did not wish to encumber this proposed constitutional amendment with any sort of legislation which might cause trouble in having it ratified by the State legislatures. In my own State—and I assume that it would be so in many others—there are many members of the legislature who would like to succeed you and me and might object to an extension of our terms. I hardly think that we could obtain the extension. For one, I do not care to load up the amendment with anything of that sort, although, as I have said, the committee did give it consideration.

One of the important features of this legislation is, of course, that it will shorten the term of some President by two months and will also shorten the terms of some Congressmen and Senators by the same period. The year on which your terms would normally have ended on March 4, will, under this amendment, end on January 4. This will have to take effect sometime, but it would not affect the terms of Congressmen in office previous to its ratification.

Since, under the Constitution, one has been elected to hold office for a term of four years, the question naturally arose as to whether his term could be shortened, but the best authorities seem to agree that when the people have ratified an amendment, all previous conflicting sections of the Constitution are superseded and the new amendment is effective. However, if there are any of you who are "constitutionally minded" and who can find any basis for a contrary contention I hope that you will be ready to present it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I preface my question with the statement that I am disposed in a friendly way to the principle of this resolution; but I notice that the resolution fixes definite dates. The Constitution as it stands fixes no definite date. It says the first Monday in December, for instance, that Congress shall convene. You fix a definite day—the 15th or the 24th, or something like that. Evidently some of these days will fall on Sunday. What about that? Can it be adjusted so as to make it the first Monday, and so that those days will not fall on the Sabbath? Has that been given thought by your committee?

Mr. GIFFORD. I will say that there has been considerable thought given to it. I do not know that it presents any particular difficulty. We decided upon January 4, as there is now the definite date of March 4, being the end of the President's term and the expiration of Congress.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is not in the Constitution itself. It so happens.

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; it so happens.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think it would be better to say "the first Monday" rather than a specific date?

Mr. GIFFORD. I can not recall at this particular moment what real objection there was to that, but certainly there was not any great difference of opinion.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Now, you provide for a four-months' session. You provide that one session every other year shall end not later than May. I confess that my first reaction to that was rather one of doubt, to say the least, if it were wise to do that. The reasons given in your report are largely questions of expediency, questions of convenience to the sitting Member. I think there ought to be stronger reasons for a constitutional amendment than a question of the mere convenience of Members.

Mr. GIFFORD. I am not responsible for the expediency mentioned in the report. It is not my report, but I think there are other strong and compelling reasons which will be advanced when the bill comes up, if that portion of the bill meets with any contention.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. One of the purposes of the amendment is to abolish the short session of Congress. This really fixes the short session only one month longer than the present short session.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I was very greatly impressed by the speech of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COMBS] on our policy in Central America. I congratulate him, and I congratulate the State of Missouri on sending such an able young man here. But, Mr. Chairman, is the picture drawn by the gentlemen in their several speeches here a true one? Is this Nation headed toward imperialism? Are we embarking on a new policy so far as these nations are concerned? We must look to the past for the answer.

Administration after administration, Democratic and Republican, have each had a Mexican or a Central American problem with which to deal. Through all of them runs straight and clear one American policy, that of forbearance and benevolent protection. That policy has been called one of "watchful waiting," and has been given other names, but whatever called it is one and the same through many years of trouble and disagreements.

Let us see if we have followed a course of imperialism in the past. The death a short time ago of Carlotta, widow of the misguided Maximilian, recalls that period of Mexico's history during and at the close of our struggle between the States. The Emperor of France, Napoleon III, sought to establish an empire in Mexico. He helped to place upon the throne a brother of the Emperor of Austria, and supported him with an army under the command of one of his trusted and able marshals. Owing to the struggle that was engaging our attention we could not put the Monroe doctrine into execution. But when our troubles had cleared we mobilized an army on the border under the command of Gen. Philip Sheridan and promptly notified France that she must withdraw. Napoleon saw the handwriting on the wall, he withdrew his support, and the empire of Maximilian crumbled. Mexico was saved from the imperialism of Europe—saved by the United States.

Have we of this day and generation forgotten the time when in dealing with that problem a Democratic President directed our Navy to capture Vera Cruz and sent an invading Army to protect our rights? This was not a move against a leader of a band of brigands, but a move against the sovereignty of Mexico. Did we then press our advantage? No; we withdrew. What other nation in all the world would have treated an offending nation with the same degree of forbearance?

Have we forgotten the day when a band of Mexicans under the command of one of their leaders invaded the United States and in the nighttime shot down our citizens at Columbus, N. Mex.? President Wilson placed Pershing in command and he chased Villa into the mountains of Sonora. Did we then press along the road of imperialism? No; again we withdrew. Do you know of any nation that would have adopted such a pacific attitude under such provocation?

Have we forgotten when the same President, owing to the conduct of Mexico, was compelled to mobilize our forces along the border for our protection? Still again we failed to take advantage of an opportunity if inclined toward imperialism.

Our country has been patient and long-suffering through all these troubles that have spanned our generation. We have never asserted sovereignty over a foot of Mexican territory by reason of this conduct.

We have been told that our conduct toward Nicaragua is unduly aggressive, that we are there bent on a policy of imperialism. We are told that we have no right to send the marines and that the Monroe doctrine is not concerned with the internal affairs of that nation. I challenge that contention with the policy stated by a great Democratic Secretary of State, Richard Olney, as follows:

> The United States is practically sovereign on this continent and its fiat is law upon the subjects to which it confines its interposition.

Nine years later this was confirmed and elaborated by Elihu Root, then Secretary of State. According to his interpretation—

> The Monroe doctrine * * * is an assertion of our right for our own interest to interfere with the action of every other nation in those other parts of the hemisphere where others are sovereign and to say if you do thus and so, even by the consent of the sovereign, we shall regard it an unfriendly act because it will affect us injuriously. We arrogate to ourselves only the right to protect; what we will not permit the great powers of Europe to do * * * we will not permit any American Republic to make it necessary for the great powers of Europe to do.

But has our conduct toward the Central American Republics been one of aggression? What are the facts? We have protected their territorial integrity for a century. During that period England, France, Belgium, and Germany have been reaching out for territory and have brought under their control wide areas of Africa, Asia, and the islands of the seas, but not a foot of Central America has come under their sway. During an age of conquest we have been the only protector of these republics.

Not only have we protected them, but we have actually driven Spain out of the West Indies, delivered Cuba from 300 years of misrule, put Santo Domingo on her feet, restored Belize to Guatemala, the Bay Islands to Honduras, and driven England from the so-called mosquito coast of Nicaragua. Where in all history has a course of action been more altruistic and less imperialistic than that of the United States toward these republics?

Are we changing overnight? One would think from the speeches delivered here that our Nation embarked on a new policy when President Coolidge ordered the marines to Nicaragua. But it has been the settled policy of the Government to use the marines to maintain peace and orderly government in Central America and that section of the world for more than 30 years. This is the record:

> 1895: Sixty officers, sailors, and marines from U. S. S. Atlanta, under Lieutenant Commander Taussig, landed at Boca del Toro March 8 to protect the United States consulate and Government property.

1901: Sailors and marines were landed at Panama from U. S. S. Iowa to protect American interests; also landed at Colon to protect property of the United States.

1902: A battalion of marines was landed at Colon September 20 and stationed at Panama, Colon, and along the line of the Panama Railroad until November 18, protecting American property and the transit of the Isthmus.

1903: Marine detachment landed at Santo Domingo to protect American lives and property. In the latter part of that year a brigade of marines was dispatched to Panama. This brigade returned to the United States in 1904, but left a battalion for permanent station in the Canal Zone. A force of this strength was maintained there until 1914.

1906: A brigade of marines was sent to Cuba and landed there, forming a part of the army of Cuban pacification, the cause of this occupation being the insurrection of Cuba. Part of this brigade returned on October 30, but 1,000 remained until December, 1909.

1906: One hundred and twenty sailors and marines landed at Habana, Cuba, from the U. S. S. Denver to protect American interests.

1907: Two detachments of sailors from the U. S. S. Marietta landed at Truxillo and Ceiba, Honduras, to protect American interests during an insurrection.

1907: A detachment of sailors under Lieut. J. V. Klemen, United States Navy, landed from U. S. S. Marietta at Puerto Cortez, Honduras, for the protection of American interests.

Marines and sailors from U. S. S. Paducah landed at Puerto Cortez, Truxillo, and Ceiba.

1908: An expeditionary force was dispatched to Panama for the purpose of insuring a peaceful election.

1909: An expeditionary regiment left the United States for Corinto, Nicaragua, arriving there December 20 and remaining until March 15, 1910, owing to the disturbed conditions arising from an insurrection in that country. In May, 1910, another, but smaller, expeditionary force left Panama for Bluefields, Nicaragua, where they remained until September of the same year. In 1912 a large expeditionary force was again sent to Nicaragua, as a revolution had again broken out in that country. This force occupied all the principal cities of Nicaragua, but to accomplish this end a regular campaign was necessary. The expeditionary forces were finally withdrawn January 9, 1913, a guard for the American legation being left. This guard was withdrawn August 3, 1925.

1912: A provisional brigade of marines was dispatched to Cuba in May of this year in view of extremely unsettled conditions in that country, and they were distributed over a large area in the eastern part of that island to protect the lives and property of Americans. It was withdrawn the following August.

1915: Serious disturbances broke out in Haiti and marines and bluejackets from the U. S. S. Washington landed and occupied Port au Prince, July 28. The Second Regiment landed at Port au Prince, August 4. Marines have been on duty in this Republic continually since July, 1915, to present date.

1916: Trouble broke out in the Republic of Santo Domingo and marines were sent from Haiti to Santo Domingo and Puerto Plata and occupied those towns. Shortly after June 21 the Fourth Regiment of marines arrived and disembarked at Monte Cristi. By the end of the year the marine forces were in complete control of the country. The marines occupied this country until August 1, 1924, when they were withdrawn.

1919: Disturbance amounting to an insurrection occurred in Haiti and it was necessary for the marine brigade occupying that country to take the field again.

1921: The Third Battalion of the Fifth Regiment sailed from Philadelphia for special temporary duty in Panama on account of boundary trouble that had arisen between Panama and Costa Rica. It was not necessary for this battalion to take the field and it left Panama September 3 of the same year, returning to the United States.

1924: A serious revolution broke out in Honduras and marines were landed four times in several cities on the north coast of that country to protect American lives.

1925: There were further landing forces of marines in Honduras.

1926: Detachment of marines landed in Nacaragua.

It will be seen from this record that in 1912 a large expeditionary force was sent to Nicaragua and occupied all of the principal cities. While this force was withdrawn in 1913, a guard was maintained for 12 years. Nicaragua during that period entered into a period of great prosperity. It refunded its debt to English bondholders at a lower rate of interest, settled its French and American debts, recovered full ownership of its national bank and railroad, made many public improvements, and during the World War was one of the few countries of the world to maintain its currency on a par with the dollar. The guard was withdrawn in August, 1925.

At the time of the withdrawal, Solorzano, a Conservative, was the duly elected and qualified President, and Sacasa, a Liberal, Vice President. In October, 1925, the Conservatives took control of the fort which controls the capital. Sacasa fled the country. In January, 1926, Solorzano resigned the Presidency. Sacasa being out of the country, there was a vacancy in both the Presidency and the Vice Presidency. The Congress elected Chamorro as President. But in 1923 the Central American countries had entered into a treaty by the terms of which they agreed not to recognize a government that came into power through a coup d'état or revolution. The United States is committed to a moral observance of the treaty. Chamorro was in command of the forces that captured the fort commanding the capital.

It was construed that he came into power in violation of the treaty agreement and the United States refused to recognize him as President. In the meantime a revolution had been started on the east coast which endangered American lives and property. Naval vessels were dispatched to the scene. Neutral zones were established by agreement. A peace conference of all the factions was called at Corinto, but that failed. Great Britain and Italy asked the United States to protect their nationals. Sacasa still being out of the country the Congress, in accordance with the constitution, elected Diaz President. He is de facto and de jure President. Upon coming to office he addressed a note to this country asking for its guidance and help, and at the same time expressing his absolute confidence in the high spirit of justice of the Government of the United States, and cited in justification of that confidence its action in withdrawing without compulsion from Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Nicaragua and other countries after rendering unselfish service in the restoration of order and the stabilization of government.

President Coolidge well stated our position in his reply to the new Nicaraguan minister at the time of his presentation of his letters of credence. The President said:

> The United States, as I know your Government and the people of Nicaragua fully appreciate, has no selfish ends or imperialistic designs to serve. * * * The United States desires the independence and the prosperity of every Central American Republic.

Aside from all this there are special reasons why we must help to maintain a stable government in Nicaragua. We have acquired, at an expenditure of $3,000,000, the right to construct a canal across that country. We have, therefore, certain vested rights that we may construct a waterway to facilitate the flow of the commerce of the world.

In this situation shall we recall the marines and leave Nicaragua, where we have acquired interests that place us under obligation to the world, to anarchy and plunder? Shall we pull down the flag and say to all Christendom that this Nation that believes in peace and prosperity will do nothing to maintain peace in this weak, but friendly nation that is asking our help?

Our Democratic friends denounce this course as imperialistic and loudly call for a reversal of our policy. Are these gentlemen going back on their party leaders of the past? It was a Democrat, Grover Cleveland, who first used the marines to maintain peace and assert our rights south of the Rio Grande. It was a Democrat, Richard Olney, who as Secretary of State, gave the broad interpretation of the Monroe doctrine now fully accepted as our rule and guide. It was a leading Democrat, Senator Raynor, of Maryland, who introduced the resolution in the United States Senate in 1909 authorizing the President of the United States to take all necessary steps to bring the President of Nicaragua to justice for permitting the murder of two of our citizens. It was William Jennings Bryan, three times the candidate of the Democratic Party for the highest office within the gift of the people, who negotiated the Bryan-Chamorro treaty with a provision conferring protectorate rights on the United States as to Nicaragua.

It was Mr. Bryan who negotiated a loan for Nicaragua from American bankers, kept marines there during his term of office, and acquired for the United States a naval station in the Gulf of Fonseca. It was Woodrow Wilson, the apostle of self-determination, who twice directed an invasion of Mexico and mobilized our forces for a third. If credit for this policy is to be claimed by any political party, it may well be claimed for the Democratic Party. Are our friends scuttling their ship?

In common with the gentleman, I find myself filled with indignation and sorrow at the killing of the brave men of the Marine Corps in Nicaragua. It is always a matter of concern to us when a situation becomes so acute that soldiers of America must sacrifice their lives.

But my indignation and sorrow arise from the fact that an attack was made on them by the common enemies of peace, prosperity, and the friendly relations between the peoples of the American Republics. Here is a weak nation, trusting in us, that has asked the help of this strong Nation that has practically guaranteed her integrity and protection from those enemies who would destroy our friendly relations. Will we desert the weak nation in the hour of her peril? Our soldiers have not died in vain. Through them the spirit of America, the spirit of forbearance and benevolent protection, still lives and will cement us closer together in a common cause of American friendship.

Why is it that some of our citizens always find the other nation in the right and ours in the wrong? Why is it that some even paint bandits of other nations as heroes and our brave sons, who are trying to help maintain orderly government, as trespassers?

I believe my country to be in the right in this Nicaraguan question, but right or wrong, I stand by my country. I propose to stand by the administration in dealing with problems affecting foreign nations and their people, whether that administration be Republican or Democratic.

It has been said that we are waging war in Nicaragua. Waging war against what nation? Not against Nicaragua. We are not even discriminating against any political party in that country. President Diaz requested the presence of the marines for the maintenance of peace, and in his request paid a high tribute to the disinterested help of America in the Latin countries of this hemisphere. Moncada, leader of the Liberal Party and its candidate for President, said a few days ago in an unauthorized interview:

> The presence of the marines in Nicaragua is for the guaranteeing of peace and liberty and for the defense of the citizens against an attempt on the life and property of persons. * * * The Liberal Party knows that since our independence from 1821 the Nicaraguans do not understand republican practices, and for them to attain this practice we need the impartiality of the American Government.

In another statement he put the thought in his mind in the following language:

> A republican education at the hands of the United States is better than a monarchial education at the hands of some European nation.

We are simply trying to establish an orderly government in a disorganized friendly nation and at the request of every recognized agency therein.

It has been said that no instance can be cited where American lives or American property has been put in jeopardy in Nicaragua. In answer to that challenge let us look at the records of the State Department. We have not proceeded to send marines without due consideration. We have not acted on the impulse of the moment. The trouble started as far back as August, 1926.

On August 19, 1926, the Otis Manufacturing Co. telegraphed that further revolutionary disturbances in Nicaragua were reported, that an outbreak at Bluefields would be serious, and asked what steps were being taken by this Government to protect property. The department replied on August 21 that it was following developments closely and would take such appropriate action as possible to protect American interests which might appear to be in danger.

On August 20 the Freiberg Mahogany Co. telegraphed that interests in Nicaragua seemed to be in danger and said that sending a warship to Bluefields would help. This was answered on August 21 in the same words as the telegram from the Otis Manufacturing Co.

The Mengal Co. also telegraphed on August 20 and was answered in the same way.

On August 20 Senator RANSDELL telephoned to Mr. Stabler on behalf of the Otis Manufacturing Co. He said he understood that all proper steps would be taken by the department to protect American lives and interests, and Mr. Stabler assured him that such was the case; the department was watching the matter closely. On August 30 Senator RANSDELL was informed by letter that warships had been ordered from Balboa, Canal Zone, to Bluefields and Corinto to protect American lives and property.

On August 23 the American consul at Bluefields telegraphed that conditions were growing worse; that an attack on El Bluff and Bluefields was expected every moment; and that a warship was urgently needed to protect the lives and property of American citizens.

On August 25 the Freiberg Mahogany Co. telegraphed, asking that a warship be sent at once to Bluefields.

On August 27 the Bragmans Bluff Lumber Co. telegraphed that the revolutionists were attacking its property at Bragmans Bluff, one of the company's officials being seriously wounded, and asked that a warship be sent immediately. The company was informed in reply that the U. S. S. Galveston had been ordered to the east coast.

The American consul at Bluefields telegraphed on August 31 as follows:

> Losses to Americans on the rivers will amount to $2,000,000 unless conflict stopped soon. If the five mahogany companies can not get protection on all the rivers, their losses will be one and one-half millions. Contending factions take their boats; recruit their men, rendering them helpless; logs float out to sea. The two banana companies are also handicapped, their boats being taken and their laborers being recruited or frightened away.

On September 1 the A. W. Tedcastle Co. (makers of boots and shoes) wrote, inclosing a copy of a report from their repsentative at Bluefields, saying something should be done by the United States.

On September 2 the Bragmans Bluff Lumber Co. telegraphed that interests would suffer enormously unless warship Rochester remained indefinitely at Bragmans Bluff. This was answered the same day to the effect that the Rochester would remain on the east coast until further orders.

On September 3 the Freiberg Mahogany Co. telegraphed, asking for protection at Prinzapolka and various other loading ports, saying that neutral zones should be proclaimed and military force used if necessary. This was answered on September 4: "Two American warships at present on east coast of Nicaragua to protect American interests."

On September 4 the Mengel Co. telegraphed to ask that arrangements in force at Bluefields be extended to other loading ports. The department replied the same day, asking whether the Mengel Co.'s representative had communicated with the commanding officer of the nearest United States war vessel and informed him as to actual conditions.

On September 8 the Astoria Importing & Manufacturing Co. wrote to ask that loading ports north of Bluefields be declared neutral zone in the same manner as Bluefields itself.

On September 8 the Chicago Bridge & Iron Works wrote, inclosing a copy of a letter of August 29 from its manager at Puerto Cabezas describing chaotic and dangerous conditions there. A reply was sent on September 15 stating that American war vessels had been sent to the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of Nicaragua to extend protection to American lives and property.

On September 17 the Mengel Co. telegraphed that fighting at Bluefields and vicinity had paralyzed everything.

On September 22 the Astoria Importing & Manufacturing Co. wrote that too much emphasis could not be laid on the seriousness of the situation on the Atlantic coast of Nicaragua. The hope was expressed that the Government of the United States would use its utmost influence to effect an immediate and lasting truce.

On September 23 the Otis Manufacturing Co. wired to ask protection for loading operations at El Bluff. On September 24 this telegram was sent in reply:

> An armistice was signed yesterday afternoon on board the S. S. Rochester at Bluefields, to take effect immediately. Armistice for 15 days, subject extension by mutual consent. Neutral zone extended to include Bluff and the bay. Escondido River opened to legitimate trade. Commerce may be promptly resumed with Bluefields and entire east coast of Nicaragua.

The same telegram was sent to the other companies interested.

On September 24 the department gave to the press the text of the 15 days' armistice agreement between the contending factions at Bluefields.

On October 11 Mr. Frank G. Otis, president of the Otis Manufacturing Co., called to discuss the situation. He said he hoped the conference to be held at Corinto would result in more stable conditions.

On October 13, 1926, the Astoria Importing & Manufacturing Co. wrote that in view of the approaching termination of the truce it was desired that protection be arranged for the shipment of mahogany from the various eastern Nicaraguan ports. In a second letter of the same date the strategic position of El Bluff in relation to Bluefields Harbor was explained; unless El Bluff were neutralized, no shipment could be made from Bluefields. Protection was requested for tugs and other floating equipment to prevent seizure by belligerents; the revolutionists tend to seizure of any floating equipment. Hope expressed that United States will exert all pressure within its power to avoid hostilities and effect a compromise; the people of Nicaragua, and reasonable men of both parties, are anxious to reach a compromise and are tired of warfare. The department replied that the matter would have careful consideration.

On October 25 the Standard Fruit & Steamship Co. wrote to call attention to the recent trouble in its Bragmans Bluff division at Puerto Cabezas. The company stated that its investment there amounted to about $8,000,000 and that approximately 1,000 Americans were employed by it at Puerto Cabezas and along the railroad and tributaries thereto and asked what protection might be expected from the United States Government.

On November 2 the Freiberg Mahogany Co. wrote asking advice as to probable developments. The department replied on November 9 that the armistice between the contending factions had expired on October 27, that Bluefields and El Bluff remained a neutral zone, that it was impossible to predict what the course of events might be, and that the policy with regard to future investments was a question upon which the department was unable to give advice.

On November 2 Mr. Salmen, of the Bragmans Bluff Lumber Co., telephoned to Mr. Morgan from New Orleans that the situation at Puerto Cabezas was becoming very serious and the company wanted to know what protection could be expected.

On November 10 the American Dyewood Co. wrote to ask for assistance in shipping fustic wood from Potosi, Nicaragua, in December or January. The department replied on November 11 that it was unable to predict what the situation might then be and therefore could give no advice.

On December 13, 1926, the Astoria Importing & Manufacturing Co. requested that Admiral Latimer be instructed to prevent unwarranted exaction of payments to revolutionary authorities who were demanding payments of taxes on shipments of logs already taxed and released by the Government.

On December 22 Mr. J. Gilmore Fletcher, agent for the Bragmans Bluff Lumber Co., wrote to protest against unwarranted interference by the forces of Sacasa at Puerto Cabezas, and to request adequate and prompt assistance and protection of American lives and property in danger.

On December 24 a joint telegram asking protection was sent to the department by the Otis Manufacturing Co., the Mengel Co., and the Astoria Importing & Manufacturing Co.

On December 29 the Bragmans Bluff Lumber Co. sent a strong telegram, quoting from Mr. Fletcher's letter of December 22, and again requesting that the lives of the employees and the property of the company, now clearly in jeopardy, be given full and prompt protection.

On December 30 Senator SACKETT left a letter from the Mengel Co., dated December 29, 1926, requesting his support to secure protection for their mahogany operations in Nicaragua.

Senator Ernst called at the department and left a copy of a telegram of December 29, 1926, from the Mengel Co. requesting his support for their requests for protection by this Government for their mahogany operations.

On January 2, 1927, Mr. Douglas H. Allen, in reporting his arrival at Bluefields, telegraphed that the situation was critical and rapidly growing worse; that warfare had passed into a new phase requiring immediate intervention by the United States, otherwise guerrilla warfare would result for a period of years; that immediate intervention could still control the situation and prevent widespread suffering, loss of life, and destruction of property.

On January 3, 1927, Eccleston & Son. (Inc.) wrote that the revolutionary authorities were interfering with their business operations through illegal collection of taxes and duties, and the department was requested to invoke the assistance of the naval authorities to extend protection to the company.

On January 4, 1927, the American Legation telegraphed that President Diaz had set forth his inability to guarantee protection of American and other foreign lives; that the British and Italian diplomatic representatives found their nationals in Nicaragua in imminent peril without outside protection; that postponement of the establishment of a legation guard until a crisis developed would prevent the accomplishment of any valuable purpose by the guard.

On January 4, 1927, Mr. Douglas H. Allen telegraphed from Bluefields that, in his opinion, revolutionary movements would lose much strength if United States would immediately issue public statement clearly defining its position.

On January 5, 1927, Representative ASWELL transmitted a letter, dated December 27, 1926, from the Standard Fruit & Steamship Co., indorsing the position of that company and requesting protection; and the representative indorsed the landing of American marines in Nicaragua.

On December 30, 1926, the LaLuz & Los Angeles Mining Co. wrote that they had $1,000,000 paid-up capital invested in Nicaragua; that revolutionary parties had interfered with their mining operations and shipment of their products; that armed forces had made forced levies of merchandise from their stores; that employees had been conscripted; that outside food supplies for their mine had been stocked for two months; that all floating equipment in the vicinity had been commandeered. They requested that all possible assistance be given the established Government in Nicaragua. They stated that they have meticulously abstained from interference in Nicaraguan politics.

These are some of the requests and representations that came to the Department of State that lead to the very proper decision to send our marines to Nicaragua to assist in the establishment of orderly peace, as well as for the protection of the lives and property of our citizens.

We are told that our policy is resented by other Latin American countries. That statement may well be doubted. The statesmen of those countries are men of understanding and broad vision. They know that we are rendering to Nicaragua the greatest unselfish service that one nation may render to another. We are placing at her service our brave men to rid her of a bandit band led by a roving soldier of fortune, that her people may enjoy the blessings of a free government. We are not attacking her sovereignty, we are defending it for her people.

The statesmen gathered at Habana to help shape the destiny of this Western Hemisphere will understand the full measure of our service and the meaning of our sacrifices; that our policy measured by every standard of history has been unselfish, has been one of protection and civic helpfulness in working out the destiny of the Latin American Republics. Its aim has been to further a common rule of peace and justice and to strengthen political, spiritual, and moral unity.

Let the representatives at the Pan American Conference behold America as America is, an unselfish nation, ever ready to reach out a helping hand to the weak, ever ready to give aid in the maintenance of orderly liberty, a nation that never asked for reward, that has never taken a foot of territory through a war of aggression, America the friend of every Republic on this continent. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has expired.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS].

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, during the consideration of the appropriation item for the Federal Trade Commission there was a rather general discussion on both sides of the aisle a few days ago, in which I had a part. At that time I suggested that the Pittsburgh-plus investigation had been made because of interstate commerce being involved, but suggested that nevertheless it was an economic investigation. I am officially informed that it was investigated because it was in violation of the antitrust law and to that extent I stand corrected. I found a few days ago this illuminating comment on some of the very practical activities of the Federal Trade Commission. This was in a letter to the Washington Post by the chairman of that commission, and I want to read it:

ELIMINATING FRAUD IN TRADE

To the EDITOR OF THE POST:

SIR: I have just read with interest the editorial in this morning's issue of the Post entitled "False advertising." It refers principally to fraudulent practices in the fur industry. If the allegations that the commission has received are to be believed, this industry is one of the worst offenders in the country against fair dealing.

We have issued complaints against several concerns that are being vigorously pushed to a final conclusion.

But more important, however, is the fact that this great industry is to have what we call a trade practice conference at the Pennsylvania Hotel, in New York, on February 3, under the direction of the commission. In this conference the fur industry is going to undertake to clean its own house. If they fail to do so, the commission will do it for them. I feel certain the great majority of those engaged in the fur business will adopt rules of practice that will be approved by the commission, which will hereafter practically eliminate fraudulent and misleading practices.

We held a conference in the furniture industry, and 750 manufacturers signed the code. The effect of this action is indicated when we remember that it affected the sale of over $560,000,000 worth of furniture that went into the homes of this country last year. Under the rules of this conference, gum is no longer sold as walnut, nor birch as mahogany. The truth is told about furniture.

In the correspondence school conference 90 per cent of those in this great business signed the code, with the result that schemes that were defrauding the ignorant and credulous of about $35,000,000 annually were practically wiped out.

In the rayon industry the result was practically 100 per cent, and the women of this country are no longer sold artificial silk as the genuine article.

By the results of the foregoing conferences, and in others, I feel that the conference to be held in the fur industry will practically eliminate unfair practices therein.

W. E. HUMPHREY,
Chairman Federal Trade Commission.

WASHINGTON, January 24.

I think most of us are concerned not so much as to whether a prosecution or investigation is made under one provision of the act or the other. It is the practical results to the people that we are concerned in, and I have read this into the RECORD as further evidence—and from certainly the very best of authority, the chairman of the commission—that the Federal Trade Commission is a practical instrument in behalf of the people of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, there are no other Members present who desire to use time and therefore I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire how much time has been used on this side?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia has used 82 minutes, and the gentleman from California, 111 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that the committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10286), the War Department appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the communication from the Secretary of War with regard to the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers which was referred, the Chair thinks in error, to the Committee on Expenditures, will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered printed.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Jurisdiction of this institution has not been transferred to the Veterans' Committee, but is still in the Committee on Military Affairs?

The SPEAKER. Yes. Both chairmen have agreed that this is a proper reference. Is there objection?

There was no objection.
